Preface.

IN compiling a history of "The Catholic Church in Wisconsin," for the benefit and reference of students and adherents of the Catholic faith, it has been deemed advisable to enlarge upon many points which may not appear exactly analogous to the subject, or warranted in a work of such limited pretensions. It is evident, however, that to deal with the matter as only pertaining to the State, and to the utter exclusion of all which might thus be classed as extraneous, would result in a work so disjointed and unsatisfactory in its results as to make it impossible, even for the most ardent imagination, to grasp the enormity of the undertaking, or to form an adequate idea of the moral and physical effort involved in its execution.

The story of the Catholic Church in America finds mention in history's pages, almost side by side with that of the earliest explorers, and its growth and progress are so thoroughly interwoven and closely allied with that of the country itself that to separate them were impractical, even if possible. Of all anterior motives, that of redeeming the savage from a natural state of barbarism and false beliefs to a recognition of the Christian religion was the prevailing one with those pious and zealous men, whose self-inflicted martyrdom and holy fervor still challenges the admiration of the world.

It has been deemed advisable, therefore, that the reader should in these pages not only become informed of their personal experiences in the missionary field, but that they may be made more appreciably aware of the character of the work by means of a brief acquaintance, at least, with the country in which, and people among whom they labored. With this purpose in view, the following pages have been devoted to a short account of the travels and experiences of the early French voyegeurs, a description of the country found and settled by them, as well as of the manners and characteristics of the people dwelling in that region.

This, it is hoped and believed, while far from being as complete as the importance of the subject warrants and deserves, will at least place the reader in a position to appreciate the arduousness of the task undertaken, and the wonderful successes realized by the missionary Fathers.

In conclusion it is deemed but right and proper to acknowledge with thankfulness the generous assistance afforded in its completion by the Most Rev. Archbishop Katzer, Bishop Schwebach, Bishop Messmer and a large number of the clergy of the State, whose untiring interest in the matter has been of unusual value. The works of Charlevoix, Shea, Parkman, Carver, the Rev. Chrysostom Verwyst, the Minnesota Historical Collections and Writings of the Rev. Joseph S. La Boule and Mr. Henry C. Campbell of the Parkman Club, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, have also been largely relied upon for much information of both value and importance.

The French in Canada.

AFTER the evacuation of Florida by the French, it seemed to be the prevailing opinion that they would thereafter renounce all interest to or in the settlement of the mainland of America. A brisk business, however, was still maintained in the whale and cod fisheries along the coast of Newfoundland, the parties thus engaged at the same time opening up a considerable trade with the natives in furs and peltries. A kind of connecting link was thus maintained with the country, the interest in which was to be greatly enhanced and strengthened by the conditions subsequently prevailing in France under the administration of Henry IV. It was after almost half a century of internal contentions that this enterprising, valorous but clement monarch ascended the throne, and it is due largely to his forethought and vivid appreciation of the wonderful possibilities to be developed in that almost unknown region, that the people took a renewed and emphatic interest in the work of further exploration and settlement. It was in the year 1598 that this desire for colonization again made itself evident in the people of France, the most active spirit among whom was the Marquis de la Roche, a Breton gentleman, who obtained from the King the same permission and power vouchsafed to Mr. D. Roberval by Francis I. By the letters patent thus granted he was created Lieutenant-General in the countries of Canada, Hochelaga, Newfoundland, Labrador, St. Lawrence River, or River of the Great Bay as it was then called, Norimbegue and other lands adjacent, the latter being a portion of territory which is now covered by the State of Maine and Nova Scotia. These rights and privileges granted to de la Roche on January 12, 1598, he at once set to making preparations for a voyage, being particularly anxious to visit and examine the country in person. During the same year he fitted out a vessel in which he embarked with one Chaedotel, a Norman pilot of much skill and experience. From authentic accounts of this journey we learn that the first land sighted by them was Sable Island, which lies about twenty-five leagues southeast of Cape Breton, and which is reputed as being the place where de Lery, nearly one hundred years previously, attempted to establish a colony. A more unsatisfactory spot could hardly have been found from which to form one's earlier impressions, for, as we are told, Sable Island is barren and uninviting, and in no particular adapted for the comfort or habitation of man. In area it is quite small; in form narrow and uneven, and it is entirely devoid of any harbor or accommodations whatsoever. From this altogether undesirable location, de la Roche made a short and unsatisfactory visit to Acadia, which is the nearest mainland from Sable Island. After a short stay at Acadia, he started on his return journey to France. Arriving there, he was soon after made prisoner by the Duke de Mercouer of Brittany, who, on account of his well-known and zealous activity in behalf of the Catholic religion, held him captive for some considerable period. He finally died without having had either time or opportunity to further pursue his investigations. The unfortunate outcome of de la Roche's efforts, however, did not prevent others from renewing the attempt.

First among these was the Sieur de Pontgrave, a leading merchant of St. Malo, who had already become proficient in navigation through numerous voyages made by him to Tadoussac. Together with Mr. Chauvin, a mariner of considerable renown, he obtained all of the privileges and prerogatives attached to the commission of de la Roche. Two very successful voyages were made by them, after which Commander de Chatte fitted out an expedition which was placed in charge of Pontgrave, Chauvin having in the meantime died. At identically the same time one Samuel de Champlain was placed in charge of an expedition by the same Company to push investigations in Canada. Having reached Tadoussac and rested for a short time at that place, Champlain and Pontgrave, accompanied by five sailors, took a small boat and ascended the river to Sault St. Louis, which was as far as Jacques Cartier had succeeded in going. It was during this voyage that Champlain first heard of the Hurons and Iroquois tribes, of the Falls of Niagara and of the wonderful Lake Superior copper region. The next to venture on an expedition was a certain Sieur de Monts, who, being a Calvinist and having received permission from the King to freely exercise his religion in America, agreed on the other hand to settle the country and to use his utmost efforts in establishing the Catholic religion among the Indians there.

The country known as Acadia, in which de Monts continued the work of his predecessors, is, according to John de Laet in his description of the West Indies, a peninsula of triangular form. Numerous other historians describe it in the same manner, with the exception of Champlain and Denys, who differ in giving it an area of much smaller extent. De Laet, according to the historian Charlevoix, gives the name of Acadia only to the south side of the peninsula, while Denys, who was for a long time a resident of that country, is also almost identical in his manner of describing it. He divides all of the eastern and southern part of Canada into provinces, each of which—there being four—was under the domination of a proprietor who acted in behalf of the King. The first of these was called the province of the Etechemins, although it was previously known as Norimbegue. The second, which extended from St. John's River to Cape Sable, he called French Bay. The third, which was limited at the one extreme by Canceaux and at the other by Cape Sable, he named Acadia, the same being afterwards styled Nova Scotia by the English. The fourth province, extending from Canceaux to Cape des Rosiers, he named the Bay of St. Lawrence. In a further description of the southern provinces of New France, discovered by de Monts and de Champlain, the historian says: "There are perhaps none in the world possessing finer harbors or furnishing in greater abundance all the conveniences of life. The climate is quite mild and very healthy, and no lands have been found that are not of surprising fertility. In La Haive a single grain of wheat was seen which produced one hundred and fifty ears so long and full that an iron ring had to be put there to support them. The Sieur Denys who reports this fact, actually witnessed by himself, adds that in the same place he saw a field of wheat where the seeds that were least prolific had eight stalks, all bearing ears, the least six inches long. Finally, nowhere are there to be seen forests more beautiful or with wood better fitted for building masts.

"There are in some places copper mines, and in others mines of coal. The fish most commonly caught on the coast are the cod, salmon, mackerel, herring, sardine, shad, trout and many other kinds, all of which can be salted and exported. Seals, walruses and whales are found in great numbers. The rivers, too, are full of fresh water fish and the banks teem with countless game.

"Acadia is admirably situated for commerce; it is the head of North America and the nearest, surest and most convenient depot for the West Indies traders. It is two hundred and fifty leagues in circuit between the forty-third and forty-sixth degree north latitude. The currents are not troublesome and are navigable under any wind."

It was on the 6th of May that de Monts entered the harbor of Acadia. From this place he went to another which was called Port de Mouton. Here he landed with most of his people and spent several weeks, while his companion de Champlain ran down the coast in search of a place suitable for the establishment of a settlement. Finally they settled on a small island some twenty leagues beyond St. John's River, which they named the Isle de Sainte Croix. In Champlain's book of voyages it is stated regarding this particular journey, that he went only six leagues beyond Long Island to Port Ste. Margaret, and then returned to Port de Mouton. Accompanied by de Monts, he again set forth on the 16th of May, and soon after entered Port Royal, which owes its name to Champlain as the Bay of Fundy did its name of Baye Francaise, to de Monts. They then visited les Mines, crossed the bay and sailed west to Ouygoudy River, which they reached on St. John's day, when, according to this history, they pushed on to an island in Passammaquody Bay to which de Monts gave the name of Ste. Croix. They soon discovered that the location selected was a poor one, and as the winter came along, found themselves much in want of both water and wood. As soon, therefore, as navigation opened, they sought for a new and more advantageous spot on which to establish the colony. They now steered in a southerly direction, ranging along the coast a distance of some eighty leagues to the Kennebec River, and then north and south to a place which during a previous visit Champlain had designated Malebere. Without forming any definite plans they now returned to Ste. Croix, where they were joined by de Pontgrave, who had but just arrived from France. De Monts at once embarked with Pontgrave with a view to making still further explorations, and during this trip ran into Port Royal. To this place, which he found was entirely to his liking, he soon after removed his colony. The only objection to be found with Port Royal seems to have been the difficulty of entering and going out, as well as the inconvenience arising from the heavy fogs which are quite frequent. According to one author, but one ship can enter at a time, and that must do so stern foremost, owing to the great strength of the currents and the tide. Of the formation and accommodation of the bay inside, it may be stated that it is two leagues in length and one in width, and that there is a small island in the center to which vessels can approach quite closely. At no point in the basin is the water less than four or five fathoms in depth, while at the entrance it is fully five fathoms. The bottom is good and the shelter also. As to the climate, it is temperate, the winter being less severe than in many other parts, while the landscape is charming and game very plentiful. Two leagues from Port Royal is St. John's River, in the region of which large copper deposits were said to exist. The entrance to this river is even more difficult than that into Port Royal, and its surroundings are more than usually remarkable. Of this, Shea in his translation of Charlevoix says: "Within common range is a rapid over which sloops and even barks can pass at high tide. At the descent of this rapid there is a whirlpool about four hundred paces in circuit, in which there was formerly to be seen standing erect a tree which seemed to float and never left its place, notwithstanding the force of the current. It appeared to be about the size of a barrel, but it was sometimes all covered by the sea for several days. It also seemed to turn, as if on a pivot, for it was not always seen on the same side. The Indians seemed to pay it a kind of worship, attaching to it the skins of beaver and other animals, and when they set out and did not perceive it, they augured ill of their voyage. Pontgrave, it would seem, was not altogether of the same opinion as de Monts regarding Port Royal, the advantages of that location yielding less attraction to him than to the others, while its advantages, on the contrary, were magnified to an unusual extent. In 1608 de Monts, who had met with many reverses at the hands of his enemies, made a settlement on the St. Lawrence River. A vessel was placed in charge of de Champlain, one of his associates, who finally decided on Quebec as the point of settlement.[1] This place, according to geographers, is located on the northern shore of the River St. Lawrence, about one hundred and twenty leagues from the sea, and between a little river which bears the name of St. Charles and a large cape called Cape Diamond. The Indians gave to this place the name Quebeio, or Quelibec, which in Algonquin and Abenaki means a narrowing end, because the river there narrows in until it is only a mile wide; whereas, just below Isle Orleans—that is to say, ten leagues further down—it still maintains a breadth of four or five leagues.

In this same year the King of France became urgent in his demands that something must at once be done towards the conversion of the Indians, and, furthermore, stated as his wish that Jesuits should be taken over to the new possessions for that purpose. To this end he at the same time directed his confessor, Father Cotton, to select from among the order a number physically and otherwise suited for such an undertaking. When the wishes of the King were made known, many members of the order at once volunteered their services, but of these only two were accepted—Fathers Peter Baird and Enemond Masse. It was after numerous setbacks and unavoidable delays that these two missionaries sailed for the field of their future labors, arriving at Port Royal on the 12th day of June, 1611. The circumstances surrounding the arrival of these Reverend Fathers in their new home evidenced anything but a friendly feeling towards them on the part of the people who had already settled there. In fact, the same condition of affairs prevailed as that experienced by them previous to their departure from France, where the actions of those under authority and with whom their transportation and safe conveyance was intrusted, were of the most unfriendly character. They, however, applied themselves assiduously to the duties of their calling, seeming or pretending not to see the expressions of displeasure and indifferent and unfriendly action of those from whom they might have expected the kindliest treatment. This most unhappy state of affairs was of course due to a condition of superheeded jealousy and religious intolerance on part of the Protestant settlers. But even from this, by continuous and consistent courtesy and an evident desire to perform their arduous task without murmur or complaint, they managed to win over a majority of those who at the beginning were so bitterly opposed to their coming. It was, however, a condition of strained neutrality boding but little good to the cause of religion, or the advancement of the interests of the Cross among the heathen. Nor was it alone in the new world that the opponents of Catholicism displayed these acrid and ungenerous sentiments towards the missionary fathers. The Calvinists in France, fearing for the result of zealousness displayed on the part of these pious and active men, foreseeing possibly the popularity to be gained by their unremitting and self-sacrificing labors, incessantly clamored against them, declaring that it was not so much to preach the religion of Jesus Christ as to enrich themselves, that the Jesuits ventured into the new world. In such acts were to be found the weakest spot in the armor of Calvinism, in that they presented themselves in a position of mortal rather than moral dread; fearing, it would appear, that the loss would be one of personal aggrandizement to them rather than of moral progression to the aborigines.

At the same time the personal affairs of de Monts were by no means experiencing as smooth sailing as might have been hoped and expected as a result of that intrepid voyageur's protracted efforts. Thus it transpired that while his interests at Port Royal took on a flattering and satisfying appearance, this very fact militated, to a marked degree, against his ultimate and most deserved success. In fact, a sense of jealous reprisal seemed to pervade the every act of a number of people whose natural perversity made it impossible for them to endure the preferment of others. In this case it was not so much the man as it was the achievements wrought by him that aroused their petulant dislike, causing them to work to his discredit—for to them all roads were one, if but leading in the direction they most desired.

So, as a result of these continuous machinations, de Monts found many of his rights and privileges withheld and petitions rejected, until it appeared as though his last hope had been swept into the vortex created by this passion for greed, which had become such a dominating power with others. Too slothful to work themselves and hating to witness the accumulating fruits of others' labor; too cowardly to dare the dangers and privations incident to such an undertaking, yet morbidly desirous of obtaining the benefits accruing therefrom, these people, in their bitterness of heart, satisfied a paltry revenge in accomplishing the downfall of an unoffending fellow creature. But in spite of this unexpected act of treachery on the part of these so-called friends, de Monts found many warm and staunch supporters, who, fully realizing the value of the man, came forward unhesitatingly to his assistance. And it was undoubtedly owing to this promptness of action on their part that an appalling and irretrievable disaster was averted.

That de Monts had made numerous and palpable mistakes there was no denying, but so, for that matter, had everyone who had preceded him; besides, these were on no occasion arrayed as testimony against him. Fortunately, too, the efforts of his friends prevailed, so that almost within a year his privileges were restored to him upon the sole condition that he would establish a settlement on the St. Lawrence River. This, of course, he readily agreed to, and it was under his guidance and direction that Champlain ventured a passage up the St. Lawrence and located a settlement at Quebec. Two years later (1610) de Monts visited the new settlement, where, taking everything into consideration, he found the conditions entirely to his liking. Grain planted during the preceding season had yielded a bountiful harvest, while in many other ways the general surroundings furnished abundant suggestions for the future success of the colony.

At this particular time, the Indians living in the vicinity of Quebec were known as the Algonquins or Algoumekins. With these and the Montagnais, who lived lower down towards Tadoussac, the French endeavored to form an alliance, which undertaking was made reasonably easy from the fact that they could ofttimes render them considerable and valuable material aid. The greatest advantage, however, gained by these Indians in forming an alliance with the French settlers was in the assistance they received from them in their warfare against the Iroquois, a predatory and blood-thirsty race, who were never so happy as when destroying the homes, interests and lives of all with whom they came in contact. Of the law pertaining to the rights of others they knew not a whit, but rather deeming in its broadest sense that every man was their enemy, meted out to him that peculiar justice which made everything and everyone coming within their reach a rightful prey. These Algonquins and Montagnais, of whom a more extended account will be given later, were tribes of the same stock, the former having, indeed, given its name to the whole family of kindred tribes occupying the greater part of North America. Of their actual locality and place of residence, many contending opinions are given, some locating it, as did Charlevoix, near Quebec, while De la Potherie puts the Montagnais on the Saguenay, and Algonquins to the number of fifteen hundred between Quebec and Sylleri, with others at Three Rivers, Saguenay and Inland, later historians differing as fully in their opinions. For instance, Gaineau in his Historie du Canada located the Algonquins on the St. Lawrence from a little below Quebec to the St. Maurice, with one tribe at Montreal; the Ottawas on the river of that name, and the Montagnais on the Saguenay and Lake St. John. The author of Cours d'Historie places the Algonquins around Quebec and up the St. Lawrence towards St. Peter's Lake, and the Montagnais on the Saguenay and two or three other rivers. Another historian, de Laet, located the Indians from the Saguenay to the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Lescarbot's Historie de la Nouvelle France says the people of Gaspe and Chaleur Bay called themselves Canadacoa. Sagard and Champlain also place the Canadians there. Shea expresses it as his opinion that these Canadians were the present tribe of people known as the Naskapees. According to Sagard the Montagnais were so called by the French from the fact that they hunted during the winter in the mountains He locates them near to Quebec.

Early in the year 1609, a war party composed of Hurons, Algonquins and Montagnais, united with the intention of marching against their common enemy, the Iroquois. At about this time Champlain, who had wintered at Quebec, was joined by Pontgrave, and together they were induced to accompany this expedition. This of course was done without his having given a thought to that passionate jealousy which soon after brought dangerous and powerful opponents into the field, with whom the Iroquois, out of a natural desire for revenge and as a matter of personal safety, willingly allied themselves. Hardly a year elasped, in fact, before people of other European nations seeking for new conquests in the great and growing commercial arena, entered upon this field of competition, and at once evidenced both intention and ability to maintain their interests at all hazard. Thus, Henry Hudson, an Englishman, employed by the Dutch East India Company, while attempting to discover a passage to China north of America, landed at Cape Cod and finally, after many and devious wanderings, located at a point many leagues to the south of that place which he named Manhatte after the people inhabiting that portion of the country. But a year later trading vessels were sent to this place by merchants from Amsterdam, and some time subsequent to their coming—1615—a fort was built where the present city of Manhattan now stands. At a later period Fort Orange was built at a point considerably north of Manhattan. All of the territory thus occupied was called the New Netherland.

After associating himself with the Hurons and other tribes in their united effort against the Iroquois, Champlain discovered, all too late, however, the many dangers which menaced him and his country's interests on this continent, all of which came about unexpectedly although as a very natural result. In this act of his, Holland as well as England saw the opportunity for assuming an attitude towards the French government which was anything but of a pacific character, boding but little good for the spread and establishment of French interests on the American continent. True, the Dutch had really never declared openly against the French and become active aggressors as had the English on every available occasion; but they nevertheless had harassed the people by the gift of arms and ammunition to the Iroquois with whom Champlain, their representative, had so unhappily and unnecessarily become embroiled. It seems, however, to be the prevailing opinion of a majority of those who have written upon this subject, that Champlain's mistake was one more of the head than the heart, for it is evidenced in his actions throughout that it was his intention more particularly to humble that fierce and treacherous people, the Iroquois, with a view to establishing a permanent peace footing among the nations, rather than with the idea of effecting a contrary result, which his position in the matter most assuredly did.

In his expedition with the allies against the Iroquois, we are told that he embarked with them and entered a river which had for a long time been known as the river of the Iroquois, because it was the principal thoroughfare used by that tribe in the numerous raids made by them into the interior. Journeying some fifteen leagues up the stream, he at last reached the foot of the "Rapid," now called the Chambly Rapid, which effectually barred his further progress. He, however, sent his boat back to Quebec and continued the journey with the allies, being accompanied, also, by two of his fellow countrymen, who refused under any consideration to leave him. Here he met with fresh and trying difficulties in the carelessness and want of precaution exhibited by his companions in their march through the enemy's country, and also in the foolish confidence placed by them in the senseless impostures and juggleries perpetrated by their medicine men. The country through which this expedition led them, was reported by Champlain as being remarkably beautiful, the river islands teeming with wild life—stags, fallow deer and other game of similar character abounding. There were also large numbers of beavers, while fish absolutely swarmed the waters along which they traveled. Some considerable distance down this river, the party came upon a large lake some twenty leagues in length, and ten or twelve in width at its center, the shape of the entire body approaching somewhat that of an oval. This body of water, which was then known as Lake Champlain, was, according to the explorer's deductions, from eight to one hundred leagues in extent. On the south and west of the center of this lake were some lofty mountains ranging upwards from its shores for a distance of about twenty-five leagues. The most distant of these were almost perpetually hidden beneath a covering of snow, but the valleys between were found to be of an extremely fertile nature. These valleys were at that time inhabited by the Iroquois, or at least that was the statement made by the Indians accompanying the expedition, but there is no other authority for it. After having compassed Lake Champlain, there was still another rapid to pass, after which the voyagers entered upon a second lake, smaller than the former one, being only from four to five leagues in length. This was called Lake St. Sacrament; it is now known as Lake George, and is called in the Mohawk language, Andiatarocte. To this body of water Champlain gave another name, the French term by which it is known having been applied to it by Father Isaac Jogues, one of the early pioneer missionaries. The objective point, for which the Indians were making, was still a considerable distance away and would, had they journeyed the entire distance, have occupied several days' time in its accomplishment. A portion of this undertaking, however, was spared them, the enemy happening across their path while they were still journeying along the waters of Lake Champlain. It was here that the inherent superstition of the natives made itself evident, when, on more than one occasion, they inquired of Champlain whether he had not seen the Iroquois in his dreams. Observing that his continued negatives to this query created much dissatisfaction and uneasiness among them, he at last, with a view to quieting the rising excitement, told them that he believed he had seen some Iroquois drowning in the lake. This was entirely to the liking of the allies, who from that time on acted as though assured of victory. The two parties finally met, not as anticipated in the village of the Iroquois, where the invaders expected to surprise them, but at a point which one authority thinks must have been Ticonderoga, while another locates it at Crown Point. The two parties came in view of one another in the evening, and, in consequence of the lateness of the hour, Champlain's allies did not land, but ranged their canoes side by side, at some distance from the shore; the craft being fastened together by poles so as to avoid drifting as much as possible, and for the additional reason, that such an arrangement would enable them, if necessary, to fight to better advantage. Thus they rested in security until the following morning, at which time, it had been mutually agreed, the battle should begin.

According to Charlevoix's account of the contest, the next morning at daybreak, Champlain placed the two Frenchmen who accompanied him and a number of Indians in the woods in order to effect a flank movement on the enemy. In his personal reminiscences, Champlain says that he and his Frenchmen were each in a canoe of the Montagnais, and that they landed in the morning. The enemy were some two hundred in number, being picked and determined warriors, whose endless successes in the field led them to imagine that the result would be short and altogether favorable to them. This proved a mistake, however, as in calculating their resources as compared with those of the Algonquins and Hurons, they had not taken into account the additional strength added to the latter in the persons of Champlain and his followers. Of the Indians, both sides were armed only with bows and arrows, and there was little doubt as to the ultimate outcome of the engagement, had it not been for the firearms carried by the French. These it was concluded to use against the chiefs of the Iroquois, of whom there were three, who were easily distinguishable from the others of the party by their adornments of birds' feathers or tails of larger size than those worn by the ordinary brave. According to our historian, the invaders made the first advances, leaving their entrenchments and moving some considerable distance[1] towards the Iroquois.

After traversing some two hundred yards, they divided into two bands, swinging to the right and left, respectively, and leaving the center open for the advance of Champlain, who thus took his position at the head of the party. In referring to this, he says: "Marching some twenty paces ahead, I was within thirty paces of the enemy when they perceived me and halted to regard me, and I them. As I saw them moving to fire at us, I raised my arquebuse and aimed directly at one of the three chiefs." The advance of Champlain evidently created no little excitement among the Iroquois, the character of his dress and style of arms being entirely new to them. Their surprise, however, was intensified to a boundless extent at the first report of his arquebuse, at which two of their chiefs fell dead and one dangerously wounded. This virtually ended the fight, throwing the enemy into a state of disorder from which they seemed entirely unable to recover. A pursuit followed, in which several of the Iroquois were killed and a number made prisoners.

It is here that we are brought into direct contact with the most undesirable characteristics of the natives, who, not satisfied with the sudden and bloodless victory on their part, and capture of extensive and valuable stores, were determined to work out the most inhuman and malign designs upon the unfortunate creatures who had fallen captives at their hands. After making some eight leagues on their return journey, the party came to a halt, and taking one of their captives from among the number, reproached him with the tortures he had inflicted on numerous of their tribes, told him to prepare for similar treatment at their hands, and sneeringly intimated that, provided he had sufficient courage to undergo the ordeal prepared for him, he would show it by singing. Cowardice is certainly not a prevailing characteristic of the Indian people, and although we are at times led to believe that a stolid indifference pervades to a great extent their marvelous will force in sustaining the tortures and indignities put upon them, there is a certain amount of manliness about their attitude at such times which appeals strongly to those who admire a valiant spirit, no matter how much the inspiration inducing such a condition may be at fault. No sooner had this suggestion been made than the captive, appreciating the inevitable, began by intoning his death chant, then his war song, and after that all others of a similar character that he knew. Death soon followed, his execution being attended with all of those horrors which pertained to human sacrifice among the aborigines. Nor did these barbarities cease even with death, for no sooner was the man dead than the Indians opened him, threw his entrails into the lake, cut off his head, arms and legs, which they scattered in every direction. All that they kept was the scalp, which they put with others captured under like circumstances, and the heart, which they cut into small pieces and gave to the prisoners to eat. Among these unfortunates was the dead man's own brother. The return of the war party was hastened by the dream of a Montagnais, in which he saw a determined party in pursuit. The flight was somewhat precipitous, but short intervals of rest being taken until they were far on their way towards home, and to all intents and purposes out of danger. Upon their return, the Algonquins remained at Quebec, the Hurons of the party returning home and the Montagnais going to Tadoussac, where soon after Champlain followed them. The general separation of the party took place at Chambly Rapids, from which point each went his own way. The reception given to the victors upon returning, by the people of their tribe, was most enthusiastic, the women in their eagerness jumping into the water and swimming out towards the approaching canoes. Here they secured from their warrior husbands the scalps of the enemy, with which they returned triumphant to the shore. Numerous presents were given by the Indians to Champlain, with the request that he show them to the King of France upon returning to his native country, for which he was about to sail. Failing to find a vessel for that purpose at Tadoussac, he went on to Quebec, where he soon after met Pontgrave.[1] Together these two embarked on September 5, 1609, the vessel in which they journeyed being in charge of Captain Pierre Chauvin of Dieppe. Upon arriving in France, Champlain met with a most flattering reception at the hands of the king, by whom he was given an audience, at Fontainebleau, whither he called him to render an accounting of his journeys and furnish a description, as far as his knowledge warranted, of the condition of affairs in New France.

It was at about this time that the name of Canada[1] was given to that territory.

For some time, de Monts had been making a final effort to recover the privileges formerly held by him under "letters-patent" from the French governor in New France. Particularly solicitous was he for the assistance and support of Madame de Guercheville, who had much influence in the quarter from which he desired to obtain favorable recognition. In this, however, he did not succeed, in spite of which his associates in the enterprise, Messieurs le Gendre and Collier, together with a number of others, still adhered to him, and as the settlement of Quebec had already been made in the name of their company, of which he was the recognized chief, he fitted out two vessels, giving the command of them to Champlain and de Pontgrave.

Here, then, Champlain's second expedition to the new continent began, as he and de Pontgrave embarked on this new enterprise at Honfleur on March 7, 1610. Almost immediately upon leaving, however, Champlain became seriously ill, as a result of which he had to be taken ashore. This, of course, created not a little delay, but having somewhat recovered, he at last weighed anchor on the 8th day of April, reaching Tadoussac on the 26th. Two days later he left that port, not, however, before reiterating his former promise to the Montagnais, that he would accompany them on another expedition against the Iroquois. To that end, indeed, they had waited for his return from France, and no sooner had they heard of his arrival at Quebec than they came to that place in a body to see him, and to urge an immediate advance into the enemy's country. Nor were the Algonquins behind in this matter, they also being in readiness and earnestly persistent in their request that he would neither cause nor sanction any unnecessary delay. The warriors of both tribes then started towards the Sorel River, where numerous other Indians had agreed to meet them for the purpose of accompanying the expedition. Soon after their departure, Champlain followed, but upon his arrival was disappointed, the number of warriors present being far less than what he had expected. Those who were present, however, were insistent upon an immediate advance, urging as their reason that a large party of Iroquois were then in the neighborhood, and that in order to surprise them an advance must immediately be made. To this undertaking he reluctantly consented, and at once set forth, accompanied by four Frenchmen, in the canoes of the natives, leaving the rest of his party to guard the vessel. On this venture they had gone but a short distance when seemingly for some altogether unaccountable reason, and without one word of warning, the Indians of the party sprang ashore, and without leaving guide or guard behind, disappeared at full speed into the woods. This left Champlain and his followers in a most undesirable and precarious condition, the country through which they were called upon to march being of a swampy and treacherous character, and entirely unknown to them. Thus, mile after mile, they traveled laboriously through the swampy ground, reaching far into the water at every step, and being driven almost to the point of distraction by myriads of mosquitoes and various other insects, which flew in clouds about them. Thus they journeyed without guide or path or compass by which to direct themselves until, when almost overcome by fatigue, they perceived a solitary Indian moving in the same direction, whom they begged to become their guide. But a short time after, an Algonquin chief came speeding back towards them, begging them to hasten as the war parties had already met and were engaged in desperate conflict. Upon arriving upon the scene of action, Champlain discovered the Iroquois in a strongly entrenched position, which the attacking party had attempted to force, only to be repulsed with considerable loss. Their courage, however, was revived at the sight of their French allies, in whose presence they renewed the struggle, which at once became furious. Hardly had Champlain reached the field when he was wounded by an arrow, and one of his men also received a slight injury in the arm. This did not prevent them, however, from keeping up a continuous fire upon the Iroquois, who, not yet having become accustomed to firearms, and the disastrous result attending their use, soon began to weaken, seeking shelter and safety by making a cautious retreat, and entrenching themselves in a less exposed and safer position. The Frenchmen had now expended all their ammunition, and the entire party under the direction of Champlain were about to charge upon the works of the enemy when a reinforcement of five or six of his comrades arrived on the scene of action. The battle was at once renewed, and resulted, as might be expected, in the almost utter annihilation of the Iroquois. The usual amount of savagery was displayed by the Hurons and Algonquins in celebrating this victory, as a result of which a number of unfortunate Iroquois were called upon to suffer the most horrible tortures. Some, however, were reserved for a better fate, among them being one given to Champlain by the Hurons. The Hurons on their departure for home also permitted a Frenchman to accompany them that he might learn more of the language and characteristics of the tribe. This, however, was only permitted on condition that a Huron should be allowed to accompany Champlain to France, from whence he might return with a fitting account of that kingdom to his people. During this same year—1611—Champlain did take a Huron with him, bringing him back at the time of his return voyage in the following spring. Champlain's return to France in 1611 was hastened by the death of the King, which event entirely ruined the interests of de Monts in New France. For one who had shown so much enterprise in the advancement of French interests in the new territory, this indeed seemed but a poor return; for, with the death of his master, the King, his credit entirely ceased, and, as a result, he was absolutely unable to carry matters any further. In this most unhappy condition he turned to his friend, Champlain, begging of him that assistance and support which his former attitude as counselor and friend warranted him in expecting. This was but a fitting tribute to Champlain and his sterling qualities as a friend, for throughout de Monts' accumulating difficulties he had never forsaken him, but, on the contrary, had on all occasions maintained a courageous front, with a view to securing, as soon as possible, a more powerful protector for his interests. Hoping to renew those favorable opportunities, which had been, to such a considerable extent, already advanced, and to lose which would mean utter and absolute ruin, Champlain applied in behalf of his friend to Charles de Bourbon, Comte de Souissons, by whom he was courteously and favorably received. As a result of this meeting, the Comte interested himself in the undertaking to the extent of obtaining from the Queen Regent all the necessary authority to perpetuate and improve what had already been done, and appointed Champlain his representative in the matter, for which purpose he gave him full and unrestrained power. It was not long after this very satisfactory arrangement had been effected that the Comte de Souissons died, the result being that the affairs of the colony and interests of de Monts were again, for the time being, jeopardized to a considerable extent. Fortunately for the further and ultimate success of the undertaking, the Prince de Conde accepted the position thus made vacant, retaining Champlain in the office to which he had been appointed by his predecessor. The appointment of the Prince as viceroy was made on November 20, 1612, while the new commission issued by him to Champlain bears the date of November 22 of the same year. Of this authority

Champlain was unable to avail himself during the entire year of 1612, owing to certain difficulties in regard to trade, which were attributable to the unhappy differences existing between the merchants of St. Malo and the government of the colony. It was therefore not until the 6th of March in the following year that he embarked in a vessel commanded by his former associate, Pontgrave, which had just completed the return journey from Acadia. On that day, they sailed together, reaching their destination, Quebec, on May 7th. Finding everything at the settlement in a thoroughly satisfactory condition, they, without further delay, ascended the coast to Montreal, from whence, after a brief stay, Pontgrave descended to Quebec while Champlain made a journey of investigation along the Ottawa River as far as the Algonquins de l'Isle, at that time commanded by Tessouat. He then rejoined Pontgrave[1] at Quebec, when both embarked for St. Malo, reaching that port on the 1st day of August, 1614.

During this visit to his native country he effected an arrangement with the merchants of St. Malo, Rouen and Rochelle, the same being confirmed by the Prince de Conde. It was at this time, when the commercial interests of the colony had fallen into the hands of such wise and wealthy people, and when everything pointed towards a state of general prosperity and ultimate success, that the opinion was promulgated among those who had the welfare of the settlement at heart that it would be both wise and expedient to devote some attention to the spiritual interests of the colonists. This suggestion came from Champlain, who, possibly more than any other, was in a position to judge of the necessity for such an arrangement. He therefore asked and obtained four Recollects, whom the Company which he represented supplied with all of the necessary requisites for their care and comfort. Under the guidance then of Champlain, they left their native country for the New World, arriving at Tadoussac on March 25, 1615. There they stayed for a short time, continuing their journey within a few days, and soon after reaching Quebec from which point Champlain immediately proceeded to Montreal.[2]

Upon arriving at Montreal, Champlain found a number of Hurons with a few others from the allied tribes, who together induced him to undertake still a third expedition with them against the Iroquois. Of this he says: "The Sieur du Pont and I considered that it was very necessary to assist them, both to oblige them more to love us, and to facilitate my enterprises and discoveries, which to appearances could not be made but by their means, and also that this would be a road and preparation to come to Christianity." By this means, it is believed, he obtained a better and more general knowledge of the country, which evidently proved of much advantage to the business relations which they desired to establish; besides which they offered an opportunity for the introduction of Christianity among a great many of the tribes, whose religions were composed entirely of superstitious rites and idolatry. But there was another side to this question, to be found in the growing want of respect shown to him by a people whom he was supposed to command, but who, in gaining such ready acquiescence to all of their demands made upon him, showed but little regard for his proper rank and position; besides, as the representative of the viceroy, he had duties of far more importance pressing upon him than to be traversing the country with a lot of wild and discourteous people, who regarded him more as a pliant tool than an exalted and saving medium. So far did these people forget the duty due his authority that they even failed in fulfilling their obligation to meet his party for departure to Quebec, but set out with a number of Frenchmen who had remained at Montreal and Father l'Caron, the latter wishing, by thus accompanying them, to familiarize himself with the mode of life among the people to whom he proposed introducing the Christian religion. Champlain's mistake was in not effecting immediate retaliation in the same form as the insult had been given. To the Indians, an act effected from virtuous motives is entirely lost, and to them no creed of respect is known saving that which is compelled by main force or similar means. To run after these people, after they had violated their word and deliberately left him, was therefore a weak and most injudicious act on the part of Champlain, although it is assumed that his principal reason for doing so was his fear that the priest who accompanied them might suffer as a consequence. He therefore, as soon as possible, started in pursuit of them, accompanied by two Frenchmen and a few Indians whom he found still waiting on his arrival at Montreal. By making long and arduous marches, he finally succeeded in overtaking the Hurons at their village of Otoucha—probably Touache—where he arrived August 1st by way of the Ottawa River and Lake Nipissing. Here he came upon them in the act of forming a large war party, which he was solicited to command. This charge he accepted and without further or unnecessary delay they marched towards the country of the Iroquois. To do this, they

(1). Here again we discover somewhat of a misunderstanding, as Champlain in his report of this voyage does not mention his association with Pontgrave at that time. It is further stated that he embarked near Sault St. Louis, June 27th in the ship of de Maisonneur, and reached St. Malo, August 26th.

(2). According to other authorities this company of missionary priests, consisting of Father Dennis Jamay, commissary, Fathers John d'Olveau and Jos. l'Caron with two Brothers, Pacificus and de Plessis, sailed from Honfleur April 24th and arrived at their destination on May 25, 1615. It is also stated that Champlain did not leave Quebec for Montreal by the first boats, but tarried at the former place for a short period, while Father l'Caron went up immediately to Riviere des Prairies and said the first Mass offered up in Canada on June 24th.

crossed the River Severn near its mouth, went up Lake Simcoe and Talbot River, and thence by a portage passed to Balsam Lake, and descended the chain of lakes and the Otonabee and Trent to Quinte Bay, where they reached Lake Ontario (Lac des Entouohonorons), in view of the Thousand Isles. They found the enemy well entrenched, and difficult to approach, for besides occupying a kind of fort, which was well and solidly constructed, they had taken the precaution to obstruct the approaches by a great abatis of trees and had also raised galleries around from which they could fire down upon the approaching enemy without having to expose themselves. The result of all this was that the first attacks were so far from being successful that it was deemed inadvisable to venture a second. After a while an attempt was made to gain entrance to this stronghold by setting fire to the obstructions, the idea being that it would sweep all before it, and clear a thoroughfare for the advance of the attacking forces. This undertaking, however, was defeated owing to the fact that the besieged had provided for such an attempt by having at hand a large supply of water. The Hurons then arranged a platform higher than those occupied by the Iroquois, on which the French arquebusiers were stationed. This was a stratagem of great value to the invading party, and would have succeeded to a considerable extent in thinning the enemy's ranks, had the Hurons done as they should have. Their numerical strength, however, made them unruly and presumptuous so that at no time during the engagement was Champlain able to control their actions. In addition to this, he had received a severe wound in the leg, which had such a depressing influence upon his native forces that they, instead of being victorious, were compelled to withdraw from the contest with heavy losses. Fortunately, Champlain soon recovered from his injury, but when prepared to start on his return journey to Quebec, met with a positive refusal from the Indians to furnish him with a guide, as they had promised. He was therefore compelled to remain during the winter among these people, which time he used to good advantage by visiting most of the Huron towns, and a number of those in which resided the Algonquins, which were located near to Lake Nipissing. He also succeeded in bringing into more friendly relations the Hurons and some of the neighboring nations. When the following spring arrived, being still unable to obtain the requisite guide, and learning also that the Hurons contemplated commanding his services as leader of another expedition against the Iroquois, he secretly embarked with Father l'Caron and a few friendly Indians, arriving at Quebec, July 11, 1616. During the months spent among the Hurons, the Reverend Father had also accomplished much good—journeying from village to village, becoming acquainted with the people, studying the language and formulating plans for the establishment of missions among the tribes.

After spending less than a month at Quebec, Champlain and Father l'Caron accompanied the Superior of the mission on the return journey to France, embarking with that intent on July 20, and reaching the end of their journey, Honfleur, on September 10, 1616. This left but one priest, Father d'Olbeau, and Brother Pacificus, the latter having been appointed as instructor to the children of the French and Indians, who had established themselves at Three Rivers. It was his good fortune, during the following year, to render an eminent service to the residents of the colony. It would appear that the allied Indians, having for some unaccountable reason become discontented, had plotted to do away with the entire French population. This, it is supposed, was brought about through their fear of some revenge, which they expected Champlain would wreak upon them on his return from France, as retaliation for the death of a couple of settlers, whom they had murdered. One of these, a locksmith, and Charles Pillet were killed in the month of April, 1617, the trouble arising out of the fact that the former had severely beaten an Indian. Having determined to annihilate the colony, eight hundred of the Indians gathered at Three Rivers, where they proceeded to devise the proper means for effecting their purpose. Of this fact and purpose, Brother Pacificus was warned, and through means of that knowledge, he was fortunately enabled to bring about a reconciliation between the offending tribe and the commandant. Champlain, however, remained persistent in his demand that the murderers be given up to justice. As a compromise, they sent him one of them with a quantity of furs, which were supposed to represent indemnity for the other. The Indians also gave two of their chiefs as hostages. After this, Champlain employed the major portion of his time in journeying to and fro between Quebec and France in order to obtain supplies for the colony, which however, were but seldom furnished in such quantities as were really required. On one of these journeys, he left Quebec on July 26, 1618, reaching Honfleur on the 28th of the following month. On this occasion, he was accompanied by the Recollects, Paul and Pacificus. Unfortunately for the welfare and rapid progress of the struggling colony, the court of France took but little, if any, interest in that new acquisition, and by leaving it in the hands of narrow-minded and prejudiced individuals, whose broadest views for its advantage were prescribed by the narrow limits of trade, left but small hope indeed, for its immediate benefit. The viceroy, Prince de Conde, was of the opinion that he had done his share towards its advancement, by lending to the undertaking the prestige of his name, besides which, the troubles arising in the regency, which at that time cost him his liberty, and the numerous intrigues set on foot to deprive him of his title of viceroy and the effort to annul the commission of Marshal de Themines, by whom he was arrested at the Louvre in September, 1616, and to whom he had entrusted Canada during his three years of imprisonment at Vincennes, brought about an untoward condition of affairs which threatened annihilation to the little settlement. There was also a marked lack of unison among the commercial element, whose petty jealousies added still another warring factor to the interests of the colony; but in spite of these seemingly increasing obstacles, Champlain persisted manfully in his life's work, expending his entire time and energies in behalf of those, who had trusted to his ability to see their interests properly guarded and cared for, and without one thought to selfish or personal advantage. Still another change was effected in the condition of affairs, when in 1620, Prince de Conde transferred his rights and title as viceroy to his brother-in-law, Marshal de Montmorency. This nobleman, whose title was that of Duke de Montmorency, and who held a position as marshal until 1624, was the one who joined Gaston in his revolt against Louis XIII., and was finally taken at the battle of Castelnaudary and executed October 30, 1632. The new viceroy also secured the services of Champlain as manager of the colony. It was at that time, when this indefatigable worker had at last become convinced, by the general improvement in the surrounding conditions, that there was absolutely a future for New France, that he moved his family to the colony. Upon his arrival at Tadoussac in May, 1632, he found the traders of Rochelle selling firearms and ammunition to the savages against the express commands of the King. This materially added to the dangers and misgivings of the colonists, and it was within a year from the time of this breach of confidence as well as of the law, that the Iroquois made their way with arms into the very center of the settlement. They too, seemingly had their fears, believing that with an increase of French settlers, the Hurons and Algonquins would again overrun and devastate their country. They consequently decided to do away with the French before, by fortifying and otherwise formally establishing themselves, it would be a matter of impossibility to do so. Three war parties were therefore raised, it being arranged that they first should march towards Sault St. Louis, where they found a number of Frenchmen guarding the passage. These, however, though few in number, with the aid of some Indians repulsed the enemy, a number of the latter being killed, while some remained prisoners. Those who escaped succeeded in carrying with them the Recollect Father William Poulain, upon learning which the French immediately gave chase. Being unable to overtake the escaping party, those in pursuit released one of their prisoners, authorizing him to propose the exchange of the missionary for one of their chiefs. Fortunately, the man arrived in time to do so, although preparations for burning the captive were well under way. The proposition made by the French was favorably received, and the exchange as proposed effected. Another of the Iroquois expeditions approached Quebec in canoes, advancing up the St. Charles River with a view to investing the Recollect Convent. Here they fell in with a small party of Hurons, several of whom they burned, but after committing numerous other outrages in the vicinity they withdrew without making any further attempt to molest the convent. Of the third party no accounting is given, although it is understood that they started out upon the same errand. Realizing the dangerous situation in which he was placed and his inability to cope with these Indians, Champlain applied to the King of France and Duke de Montmorency for relief, citing as his necessity for doing so the disregard shown to all similar requests made by him to the company. On this purpose bent, he deputed Father George le Baillif to call upon and lay that matter before the King. Father Bailiff was well received at court, and, what is better still, obtained all of the concessions for which he applied in behalf of the colony. The first move to effect a new and more satisfactory condition of affairs was to suppress the original company, in lieu of which was formed one called the Montmorency Company, which consisted of William and Ezechial de Caen and William Robin, merchants; Francis de Troyes, President of the Treasurers of France, at Orleans; Jacques de Troyes, merchant; Claude le Ragois, Arnould de Novveau, Pierre de Verton and Francis Herve. Of this new arrangement, Champlain was informed by a letter from the viceroy. But with its seemingly increasing advantages, the colony took on anything but a sturdy growth, and in 1622 we find it consisting of but fifty souls, including women and children. The buildings of the settlement at this time consisted of a small fort, a merchant's house, a house owned by one widow Herbert and a small convent. Business also was extremely light, although quite a satisfactory trade was carried on at Tadoussac, while another trading post was in operation at Three Rivers, which lay some twenty-five leagues beyond Quebec. It was at about this time that the Sieur de Pontgrave, who had been an active co-worker with Champlain, was placed in charge of the interests of William de Caen, of the new company, whose health compelled his immediate return to France. It was during the same year, 1623, that Champlain was warned that the Hurons were considering the project of abandoning their alliance with the French and joining forces with the Iroquois. In consequence of this undesirable trend of affairs, he sent among them Father l'Caron, who was accompanied by Father Nicholas Viel and Brother Gabriel Saghardt, both of whom had but recently arrived from France. During the next year, extra precautions were taken by the commandant, who built a commodious stone fort at Quebec. Immediately after the completion of that building, he once more returned to France with his family, finding upon his arrival that the viceroy had about completed a sale of his rights and privileges to his nephew, Henry de'Levy, Duke de Ventadour, to whom a patent was granted in March, 1625. The new viceroy had sometime previously withdrawn from the court, and had taken holy orders, so that this undertaking upon his part was far from being caused by any desire for the renewal of his acquaintance with worldly affairs, but rather for the purpose of carrying spiritual consolation to the Indians, and effecting their conversion. To that end, he laid the matter before the King, who readily assented to the proposition, the more willingly perhaps as it coincided with the express wishes of the Recollect Fathers.

Five Jesuits and a Recollect Father embark in charge of William de Caen for Quebec.—Prejudice of Settlers against the former due to Calvinistic Influences.—First Home of the Missionaries.—Fathers de Daillon and Brebeuf go to Three Rivers.—Death of Recollect Father Nicholas Viel.—The Missionary Force is strengthened.—Deplorable Condition of the Colony.—A New Company is formed and Charter obtained.—The King's Grants.—An Unfortunate Contretemps.—The English advance on Quebec.—De Roquemont's Error.—Starving Condition of the Settlers.—Surrender of Quebec.—The English assume Possession of the Colony.—The French take their Departure.—Treaty between France and England.—Michel's Awful Death.—Champlain's Return to France. Richelieu's Peremptory Demands.—New France is restored to the French.

THE succession of Henry de Levi to the vice-royalty of the colony, the earnest and expressed effort on the part of Champlain, and the ready acquiescence of the Recollects, brought about the first concurrent effort for the spiritual welfare of the colonists and the evangelization of the savages. Immediate action was therefore taken to the end of at once carrying out the plans adopted for that purpose, and Father Charles Lallemont, Father Enemond Masse and Father John de Brebeuf, with two lay brothers, were assigned to the Mission. It was in the year 1625, all of the necessary preparations having been made, that these five Jesuits, accompanied by the Recollect Father Joseph de Daillon, and in charge of William de Caen, embarked for Quebec. In spite of the seeming willingness of the Recollect Fathers that the work inaugurated by them should be divided with the Jesuits, there appears to have been some misgivings on the part of those by whom the latter were sent. That this was not altogether uncalled for, was quickly evidenced in the reception given to the Jesuit Fathers on their arrival at Quebec.

The people of that settlement had become violently prejudiced against the Order, which unhappy condition was largely, if not wholly, due to the circulation of stories current among the Calvinists in France at that time. Fortunately, however, for the welfare of the Jesuits, as well as for the cause of religion, these unfavorable impressions were soon effaced, the people assuming a most friendly position toward them. Upon their arrival at Quebec the Jesuit Fathers were located in a house provided for them by the Recollects, which was situated at a distance of a quarter of a league from the town and on the St. Charles River. In this place they are said to have lived for two years, but a little while after effecting a settlement in Quebec, Fathers de Daillon and de Brebeuf started on a journey to Three Rivers, their object being to visit the country of the Hurons, among whom it was their intention to spend some considerable time. On their way there they fell in with a party of that tribe who at once offered to act as their guides. At this identical time, when about ready to continue their journey under guidance of the Indians, they received news which impelled them to immediately return to the settlement. It would seem that the Recollect Father Nicholas Viel, after nearly two years of persistent labor among the Hurons, determined to return to Quebec in order that he might obtain some much-needed rest. Making known his desire, he was at once offered the opportunity of accompanying a number of the tribe who were then preparing to make the same journey. On this occasion, in place of following the route usually taken, they traversed a channel called Riviere des Prairies, which separates Montreal Island and Island Jesus. Instead of avoiding the dangerous rapid which is located about midway in the channel, by making a portage, they endeavored to shoot it with their canoe. In making this attempt the canoe capsized and Father Viel, with another of the company, a young convert, were drowned. from the date of that occurrence the rapid has always been known as Sault au Recollect (Recollects' rapid), which name pertains to the present day. There was a strong suspicion at that time, and it may well be said to have continued to the present, that the accident was not altogether unpremeditated, but had been brought about by some of the party who were ill disposed toward the Missionary. This belief was emphasized by the fact that all of the Hurons escaped and that the personal effects of the priest were seized by and divided among them. This was the cause then, and a very reasonable one, too, that aroused the objection to an immediate departure by Fathers de Daillon and de Brebeuf for the Huron country.

About a year after the arrival of de Caen and his party of Jesuits at Quebec, Fathers Philibert Noyrot and Anne de Noue and a brother also arrived at that place in a small vessel which they had chartered for the puprose at their own expense. With them they brought twenty mechanics, which enabled the people of Quebec to improve their residences and strengthen and fortify the town. These improvements were of great importance and value to the place, as prior to that time it had been unprovided with most of the essentials for either comfort or safety. In carrying out the extensive design for their additional comfort, the people of the colony were largely aided by Father Masse, whose experience and talent proved of unusual value; but even here, while working assiduously for the benefit of the colonists, he found an undercurrent of opposition, which, unless eradicated, was bound to prove fatal to the interests of the settlement. The Indians, too, caused great alarm and continued uneasiness. Colonists were slain by them with impunity, the numerically weak condition of the settlers making it impossible for them to demand or obtain redress. This seeming lack of nerve or moral force upon their part induced the savages to believe that they had nothing to fear from that source, and as a result the lives of the settlers were in constant peril.

After a somewhat extended visit to his native country Champlain returned to Quebec, where he found upon his arrival, that the affairs of the colony had fallen into a most unsatisfactory condition. Everything, in fact, appeared to be at a standstill; the buildings begun before his departure being in about the same condition as when he left them, while the lands which had long since been cleared and prepared for planting, remained uncultivated and unproductive. So it would seem that the new company of which the de Caens had been the originators and were the moving spirit, was lacking as an organization in many of the most important essentials, for while the leaders evidently lacked in that forceful and energetic spirit which success on such occasions of necessity requires, the other partners became wholly engrossed in the profits to be derived from the fur trade and other commercial pursuits, totally ignoring the settlers either as regards their temporal or spiritual condition. Thus under these depressing circumstances the colony had fallen into a most wretched condition and it became evident that, were not heroic methods applied and important action taken for its betterment, the direst results might be looked for. The matter as it stood was therefore laid before the King's council, and so palpable was the urgency of the request that that body interested Cardinal Richelieu in the matter and induced him to place the management of the commerce of New France in other hands. At the same time it was also urged that a company of one hundred members (to be called Morbihan Company) be formed for that purpose. The scheme, we are given to understand, was a most excellent one, and had the project been carried into active effect would have doubtless made of New France one of the most powerful and successful colonies in America. The plan for the organizing of this company which was presented to the Cardinal by Messieurs de Rouquemont, Houel, de Lattaignant, Dablon, du Chesne and Castillon, agreed: First—"That in the ensuing year, 1628, the associates would send over to New France two or three hundred mechanics, of all trades, and before the year 1643 they promised to increase the number of inhabitants to sixteen thousand; to lodge, support and supply them with everything for three years; then to assign them as much cleared land as would be necessary for their support, and to furnish grain to sow. Second—That the settlers should be native born Frenchmen and Catholics, and that care should be taken that no foreigners or heretics entered the country. Third—That in each settlement there should be at least three priests, whom the company undertook to supply absolutely with all required for themselves in person or their ministry for fifteen years, after which they might subsist by means of the cleared lands assigned to them." As a matter of compensation for all such expenses thus incurred, First—the King on his part assigned to the members and their representatives forever the fort and habitation of Quebec; "all the country in New France, including Florida, which his majesty's predecessors had settled, all the course of the great river and the streams emptying into it, or which in that extent of country reached to the sea[1]; the islands, ports, harbors, mines, according to the ordinance, fisheries, etc.; his majesty reserving only the right of fealty and homage, with a gold crown of eight marks' weight at each change of King, and support of the officers and supreme justices, to be named and presented by the said company when it should be deemed proper to establish them; power to cast cannon, build fortified places, forge all kinds of arms, offensive and defensive, and aid generally everything for the safety of the country and preservation of the trade. Second—His majesty conceded to them the right to grant lands in such quantity as they deemed expedient; to give them such title, honors, rights and powers as they chose, according to the qualities, condition and merits of the person, with such charges, reservations and conditions as should be deemed just; but that in case of the erection to duchies, marquisates, courtships and baronages, letters of confirmation should be taken out from the King on the presentation of Cardinal de Richelieu, grand master, chief and superintendent of the trade and commerce of France. Third—That the company might enjoy, fully and peaceably, what was granted to them, his majesty revoked all concessions made of said lands, patents or portions thereof; he granted to the company in perpetuity the trade in leather, skins and furs; and for fifteen years only—commencing January 21, 1628, to the last of December, 1643—all other trade by land or sea, made in any manner whatever, in the extent of said country and as far as it might extend, excepting only the cod and whale fisheries, which his majesty wished to be free to all his subjects; revoking all conflicting concessions and especially the article granted to William de Caen, interdicting for the said time all trade granted to the said de Caen and his associates or others, under penalty of confiscation of the vessels and the goods to the profit of the company, unless Cardinal de Richelieu should give leave, passport or permission to any one of all the places mentioned. Fourth—The King intended, nevertheless, that the French settled in the same parts, who were neither supported nor maintained at the expense of the company, should be at full liberty to trade with the Indians for furs on condition that they sold their beaver skins only to the factors of the company, who should be obliged to buy them at forty sous tournois a skin, if good and well conditioned, with a prohibition against their selling to others under pain of confiscation. Fifth—The King agreed to present to the company two ships of war of two or three hundred tons each, but without supplies; that if these vessels should in any way whatever be lost, the company should replace them at its own expense, except in case of their being taken by the King's enemies in open war. Sixth—In case the company failed to send over in the first ten years fifteen hundred French of both sexes, it was agreed that it should refund to his majesty the estimated cost of the outfit of the two ships of war; and that if in the remaining years it again failed to send over the stipulated number of men and women, except in case of capture of ships by the enemy, the company was to make the same restitution, and be deprived of the trade granted it by the present articles. Seventh—The King permitted it to embark on the said vessel such captains, soldiers and sailors as it chose; on condition, however, that the captains on its recommendation should take their commissions or authority from his majesty, as should, too, the commandants of posts and forts already erected or to erect in the extent of the countries granted. As to the other vessels employed by the company, they might give command to such persons as they deemed proper, in the usual manner. His majesty also gave the company four bronze culverins heretofore granted to the Molucca Company."

The King did not limit his favors and precautions here, but to induce his subjects to emigrate to New France and to establish all kinds of manufacture there, he still further declared: First—"That all those mechanics whom the company agreed to send over should be reputed master mechanics, if they chose to return after plying their trade and business there for six years, and should be privileged to keep open shop in Paris and other cities on their bringing back authentic certificates of their service; and for this purpose there should annually, at each embarkation, be filed in the office of the Admiralty a list of those sent to New France by the company. Second—That goods of whatever quality, coming from said countries, and especially those manufactured there, would be the fruits of French industry, they should for fifteen years be free from all imposts and subsidies, although transported and sold in the kingdom; that likewise all munitions of war, provisions and other necessaries for victualing and embarking, to be made for New France, should enjoy the same exemptions and franchises during the said term of fifteen years. Third—That it should be lawful for all persons, of any rank whatever—ecclesiastics, nobles, officers, and others—to enter the said company without compromising the privileges granted to their orders; that those of the company might, at their discretion, admit to the association those who presented themselves; that if any were not noble by extraction, his majesty would ennoble to the number of twelve, who should thereafter enjoy all privileges of nobility, which should descend to their children born or to be born in lawful wedlock; that for this purpose his majesty would furnish the said associates twelve patents of nobility, signed, sealed and issued with names in blank, to be filed with those of the said twelve said associates, and that these letters patent should be distributed by the Cardinal Grand Master to those who should be presented by the company. Fourth—That the descendants of the French settled in said country and the Indians who should be brought to the knowledge of the faith, and make profession thereof, should be deemed and reputed native Frenchmen, and as such should be allowed to come and reside in France, at their option, and there acquire, dispose by will and take by devise, bequest and gift in the same manner as real natives of the kingdom and Frenchmen born, without being held to take out any letters of declaration or naturalization."

It would also appear that the King had pledged himself in case any marked disturbance, civil or foreign, should occur to prevent the carrying out or the fulfillment of his promises to grant to the company a similar or sufficient delay with which to meet or overcome such exigencies. He further agreed "to show and ratify in the proper office all letters necessary for the common execution of the preceding articles, and in case of opposition to their verification his majesty reserved cognizance thereof to himself."

The King also agreed that if in course of time the company found it necessary to expend or amplify any of the articles or aid any one, relief would be afforded according to the necessity or requirements of the case. It was also agreed that the company should be at liberty to draw up such articles of association, "rules and ordinances as they deemed necessary for the maintenance of their society; which articles, rules and ordinances being approved by the grand master, authorized by his majesty and duly registered, should thereafter be observed according to their form and tenor, as well by the said company as by those already settled or to settle thereafter in New France."

The foregoing articles were signed by Cardinal Richelieu on April 19, 1627, at which time also those who were responsible for the project attached their signatures. These articles were duly approved by the King in an edict given during the following month at Rochelle, which gives more fully and completely the details of the understanding than the statement heretofore presented. On the completion of these arrangements the Duke de Ventadour resigned his vice-regal authority.

Of the new company when formed there were one hundred and seven members, among whom were Cardinal Richelieu, Marshal Defiat, Commander de Razilli, de Champlain, the Abbe de la Magdelaine, and others, among them being a number of wealthy and influential merchants of Paris and other commercial cities. The arrangements in fact as to membership and detail were so satisfactory that it was hoped and seemed entirely probable that the company of New France, as it was finally decided to designate it, would not only maintain and improve these possessions in the commercial interests of France, but aid also in strengthening and ultimately establishing the success of the colony itself.

An unfortunate contretemps occurred at this time, which threatened to an alarming extent the welfare of the new enterprise. France was at that particular moment embroiled with the English, who were consequently awaiting the first feasible opportunity to retaliate with effect. This was furnished in the siege of la Rochelle, which afforded the necessary pretext for commencing open hostilities. To this end, they captured the first vessels sent by the French Company to America. Another source of disconifort was caused by one David Kertk[1] (by some called Kerque and Kyrcke), who was born at Dieppe, his father being a Scotchman. This man, it is claimed, became offensively aggressive to the interests of the colony at the instigation of William de Caen, who thought it an admirable opportunity to obtain revenge for the loss of his rights and privileges under the new arrangement. Accompanied by a large party, Kertk landed in the colony, which he at once proceeded to invest, penetrating as far as Tadoussac, from which point he sent out a formidable party to burn the buildings and kill the cattle at Cape Tourmente[2].

It is further stated that the man placed in charge of this expedition was instructed by Kertk—after completing his depredations at the Cape—to advance on Quebec and demand the surrender of that fort.

The attempt was actually made, Champlain and de Pontgrave, who had recently returned from a visit to France in the interests of de Monts, being personally in charge of the colony when the leader of the investing party made the demand. A meeting of the residents was at once called, and after careful and mature deliberation on their part, it was decided to make a vigorous defense. Encouraged by such unanimous support on the part of the people, Champlain answered the summons in such a bold and positive manner that the commander of the expedition concluded it most prudent to withdraw his forces. At this time the colony was in a most pitiable condition, being reduced to an allowance not exceeding seven ounces of bread for each person a day. The supply of ammunition was also reduced to a minimum, there not being to exceed five pounds of powder in the magazine when the summons for surrender was made. Of course, the invading party were entirely unacquainted with this state of affairs, or the result of the expedition might have been far different from what it was. When, however, the commander of the party reported to Kertk, the latter, believing that the conditions at Quebec were far more favorable than they really were, thought to obtain a more bloodless success

(1). David, Lewis, and Thomas were the sons of Jedvase (or Jervis) Kertk, who was born in 1568 in Derbyshire, England, the eldest son of a gentleman's family; later he became a merchant in London. In 1596 he married Elizabeth Goudon of Dieppe, by whom he had seven children. His sons, David, Lewis and Thomas, were aged respectively thirty-two, thirty, and twenty-six years, at the time Quebec was taken. They were all prominent members of the Merchant Adventurers of Canada. Jervase died December 17, 1629. David was knighted by Charles I., in 1633, as a reward for his services in taking Quebec, but (according to H. Kirk) neither he nor his heirs received any pecuniary recompense for the heavy losses he incurred in that enterprise, although in the negotiations for the restitution of Canada, the French king had agreed to pay the sum of 82,700 livres to Kirk. Brymner (Can. Archives, 1894, pp. viii-x) gives a document (probably 1693) detailing the claims of the Kirks to the territories of Nova Scotia and Quebec.

A colony had been established in Newfoundland in 1621, by George Lord Baltimore, who received from James I. a large tract of land in the southeastern part extending westward to Placentia Bay, which he named Avalon; but he abandoned it in 1629. The grant of the whole island was made by Charles I., Nov. 13, 1637, to the Duke of Hamilton, Sir David Kirk, and others, and Kirk, who after a few years became the sole owner of Newfoundland, continued as its ruler until his death (about 1653). He did much to develop the resources of the island—encouraging emigration, opening the fisheries to other nations as well as to the English, and protecting the industry.

As the Kirk family were devoted Loyalists, they suffered many losses under the Commonwealth, and Sir David's property was for some time sequestrated as that of a malignant. Finally, in 1660, his heirs were obliged to yield possession of Newfoundland to Cecil Lord Baltimore who claimed it under the grant made to his father.

A daughter of David Kirk became the second wife of Pierre Radison, the Hudson Bay explorer.—Thwaites, in notes to Vol. V. of the Jesuite Relations.

The name Kirk or Kertk, as used in the present work, is variously spelled Ker, Kerk, Kirke, Kyrck, Kirtk, Kyrcke, Kerque, Quer, Querch, Querq.

(2). Writers differ in regard to this, as neither Sagard nor Champlain charged de Caen as accessory to the raid, while Faillon offers a vigorous defense in his behalf.

capturing the fleet, which he learned had just been ted by the new company for the colony. These ves-were in the command of M. de Roquemont, in se care had been placed a number of families and a ntity of supplies for Quebec. Having arrived at the dstead called Gaste, which virtually marked the termi-ion of his voyage, de Roquemont sent a boat to Cham-in, notifying him of the acquisitions he was bringing the settlement, and sending to him the King's patent ating him Governor and Lieutenant-General for e entire territory comprising New France, with ders to take a careful inventory of all effects and operties belonging to the Sieur de Caen. Before sufficient time had elapsed for the messenger to return, de Roquemont learned of the approach of Kertk. It was here that he evinced that indiscretion which resulted so disastrously to the interests of the fleet entrusted to his care, the settlement at Quebec and colony in general, for instead, as he should have done, of avoiding a meeting with the English forces, he immediately weighed anchor and went to meet them. This was certainly a most unadvisable move, against which his better judgment should have warned him. Even had the number of the forces and armament warranted him in seeking a contest, the condition of his vessels, which were heavily laden, and therefore cumbersome to handle, should have forbidden any such attempt. The result of the meeting was inevitable. The English, under the skillful direction of their commander, and with vessels in every manner better prepared for such a purpose, maneuvered easily and rapidly around the French, harassing and crippling them to such an extent that they were soon compelled to surrender. Thus, through a piece of thoughtlessness and unnecessary bravado on the part of de Roquemont, the suffering colonists were despoiled of the absolute necessaries of life. To add to these difficulties, the harvest had yielded scant returns, and the general prospects for obtaining the barest sustenance were exceedingly gloomy. There was nothing, in fact, to prevent the people of the settlement from giving way to utter despair, save for the uncertain yield afforded by the eel fishery, and a few elk which were occasionally brought to Quebec by Indian hunters. The people were really in a most desperate condition, as there remained but one chance of their obtaining the assistance so much needed to save them from absolute starvation. Their entire hopes, therefore, were centered in Father Philibert Noyrot, Superior of the Jesuits, and Father Charles Lallemont, who had gone to France for succor. Fortunately, they were successful in that undertaking, procuring sufficient means with which to engage a vessel and load it with provisions. In this vessel, also, embarked Father Alexander de Vieuxpont and a brother named Louis Malot. Here again disaster followed, for the vessel intended for Quebec was driven by a southeast wind upon the coast of Acadia, where it became a total wreck. Father Noyrot and Brother Malot were drowned at this time, but Father Vieuxpont succeeded in escaping and finally joined Father Vimond on the Island of Cape Breton.
Father Lallemont also escaped and at once embarked in a Biscayan vessel, to bear news of the disaster to France, but was again wrecked near San Sebastian.
Thus the colonists were compelled to struggle along, waiting and hoping in vain for the barest necessities with which to keep body and soul together. Nor was this all with which they had to contend, for the Indians, noticing the strength and prestige gained by the English, slowly but surely became alienated from their French allies. There were also internal disruptions, which added still further to the general unhappy condition of affairs, caused by a division of feeling between the Huguenots and others, the former, who had come over with the expedition headed by Sieur de Caen, being anything but loyal to the state government, then in charge of Champlain.

With seemingly no hope for relief, and being without knowledge of any further effort to be made in their behalf, Champlain strongly advised another expedition against the Iroquois, in whose country, he was of the opinion, at least a living could be obtained. The aggressive attitude of these Indians for sometime past gave ample grounds for, and warranted the undertaking of such an expedition, the only objection to the immediate adoption of the idea being the scarcity of powder. This necessitated a delay, during which time notice was received of the return of the English expedition. This was towards the end of July, at which time the provisions of the colonists had entirely failed. While in this condition, word was brought to Champlain that the English vessels had been sighted near Pointe de Levi.
Their arrival at that time was looked upon by him more as a deliverance than an occurrence to be regretted, as owing to the prevailing condition of affairs in the colony, it meant absolute salvation. A short time afterward, a boat landed, the officer in charge presenting to Champlain a letter from Louis and Thomas Kertk, brothers of Admiral David Kertk, who had arrived in command of a part of the English fleet, which had left Gravesend for New France on March 26, 1629. The letter, though courteous, contained a summons to an unconditional surrender, and further stated that they were aware of the sad condition of the colony, which informa tion they had obtained from Sieur Boule, brother-in-law of Champlain, whom the Governor had sent to the company in France for aid, but who had unfortunately fallen into the hands of the Englishmen. To these demands for surrender, Champlain was compelled to agree, the conditions of the same being, as follows: "First—That before any further steps, the Messieurs Kertk should show their commission from the King of Great Britain, and a power from their brother, Admiral David. Second—That they should furnish him a vessel to proceed to France, with all the Frenchmen without excepting any, not even two Indian girls belonging to him. Third—That the military should march out with their arms and all effects which they could carry. Fourth—That the vessel to be given them should be fully rigged and provisioned, the last to be paid for in France, the surplus to be cared for by the owners. Fifth—That no insult or violence should be done to anyone. Sixth—That the ship should be given up three days after the arrival of the French at Tadoussac, and that barks should be given to convey them to that port." Thus everything was satisfactorily settled and on the day following, July 20, 1629, the three vessels in charge of Louis Kertk came to anchor near the shore. Champlain went on board to visit him, and having been well received, asked and obtained a sufficient number of soldiers to guard the chapel and to protect the two religious houses established by the Jesuits and Recollects from insult. Soon after, Kertk landed in Quebec, and took possession of the fort and stores. He was accompanied at that time by one Le Baillif of Armines, who, together with three other Frenchmen, Stephen Brule of Champigni, Nicholas Marsolet of Rouen, and Peter Raye of Paris, had gone over to the enemy. After taking possession, the commandant refused to allow Champlain to leave his quarters, but permitted him to have Mass said there. He also furnished him with a complete inventory of everything found within the fort at the time that it changed hands. The English commander very naturally deemed it undesirable for the settlers who had established themselves in the colony to leave as had been proposed by Champlain, and, to avoid any such move on their part, he made the most tempting offers to induce them to remain, assuring them that if at the end of the year they were still not satisfied, he would convey them, without expense, to France. Under these conditions, a majority of the people concluded to remain, being warned by Champlain, however, if at the end of that period the King had not reëstablished his rights in that country, it would be wrong for them to continue any longer in a place where they would be deprived of the Sacraments and other spiritual succor. Everything having thus been satisfactorily arranged, Champlain left Quebec for Tadoussac on the 24th of July. It was on the voyage down to Tadoussac that the vessel in which Champlain was a passenger fell in with one commanded by Emery de Caen, who was on his way to Quebec. An engagement followed, in which the French were again defeated, de Caen surrendering to Thomas Kertk, the commander of the English vessel. Charlevoix informs us that in this particular engagement the French would undoubtedly have been successful had it not been for a mistake made by de Caen. He, it seems, when on the point of victory, called out "Quarter" for the purpose of inducing the English to surrender without further contest. Kertk, on the other hand, understood the question to mean a desire on the part of the French to obtain it, and at once replied "Good Quarter." It was at this moment that Champlain came forward and also urged de Caen to accept the best terms possible, as the two consorts accompanying Kertk were now rapidly approaching. But for this error, it is probable that the French would have been enabled to return to Quebec, and reinvested themselves in those rights of which, through unmerited disaster, they had been deprived. Among those accompanying the English expedition against the colonists, we are told that, in addition to the ones already mentioned, who had proven traitors to their country, there was one James Michel[1], a valiant Calvinist, who had been persistently earnest in his endeavors to induce the English to undertake the expedition. While this condition of affairs prevailed in the colony, peace had been declared between England and France, and news of the investment of Canada by the English therefore came to the King of France as a surprise, for he continued, until so informed, under the impression that Kertk had received orders not to proceed against the colony, whereas he had already sailed before the definite arrangements for peace had been concluded. In the meantime, David Kertk paid his first visit to Quebec, which, he afterwards informed Champlain, he considered to be an admirable location. Matters, however, did not progress as favorably for Champlain and the Jesuits as had been anticipated, Admiral Kertk failing to prove as generous as had his brother Louis. Even the latter did not maintain his excellence of character to the last, and of this unfortunate change Champlain and his associates were made lamentably aware in the ill-treatment and many other inconveniences which they received at his hands. At this time, also, the man Michel, previously referred to as traitor and renegade, proved a thorn in (1). James or Jacques Michel.

A native of Dieppe, this man was, as Father le Jeune expresses it, "one of a number of Huguenots who have thrown themselves upon this poor country, where they have done great damage, and have prevented the doing of much good." Father le Jeune again refers to him, saying, "This poor Jacques Michel, full of sadness at not having been rewarded as he desired by the English country, or by the renegade anglicized French—also a prey to conscience at having assisted these new Englishmen against his own countrymen—died suddenly some time after the surrender of this country. He was buried at Tadoussac. I have learned here, that the savages exhumed his body, and showed it every imaginable indignity, tore it to pieces, and gave it to their dogs; but such are the wages of traitors. I pray God that He may open the eyes of the others."—Le Jeune's Relation, 1632.

the side of the colonists, for he had led the English to believe that the Jesuits at least were extremely wealthy. The Kertks were under considerable obligations to this man for the success of the expedition, he being both a good sailor and brave soldier, but he was also avaricious, and from one cause or another soon began to exhibit considerable coolness towards the English, of whom he complained both loud and bitterly. He was also quite virulent and violent in his attacks upon the Jesuits and men of St. Malo. From this unhappy condition of mind, Champlain attempted to turn him, but to no avail, and it was after one of these protracted periods of frenzy that he at last fell in a lethargic swoon, in which condition he expired.

David Kertk employed the rest of the summer months in repairing and refitting his little fleet, after accomplishing which, he, in September, set sail for home, arriving at Plymouth on the 20th of October. The outcome of his expedition proved anything but a financial success to this adventurous spirit, who had anticipated such great returns from the enterprise. The settlement arrived at between the two countries, however, had entirely changed the condition of affairs, and, as a result, he found himself a ruined man.

It was a great blow to the French when they first learned of the invasion and investment of the colony by the English, although, aside from the question of honor involved, it is doubtful if it would have resulted in any particular loss to that nation. They became, therefore, rather conservative in their views regarding the reëstablishment of the nation's rights in that country, believing that, on the whole, it would be better to improve the home country, keep her citizens there instead of distributing them abroad, increase her own natural advantages for trade, and make use and turn to the best account the industries of her people. Others, of course, took just the opposite view, claiming that the climate of the colony, instead of being too severe as represented by some, moderated as the country became settled; that it was healthy, that the soil was exceedingly productive, and that with a limited amount of labor an excellent and comfortable living could be secured. It was also urged that the cod fisheries were a great wealth-producing source, requiring but slight outlay and providing an excellent school for sailors; that the fur trade was another means to almost unlimited wealth; that the forests, which covered the entire country, were among the finest in the world, and could be used to great advantage in the construction of vessels. That the colony had made such little progress since its first investment was shown to be due to the inadequacy and lack of interest shown by the numerous companies or associations in whose charge it had been given. Speaking of this, Champlain himself says: "While an association in a country like this holds the purse, it pays, gives and assists whom it pleases. Those who command for his majesty gain little obedience, having no one to assist except by the consent of the company's agents, who relish nothing as little as those placed there by the King (or viceroy), as not depending upon themselves, not desiring them to see and judge what they do, nor their conduct or action in such affairs; they wish to draw all to themselves; are careless of what happens provided they profit by it. They oppose forts and fortifications except when the moment of need comes, and then there is no time. When I spoke to them of fortifying, they thought it a grievance. In vain I showed them the evil consequences which might result; they were deaf; and all this was simply fear on their part that if a fort was built they would be mastered, and every law prescribed to them, and entertaining these thoughts, they left the country and as a prey to pirates or enemies. I wrote nothing to the gentlemen of the council. It needed someone to give orders, which never came; and if his majesty had only left trade free to the associations, to have their stores and clerks, while the rest of the men should be in full power of the King's lieutenant in the country, to employ them as he deemed necessary, either in his majesty's service or in fortifying or clearing the ground, so as to avoid famine, which might at any time happen if anything befell the ships—if this plan were adopted, more progress and advance would be seen in ten years than in thirty years by the course pursued." This and similar arguments prevailed upon King Louis, deciding him not to abandon the colony. There were motives of honor and religion to be considered in this matter, the paramount importance of which were made strikingly evident in the language and argument of Champlain than whom none were more pious or patriotic. With these arguments brought to bear upon him, therefore, the King immediately began negotiations for the recovery of Quebec from the British. To this end, we understand, Champlain endeavored to obtain a restoration through the French ambassador at London. After a delay of several weeks in that city, he, however, returned to France and brought the matter before the court. Another move in that direction was made by Richelieu, who, in November, 1629, ordered M. de Chateauneuf to press the demand; this the English refused to consider at that time, but in April, 1630, Chateauneuf was assured that all should be restored. Matters still dragged, however, and so, to impress the urgency of immediate action upon the British, six vessels were fitted out and placed in charge of Commander de Razilly. This had a remarkably good effect, the court of England at once restoring the property without further dalliance. The treaty completing this arrangement was signed at St. Germain-en-Laye, March 29, 1632. This treaty restored to the French New France, Acadia and Canada, Port Royal, the fort of Quebec and Cape Breton being mentioned as fortified places. The readiness with which the English acquiesced to the demands made by the French for the restoration of Acadia were undoubtedly largely due to the fact that up to that time they had done nothing towards the settlement of that colony. Another reason was, perhaps, owing to the fact that that territory lay at a considerable distance from New England, and that it was inadvisable for them to undertake the conduct of this new enterprise when so desirable a point as that already occupied by them needed all of their energies to strengthen and maintain.

THE new treaty between the English and French, to which a somewhat extended reference was made in the preceding chapter, went into immediate effect, and as the de Caens had in all probability the largest interests at stake in the colony, one of them, Emery de Caen, was appointed by Louis XIII. as his duly accredited representative to bear tidings of the treaty to Louis Kertk, and to attend personally to its immediate execution. One of the articles of the treaty, it will be remembered, provided for the return to France of all effects found at Quebec, of which an inventory had been duly made by the investing party, and given by him to Champlain at the time of his surrender. In addition to the honor thus conferred upon de Caen by the king, his Majesty, desiring to award to him fitting remuneration for losses sustained by him during the war, surrendered to him the entire fur trade of the colony for the space of one year. Equipped, then, with abundant authority and with every seeming possibility for recuperating his wasted fortunes, he sailed for Quebec in April, 1632, and upon his arrival there presented his credentials, on the strength of which Kertk immediately surrendered the property to him. The English, however, continued to maintain their relations with the Indians, bartering and trafficking with them in furs, which traffic was expressly forbidden in the articles of understanding between the two countries, and proved a natural source of irritation to de Caen.

The French became more firmly established during the following year, assuming all of their former rights and privileges, and, in addition, the territory of Acadia was given to Commander de Razilly, upon the express condition, however, that he, without unnecessary delay, establish a colony there. In compliance with this understanding, therefore, he within a short time established a small settlement at Port La Haive, a most desirable point of location, easy of access and in every way conditioned to effect the most excellent results throughout the peninsula. It was also at about the same time that Champlain was reinvested by the king as governor of New France, for which place he immediately set forth with a valuable cargo and numerous following. With this party also went the missionary Fathers de Brebeuf and Masse. Upon arriving at his destination, Champlain found a number of settlers who during his former residence there had lived under his dominion, and upon these, as well as those who came with him at this time, he impressed the necessity of concerted action, and avoidance, as far as possible, of those faults and mistakes which had in previous times had so much to do with the troubles and distresses experienced by the colonists.

Having established himself, and arranged his immediate surroundings more to his liking, he then turned his attention to that most serious problem, of subjugating by friendly means, the Huron nation to his wishes. This he believed could be best and most satisfactorily effected by the means of religion, a proper inculcation of which would, to his mind, form a more indissoluble bond than any other measure which could be applied. Heretofore the efforts of the missionaries had been altogether of a preparatory character, in which they had endeavored to become acquainted with the characteristics of the people, to gain a familiar knowledge of their language, customs and beliefs, and as far as possible ingratiate themselves with them. Already had the persistent labors of the Recollect Fathers won a few to the cause, although quite a number had evinced a tendency towards the acceptance of the Christian faith. In the same direction, Fathers de Brebeuf and de Noue had also labored faithfully and with no little success, but had come to the realization of the fact, as had the Recollects, that the people, while willing to listen to their arguments, were to a great extent non-committal and exceedingly hard to convert. This can scarcely be wondered at, for, while the Indians may have been, and undoubtedly were, favorable and friendly to the Fathers, the proposition was an entirely new one to them; and to ask them to at once accept everything in good faith, exploding theories and overthrowing the dogmas under which they had lived and worshiped for a lifetime, was asking too much of them. This condition was intensified from the fact that, while they undoubtedly had the gift of reasoning to a liberal extent, their fears and vindictive natures and crude methods of drawing deductions, coupled with excessive deliberation, or absolute indifference, made it unlikely, if not impossible, for them to immediately accept so great a change as that required of them. To carry out this plan of evangelization thoroughly then would require a long and exhaustive course of treatment, during which those who applied this spiritual panacea to these savage hearts must live among them, with them and become a very part of their actual daily existence. It was only by such means that they could gain the confidence and respect of these people, without which all efforts, no matter how well intentioned, would be in vain. To accomplish this work, it was also necessary that quite a number of earnest laborers be placed in the field, and this was a contingency which alone was hard to provide for.

Although the colony had again fallen under the domination of the company of New France, an organization deemed on all hands as the best, most progressive and liberal minded, which had as yet been given charge of these interests, there still cropped out from among the members of the organization a sentiment of selfishness, which evolved into the belief that all efforts and expenses save those associated directly with the commercial and pecuniary interests of the colony, should be curtailed, or at least reduced to a minimum. Following this particular line of observation, the company was among other things led to believe that in a young and struggling colony, such as theirs, mendicant religious would prove more of a burden than service, especially where it was all the time practically impossible to obtain the bare necessities of life. With this fact in view, strengthened by unhappy results accruing from former experiences, the Recollect Fathers were not returned to the field of their original labors. To this end, the king's advisors were also approached and induced to adopt a similar course of reasoning, and hence, for a brief period at least, the devoted services of this Order were withheld from the colony. The Jesuits, also, were meeting with similar rebuffs, so that they were compelled to apply for whatever they might require to the head of their Order in France. To these unhappy conditions was also added the fact of their former few successes and enormous losses, which to a considerable extent cooled the ardor of those who had previously contributed to their maintenance and support. Fortunately for the good of everyone, a new condition of affairs soon prevailed, a majority of those previously interested in the colony and its advancement feeling in duty bound to place the Order in a condition of absolute independence, as far as their support was concerned, and also to contribute to the further settlement of the country. This most necessary provision having been attended to, the Jesuit Fathers again went forth to the field of their former labors, the many trials and vicissitudes pertaining to which seeming rather to encourage than depress them in the work. At the outset, however, their entire attention was given to the instruction of the French settlers. About a year previous to the date last given, that is in 1632, almost directly after the English and French had come to an understanding regarding the ownership of New France, and the Treaty of St. Germain had been signed, Fathers Paul de Jeune and Anne de Nouië sailed for Québec. Here they found that a large portion of the labor effected by them during their previous residence at that place had virtually gone to waste, as in almost every instance the few proselytes at that time made in the neighborhood of Quebec had experienced a change in sentiment or grown negligent in well-doing. Probably it was the latter that prevailed to a greater extent, as it was not long after their arrival that they had the satisfaction of bringing all these recreants back to a proper condition of mind and realization of their duties as Christians. Perhaps another cause for this indifference is to be found in the fact that during their residence in Quebec the English had utterly failed in acquiring the good will of the Indians, and it was sometime after the return of the French to the colony before the Hurons, who had ceased entirely from coming, again began to regularly visit the settlement.[1]

The advent of the English had for a fact given to the Indians another view of the strange people who were gradually invading their possessions. They learned, for one thing, that the liberties which they had formerly enjoyed in their associations with the French, were not acceptable to, neither would they be tolerated by these others. Instead of the warm and friendly reception they were accustomed to at the hands of the French, they found themselves beaten and ignominiously driven from the doors of their successors. A few such lessons, however, proved sufficient, the Indians withdrawing from all communication with these unfriendly people. This condition of affairs aided the missionaries to a great extent in regaining the confidence and friendship of the natives, while they made no little use of the power thus obtained in inducing the Indians to accept the Christian faith, and in attaching them still more firmly to the French nation. The spiritual force of the colony now consisted of Fathers le Jeune, de Nouë, de Brebeuf and Enemond Masse, to whom additions were made from time to time, until at the end of some fourteen or fifteen years there were fifteen working missionaries and three or four lay brothers established in the settlement. The effect of having this little band of pious and zealous men in the colony was soon made evident, and as the creed of the settlers was a universal one, a general and most gratifying result was soon made apparent among them.

Under the new regime, strict injunctions were issued by the Court of France that no Protestant should be allowed to enter or be received into the colony, which was, therefore, settled by none but those of the Catholic faith. Much care was also taken in the selection of desirable parties for the purpose of populating the colony, which rigid restriction was continued for a number of years. While to some this move appeared a most arbitrary and somewhat unnecessary course to pursue, it at least resulted in a source of inestimable comfort to the Rev. Fathers, who had undertaken and endured so much in behalf of religion, and who were in this manner aided to no little extent in bringing about a most desirable condition of affairs in the colony. To this most happy and satisfactory condition Shea, in his translation of Charlevoix, refers in the following language: "The annual relations which we have of these happy times and the constant tradition preserved in the country both attest that there was an indescribable unction attached to this Indian mission, which made it preferred to many others indefinitely more brilliant and even more fruitful. This doubtless arose from the fact that not finding anything there, either to afford the comforts of life or to flatter vanity, the ordinary shoal of brilliant success, even in the holiest ministry—Grace worked without an obstacle. Moreover, the Lord, who never allows himself to be overcome in generosity, communicated himself unreservedly to men who sacrificed themselves without reserve; who, dead to all, entirely detached from themselves and the world, possessed their souls in unalterable peace, and were perfectly established in that spiritual childhood which Jesus Christ has recommended to his disciples as their most distinctive characteristic." Here was a vivid picture, indeed, of the pioneer Fathers in the New World. Of those who returned from the terrible trials and privations to which they were subjected in their self-enforced labor, and of the dire effects which it had upon them physically, Charlevoix says: "I knew some of them in my youth, and found them as I have just depicted—bent beneath the labors of a long apostleship, and in bodies wasted by hardship and broken of age, preserving still all the vigor of the apostolic spirit."

It had long been the dream and desire of Champlain to establish a settlement in the country of the Indians by means of which the friendly relations between the settlers and the tribes would not only be enhanced, but a far better opportunity afforded for impressing upon the minds of these people the value and efficacy of a thorough and consistent regard for the church and its teachings. Upon his return then to the settlement, he again revived the project. As an experiment, the Hurons were selected as of the best idolatrous nations among which to operate, owing to the extensiveness of the field, which their location as well as numerical strength furnished for the missionaries. At his suggestion, then, several hundreds of these people came to Quebec and after being informed of the purpose of the undertaking gave at once their ready and unqualified assent to the proposed arrangement. But the Indian mind is vacillating and uncertain, and so it proved in this instance, for shortly after, and without giving any reason whatever for so sudden and unexpected a change, they came to the conclusion that the project must be dropped, stating as their only reason for so doing that they had no desire of imperiling their rights or fettering their liberty. In spite of the unfriendly position assumed by the Indians, Champlain insisted on carrying out the original plan, and to that end, together with Father le Jeune, at that time superior of the mission, effected all necessary arrangements for the transportation of Fathers de Brebeuf and de Nouë, who had been allotted to the task of locating and laboring among the Indians. At this time, when the indifference and unfriendliness of the natives had to a certain extent been overcome, and arrangements completed for the acceptance and transportation of the missionaries by them, an incident occurred which threatened the overthrow of the entire enterprise. A Frenchman had been murdered by an Algonquin, and it was deemed advisable by Champlain to make an example of the transgressor that would act as a lasting warning to the Indians in all their after dealings with the settlers. To this proposed course of action on the part of Champlain, the Indians readily acquiesced, expressing, indeed, as their unqualified opinion, that, to prevent such crimes, culprits must be unhesitatingly and summarily punished. With their usual inconsistency, however, when it came to putting into effect this proposed discipline, they assumed an entirely different and unexpected attitude. Waiting, then, until the last moment, and when about to take their departure for their home in the interior of the country, one of the chiefs informed Champlain that no missionary or Frenchman would be allowed to accompany the party unless the murderer was released and permitted to go with them. Here, of course, all arguments proved unavailing, and although readily admitting that the assassin merited death, he said, "But the relatives, friends, all the youth of this man's village, have demanded him back from us, and they await us at the passage in the hope that we will restore him to their hand. If their expectation is defeated, and they perceive any Frenchmen among us, they will, without fail, fall upon us, and we cannot withdraw them from the fury of the tribe without being involved in a combat which will turn our allies into enemies. We cannot even answer for the result, and what grief we shall feel if we see those confided to our care slaughtered before our eyes and in our very arms." The French endeavored by all available means to diminish or set at rest the real or pretended fears of this chief, but without having the slightest effect upon him. Before the willingness expressed on the part of others of the tribe to arm, all responsibility failed in obtaining from him the slightest concession, his determination both lasting and emphatic being that no Frenchman should embark with the party until the prisoner had been released. This determined attitude on the part of the Huron chief convinced Champlain that he was acting in connection with, or at least in behalf of the Algonquins, and, therefore, concluded that under such circumstances it would not only be unwise to release the murderer, but foolish and imprudent to venture the lives of the Frenchmen by sending them into an almost entirely unknown country, and among a treacherous and dangerous class of people at such a time. "The conduct of this Huron chief," says Champlain, "portrays well the character of this nation, the ablest of all in Canada, but against whom we must always be on our guard. They carried the simulation to the excess not easily believed if it had not been experienced. This trait had contributed to make it feared and respected by other Indians, as much as its industry, its readiness, inexpedience and resource, its eloquence and its bravery. In one word, it is of all the continent the nation distinguished by most defects and most good qualities."

Regarding the name Huron, there are many conflicting opinions, even among writers most thoroughly conversant with the subject. By Champlain, the people of this nation were designated Ochasteguins, from a chief of that name. This, another authority insists, is wrong, his opinion being that Champlain had confounded the Hurons with the Iroquois, taking them all to be of one nation, owing to the marked similarity in their languages. Champlain has it, that their real name is Yendat, Wendat, or Wyandott as they are commonly called at the present time. The name Huron as applied to them, however, was derived from the French, who, upon first seeing them and noting the fierce and bristling manner in which their hair was dressed, exclaimed: "Quelle hures!" (what boars' heads), and so came to call them Hurons. The Jesuit Relations of 1639 describe this nation as consisting of two towns or tribes, the Attignawantan and the Attigneenongnahac, which called each other brother and sister. These in the course of time adopted two others: the Arendahronons and Tohontaenrat. In his writings of these people, Sagard refers to the former tribe, calling them Enarhonon or Renarhonon. On this point, as in fact in everything connected with the origin and progress of the nation, there can never be an absolute certainty, even the old men or elders of the tribes varying considerably in their accounts and opinions as given to the missionaries. The nation of the Hurons, however, it is shown, became vigorous and extensive beyond all others in that territory, which condition was in all probability owing to the fact of their adoption or assimilation of other and continguous nations. Thus, by acting and working together, they emphasized the truth of the aphorism, that 'unity is strength,' and, though numerically far smaller than the Algonquins, they carried more force with them, the latter being far behind their energetic neighbors in conduct and management of general as well as tribal affairs. The tribes, however, forming the great Huron nation, preserved at least a portion of their original personality by maintaining their primitive names, in addition to which they also took the generic name. The two spoke the same language, that is, with but very little or an almost unnoticeable difference. An exception to the latter statement may perhaps be observed in behalf of one tribe, the Ontaouonones, which name means, those who speak the best language. Charlevoix says: "This uniformity of language would even lead us to infer that the confederation or adoption of this tribe had only recalled them to their primitive stock; while the Iroquois and Andastouez,[1] who are certainly of the same stock, having never united after their separation, have also much more altered their languages, which are evidently Huron dialects, which I have elsewhere remarked. I have also spoken in the same place of the division, not only of the whole nation, but also of each canton or town in the three principal families; I content myself with remarking here, that the uniformity on this point, which prevailed throughout the whole nation, and thus sprung from it, at the time of the discovery of Canada, is a proof that if the three families are not branches of the same stem, their union is at least of very high antiquity, and dates anterior to the separation of the Iroquois and Hurons."

The territory in which the Hurons dwelt in the beginning of the seventeenth century was bounded on the south by Lake Erie, on the east by Lake Ontario and on the west by Lake Huron. The extent of this territory is given by Father Lalemont as being 20 or 25 leagues long by 7 or 8 wide. Father de Brebeuf says: "It is not large; its longest extent may be traversed in three or four days." At this time the entire nation comprised between forty and fifty thousand souls, who occupied quite a number of towns scattered throughout this domain. The number of people given, however, by no means represented the strength of this great nation in its earlier days, and before it had become greatly diminished by its long protracted wars with the Iroquois. The character of the country in which this people lived was varying in the extreme, some of it being of a most fertile character. The greater portion, however, may be said to have been below the medium in this respect. However, there was no doubt that on an average, if fairly well populated with industrious people, it would easily have given sufficient returns for the comfort and support of the inhabitants. The climate was also noted as being remarkably healthy, for, while a few of the settlers suffered considerably from hunger and other conditions incident to the times, none died of disease, and but few, if any, suffered from any more than the most ordinary ills. Of the character of the country, we are told that there were extensive prairies suitable for cultivation, and raising of all kinds of grains. Forests were also abundant and full of magnificent trees, especially cedars, which were generally of remarkable size and height. The country, too, was well irrigated and the character of the water good. It was during this time, too, that the discovery of stones is mentioned "which melt like metal and have some veins of silver," but at that time but little credence, or rather attention, was given to the matter. The early settlers also spoke of two remarkable animals discovered in that country, one which they referred to as a bird that mews like a cat (the cat bird), and the other a kind of hare that sings like a bird and has a very delicate flesh (the wood chuck).

The unfortunate differences which arose between the party of Hurons and Champlain at the time when arrangements had been fully completed for the transportation of missionaries into the Huron country, by no means abated the desire on the part of the governor for the completion and carrying out of this idea. His firmness in this particular was emphasized by many strong and practical reasons, among which was his belief that the extra intelligence exhibited by this particular people, fitted them better in every respct for the reception of the Christian doctrines. By planting missionaries in their midst, he also hoped to prepare the way for a permanent settlement in their country, which would thus enhance the possibilities for increasing a most advantageous trade made doubly easy by the facilities for transportation afforded by a chain of lakes that almost encircled that entire section of the country to the extreme limits of North America. The project was a grand as well as wise one, and if carried to the full extent would have doubtless proved a wonderful blessing, both from a religious and commercial standpoint, to all of the parties concerned. Unfortunately, however, for the entire settlement, the inceptor of this grand and practical scheme was removed at the very time when his experience, forethought and energy were most needed, and those into whose hands the reins of government fell were careless as to the result, or inadequate to the task put upon them until the golden opportunity had slipped from their grasp, and it had become altogether too late to enable the Huron nation to regain its former strength and prestige, as well as that superiority in arms which the Iroquois had to no little extent already acquired over them.

From their view of the surroundings, the missionaries had also become convinced that it would be wise for them to establish their mission in the midst of the Huron country, which was then in the center of Canada, from which point all others would be more readily accessible, thus enabling them to carry the gospel, without discrimination, to all parts of the continent. The idea was well devised and the plan would undoubtedly have been carried to a successful issue had the one as suggested by Champlain been followed. Affairs, in fact, had taken on a most satisfactory look and condition; quite a number of the nations had begun to trade with the French, the Montagnez below Quebec, the Algonquins above, and from the island formed by the Ottawa River above Montreal and the remainder, the Nipissings, who dwelt around a lake by that name, and lastly, the Ottawas, who dwelt at various points along the river of which they claimed control to such an extent that they demanded toll on all canoes ascending or descending that stream. It remained, then, for the government to establish satisfactory and friendly relations with the Iroquois, which done, the balance of the task undertaken would have been accomplished with comparative ease. "A few men," says Charlevoix, "maintained in the Huron country, with three or four forts, would have been sufficient to impress upon the minds of these Indians enough of the strength and resources of France to impose the law upon them or at least turn the scale in favor of their antagonists, who were the allies of France, but the necessity was not perceived until it was too late." Historian Shea differs from this opinion of Charlevoix, stating as his belief that a simpler way out of the difficulty would have been for France to take possession of New Netherland as the English subsequently did. That once accomplished, the Iroquois, who were then entirely dependent upon the French for trade, would have had to come to satisfactory terms. Then too, it should have been born in mind, that Canada—a long valley—presented no natural strength with which to oppose the ingress of a determined foe. For this reason alone, then, if for no other, the possession of New York was essential. At this particular time, too, the opportunity for making terms with the Iroquois was far better than at a later date and before they had formed associations with the Dutch, with whom the Mohawks made their first treaty at Norman's Kill in 1618. Three years later these Indians obtained fire arms from that source, and were thenceforth practically independent.

Champlain's attempt then having for a time miscarried, the missionaries awaited with considerable anxiety and patience for the return of a number of the Indians, who had promised to come after them. The promise was in part fulfilled, but the number of Indians who came was so small, and their equipment so meager and unsatisfactory, that it at once made itself evident to the missionaries, as well as to the governor, that their intentions were not strictly in conformance with their former pledges. As evidenced by their actions on numerous previous occasions, their intention was undoubtedly to furnish some plausible excuse for their noncompliance with the pledges given. Nor had they been long at the settlement before this was shown to be the case in the somewhat confused and numerous excuses offered by them when the subject was brought to mind. As one reason in particular, they urged the fact that their journey down had been a long and tedious one, that they had become fatigued and exhausted in their efforts to get there, and were scarcely in condition to make the return with their canoes empty, let alone the unwonted exertions it would require should they be loaded down with the additional weight of the missionaries and their belongings. From this determination nothing whatever would turn them, not even the continued pleadings of the Fathers, whose great desire to reach their destination and begin their life's labors caused them to offer to embark without baggage, or additional weight which might in any way prove irksome or burdensome to the Indians, excepting their chapel service. In addition to this, they offered to perform any of the duties necessary to assist the Indians on their return, to paddle for them and to aid them in carrying their burdens. To all of these friendly advances, however, the Hurons offered a stubborn and persistent refusal, and it was not until after much delay had been experienced and handsome presents made, that they were induced to reconsider their determination and agreed to give place among their party to Fathers de Brebeuf and Daniels and one servant. This, however, marked the limit of their concessions, so that Father Davost, who was also to have been one of the party, was compelled to await another and more favorable opportunity. Nor was the delay thus caused of protracted duration, as within a few days he made arrangements with another party of Hurons, more recent arrivals at Three Rivers, to carry him to his destination. In this journey Father Davost was attended by two Frenchmen. It was during the latter part of August that the good priest and his companions arrived at the place of their proposed location, where Fathers de Brebeuf and Daniels had established themselves some three weeks previously. Of the journey, all had but the most unpleasant memories to cite, as the Indians who accompanied them had during the entire time proved most surly and morose, failing entirely in pity at the sickness and suffering experienced by the missionaries, and enforcing to the utmost all of the promises made by them. Thus, though but little used to such violent and toilsome exertion, they were compelled to assist in paddling the canoes, an exercise both painful and exhausting when attempted by a tyro for any length of time. But even this was not the worst, for there were times during that journey when their lives were in deadly peril, or the best they could hope for was to be left stranded in the wilderness unaided by guide to direct them, and without food with which to sustain their physical needs. It was under such unfavorable conditions as these, which certainly indicated little that would prove beneficial to their interests, that the missionaries began their spiritual labors among the Huron nation. True it is, that a majority of these people extended to them a certain rude and uncouth courtesy, but even that detracted but slightly from the general unpleasantness and absolute horror of the surroundings. Thus, encompassed by a capricious and ferocious people, whose every act and characteristic was at variance with those to which the missionaries had at all times been accustomed, these good men were compelled to live and suffer. They therefore took up their residence in one of the Indian towns, Ihouhatiri or Ihonatiria by name, where they at once began the erection of a little chapel which, when completed, was dedicated to St. Joseph, the name which was also given by them to the town itself. For the first twelve months succeeding their arrival in this Huron village, the work was exceedingly laborious whilst the result of their continuous efforts was of a most meager and disheartening character. They, however, were made happy by the baptism of a few adults and the assurance of the eternal welfare of a number of children upon whom the Holy Sacrament of Baptism had been conferred. The principal trouble which confronted them in their dealings with the adults arose from their adsolute indifference rather than from any innate dislike for the principles of religion, or confirmed disbelief in its principles and teachings. A savage, then, may often be most correctly judged by contraries, or as Champlain would say: "He must not be regarded as convinced as soon as he seems to approve the statements made him, because, in general, they dislike nothing so much as disputes." It would, therefore, seem, following out this and similar lines of argument, that on many occasions, dominated by their mere complacency, interested motive, or downright indolence and sloth, they ofttimes exhibit every mark of interested conviction in matters to which they had not given the slightest attention, or even understood. That they were erratic and inconsistent to an unusual degree is further emphasized by the fact that they have been known to frequent churches for years, exhibiting all of those traits consistent with an assiduous desire for improvement, modest deportment and reverential concern, and then without cause or warning have turned to the astounded missionary, who believed he had obtained in each an honest and earnest convert, and said: "Thou hadst no one to pray with thee. I took pity on thy loneliness and wished to keep thee company; now that others are inclined to render thee the same service, I retire." Here, then, were men who openly acknowledged that in order to please the missionary, or give satisfaction or comfort to him in his loneliness, they had willingly and unhesitatingly received Baptism and fulfilled with seeming edification, all of the duties pertaining to a consistent Christian life. The yoke, however, was certainly not a too burdensome one as evidenced in the ease with which it was cast aside. It must not be judged, however, from these peculiar actions on the part of the Indians, that they were entirely without belief in the story of the true religion as told to them by the missionaries. In fact, it has not unfrequently proved to be the case that a positive refusal on their part to submit to the dictates of the Church was by no means an evidence of their insincerity or want of belief. Others there were who, while readily admitting that they had no farther doubt as to the right of the faith as presented to them, would not for one moment entertain the idea of being converted. Obdurate and obstinate they were to a marked degree; yet even not more so, if as much, as many have proved who have been gifted with the advantages of Christian birth and training. Neither could they be said to be altogether indifferent even if obstinate, as is plainly illustrated in the case of an Iroquois. While lying upon his death bed, some fire fell upon the robe which covered him; others at once rushed forward to extinguish the flame, seeing which he said, "It is not worth while. I know that I shall burn for all eternity; whether it begins a little sooner or a little later, is not worth all the trouble you are taking." It was a long time, however, after the advent of the first missionaries among these people before they were given to making such admissions as these, and even then at but rare intervals. The work of educating the Indians was therefore exceedingly slow and laborious, their every act and thought being environed by a mass of superstitions which had accrued to them through a period which compassed many generations. It was first, then, the aim of the missionaries to penetrate this horrible mental darkness which enveloped and overshadowed every attribute of manliness or instinct of progressiveness pertaining to these people. It was like, or even worse than taking a savage animal of brutish tendencies and endeavoring to inculcate into it the ways of domestic life; for here, in addition to inbred cruelty, his predominating characteristic was the alertness of a higher condition of creation. An active mind full of subtile thoughts animated by the lowest passions and held subservient by deplorable and uncontrollable superstitions. As the light of intelligence dawned upon these unhappy people, the patient missionaries began to see an appreciable and satisfactory result for their manifold and unceasing labors. They had succeeded in drawing these people as a creature from its lair; had inducted new ideas into their mental system; had led them to overcome to a certain extent their groveling superstitions; had taught them to branch out, to think for themselves on other and different lines from those which they were wont to follow, and impelled them to work upon arguments not always favorable to their old-time customers and sophistries. Like children of our own times, the Indians often asked questions which were hard and almost impossible to answer. While, were the answers given, it was necessary to do so with utmost caution for fear that misunderstandings might arise. "You told us fine stores," said a Huron to Father de Brebeuf, "and there's nothing in what you say that might not be true; but that is good for you who come across the sea. Do you not see that, as we inhabit a world so different from yours, there must be another heaven for us and another road to reach it?" Here, then, they stood, and here the missionary met with his greatest difficulty, for the Indian was guided largely in his acts and beliefs by omens or what might be called actual demonstration. Everything which occurred, everything that he saw had some element of interest to him as directly pointing towards and acting upon his destiny. It was to the strenghtening and confirming of such beliefs inculcated into him from earliest childhood that the medicine man devoted his most seductive arts. This position was in fact a sinecure, which none knew better than the wretched charlatans who, while boasting their equality with the gods, trembled in their miserable skins for fear that their supremacy was endangered by the advent of the Christians among them. They were wary, in fact, of competition and fought it with hatred and determination, in which they were largely abetted by the all-pervading and overwhelming superstition of the people. As a means to effecting this end, they endeavored in every way possible to cast suspicion upon everything said or done by the missionary Fathers. Motives were impugned, prayers and religious rites were portrayed as witchcraft, and so plausible indeed did these miscreants make their arguments, and so covert and subtile were their allusions that the missionaries found it necessary to say their breviary and perform their other devotions in secrecy and alone. The surrounding conditions of that particular period also had much to do in strengthening these convictions, all of which were more or less derogatory to the missionaries and their presence among them.

To these beliefs the Hurons were all too readily persuaded, their very condition seeming to warrant them in their conclusions. They had, in fact, become greatly reduced from their former flourishing condition, and now weakened and almost powerless, feared to assume an actively aggressive attitude towards their enemies, the Iroquois, whom previously they had been wont to seek out in their own territory. In addition to this, they were becoming fast depleted in numbers through the inroads of a terrible disease which had set its seal upon them. These untoward and depressing conditions, together with the artful representations of the sorcerers and medicine men, strengthened, though they did not confirm entirely, the Hurons in their belief that the presence of the missionary Fathers among them was a menace to their welfare and the crowning evil to their deplorable condition. They believed that there was a God of the Christians, whose influence, however, instead of doing them good, could only work evil to the weaker ones, in whom the Indian rested his belief. Indeed, as one remarked, "Every nation has its gods; our misfortune is to have gods weaker than yours, and unable to prevent our destruction." To cure them of this dangerous belief, which had become still farther emphasized by a prevailing drouth which threatened the entire country with a general famine, Father de Brebeuf made a direct appeal to God, which he informed his superior in a subsequent communication was soon after answered with an abundant rain. Still another similar instance is quoted by him at a later date. This had the effect of arresting the attention of the Indians, quieting their fears for the time, and might perhaps have proved of lasting benefit to the missionaries, had not other untoward circumstances arisen, which in the unhappy results accruing entirely overshadowed the benefits already derived from these seemingly miraculous occurrences. It was noticed by these people that a number of children, who, suffering from a fatal illness, had been baptised, died soon afterwards, and this in their bigotry and prejudice led them to believe that the Sacrament of Baptism was used as a spell by the priests for the purpose of bringing about their destruction. Fortunately, there were a few instances where people who had been given up as incurable recovered perfect health under the gentle and zealous ministration of these Fathers, a change for the better happening to occur soon after they had received the sacrament of regeneration. These remarkable occurrences led the savages, for the time being, to exhibit a more friendly feeling and kindly consideration for the missionaries. But even then the good impression made upon them was soon lost and forgotten, owing to the endless and perverting spells which were cast upon them by the medicine man. Sometimes, as one writer upon this subject has assured us, "the profound ignorance of these savages, which made them so frequently attribute to supernatural causes many things in which there was nothing to exceed the powers of nature, led them to the opposite extreme; as happens to those who have fear of being overcredulous, rush into an incredulity that reason itself disavows. But these changes in minds arraying themselves irrationally, and with no certain rule, against religion, were not frequent among a people who are little for what does not strike the senses; and the troubles and disgust of the apostolical laborers arose almost always from their excessive credulity." Thus every act, no matter how unconsciously performed, by the missionaries, which in any of its details was new to the savage understanding, or any instrument or article seen in their possession in the uses and purposes of which he was not thoroughly conversant and well informed, was regarded by him askance, as a means or medium to be used for his injury and destruction. Thus it devolved upon the missionaries to keep all such articles, implements or utensils under lock and key, or hidden away from the view of these people. For this reason, we are told, the Fathers were compelled to keep in hiding a clock and weathercock, the former of which the Indians believed brought death, whilst the other was certain to assure bad weather. In this most unfruitful field, however, the three missionaries continued to labor with unabating zeal, making light of fatigue and the general horror of their surroundings, ignoring the many unnecessary brutalities which were thrust upon them, and in every way possible exerting themselves that they might become better acquainted with the characteristics and peculiarities of the Indians—the only remuneration or recompense for which they looked or hoped being the regeneration of these people and their conversion to the true faith. Nor in spite of all their exertions did times or conditions improve. One day, after they had been located among the Indians for a considerable time, Father de Brebeuf was called before a Council of the Elders, whose reception of him convinced him that his life was in imminent peril. In unmeasured terms he was berated and reproached for the many evils and discomforts that had of late fallen upon the Huron nation, and which they claimed had all come to them since the arrival of his party in their midst. The generally unhappy condition of the people, the limited supplies of food, the threatened drouth, encroachments of disease, were all in fact charged as the direct result of witchcraft wrought by him and his associates. Even in this perilous condition he was not dismayed, but without fear or hesitation stoutly denied the charges made against him and at once diverged into a lengthy and thorough explanation of the principles of Christianity. That they had suffered to a great extent, he was ready to admit, but that those sufferings had come to them as a result of witchcraft he denied, still asserting, however, that it was more likely that these conditions had been dealt out to them as strokes of justice by the God whom he represented—that the God he worshiped was a jealous God, who punished in this manner their hesitancy in acknowledging him as the one Supreme Being. Thus he ably wrought upon them, showing that how in the perfect ignorance which had maintained among them previous to the introduction of the teachings of the Church, there might have been both reason and excuse for their unbelief. Now, however, conditions were all changed; they could no longer hide behind the cloak of ignorance, or even indifference, for they had already admitted their belief of the existence of this God and in his power. This method of subduing them proved successful for the time at least, and when he paused in his discourse to them, many of the Indians begged for further instructions in the Christian religion, but his surprise—and he was surprised at the result of his efforts—was intensified when, on leaving the Council Chamber, he saw one who had always been most active and defiant in declaring against the missionaries and their religion tomahawked at his very side. The victim, he was told, was a sorcerer, of whom it was deemed time to free the village. The determined stand taken by Father de Brebeuf at this time resulted in a decidedly better condition of affairs, which it was hoped would be lasting in effect. It was not to be, however; hardly had the missionaries become possessed of the idea that they had already effected a satisfactory inroad upon the superstitions of the savages, than an event occurred which caused the vexatious conditions previously prevailing to become more strikingly apparent than ever. It seems that other elements besides those existing among the Indians were arrayed against them, for upon the return of a number of the tribe from Manhattan they stated that the Europeans located at that point had warned them against the missionaries and their religious teachings; nay, further, they went so far as to allude to them as men of pernicious habits, who wrought trouble and spread desolation wherever they went, for which reason they had been driven from Holland. Fortunately for the good Fathers, there was an undercurrent of feeling working among the Hurons, many of the more thoughtful and intelligent among them beginning to realize that it might be far better for them to be less impulsive and to judge rather from what they saw than by what they heard. They even went so far as to make a study of the habits and characteristics of the missionaries, which resulted in establishing an impression quite favorable to them and to the work they had undertaken. Here the march of progress took a steadily upward turn, the Indians awakening as it were to the belief that through the mediation and exertions of the Fathers were to be accomplished great and lasting good for the Huron nation. It was now that a number of the most highly esteemed among the tribes declared openly in favor of the Christian religion. This awakened interest in the work; an evidence that their labors had proved far from futile came like a lasting benediction to the holy men, who had already unmurmuringly suffered so much for the advancement of the cause. With renewed energy, therefore, they continued to instruct the savages in the faith, doing everything in their power to strengthen and increase such feelings of reliance as the Indians had evinced towards them and their teachings. Of their feelings towards the missionaries at this time, Charlevoix writes: "Three things especially tended to free the Hurons from prejudice, and arm them against the seduction which had so long kept them in error. In the first place, they made solid reflections on the sanctity of the religion preached to them, and on the purity of its moral code. The missionaries were extremely surprised to hear them express themselves on these two points, as men who had overlooked none of the maxims and principles of Christianity, but saw clearly the connecton between these principles and the consequences which their instructors deduced from them. In the second place, they soon conceived a high idea of these religious men, and never wearied in admiring their ability, prudence and the justness and force of their arguments. The great examples of virtue which they saw them practice, made still greater impression on them. They were especially struck with their courage and disinterestedness and with their contempt of life. It did not seem reasonable to believe that such men were mistaken in the affair of religion. In the third place, they agreed that one must have lost all sense to imagine that men who had no interest in leading them into error would, merely to do it, have undertaken such long voyages, run such risks, expose themselves to so much hardship, exile themselves so far from friends and kindred to spend their days with unknown tribes and remain there in spite of the cold welcome they had received and the manner in which they continued to be treated. These reflections, made at first only by a few individuals less rooted in prejudice, soon spread to the masses, and suddenly changed the face of affairs; but the missionaries had yet another reason for acting cautiously with this people, and not receiving into the number of neophytes all who presented themselves.

"This was the reluctance which most evinced to renounce practices, indifferent in themselves, but suspected by the missionaries as not exempt from superstition. These Indians in vain protested that they did not acknowledge anything supernatural in them. All appeared suspicious in a dissembling nation, borne by an almost irresistible bent to attribute everything to spirits. After all, laudable as mistrust and strictness are in this matter, they should not be excessive. Missionaries afterwards admitted that they had carried their precautions somewhat too far, and had thus retarded the work of God."

The same character of work at that time effected by the Reverend Fathers in the Huron country was also being carried out at Three Rivers, which by this time had begun to assume the dignity of a rendezvous for the northern nations dwelling in the neighborhood of Quebec and at Tadoussac, and was used as a means for enlightening for the cause of religion the Algonquins, Montagnez and other tribes with whom the French had dealings or relations. Among these people, too, the same conditions may be said to have prevailed, the labors of the missionaries at first bearing but few, if any, results of a desirable nature, while the stoical attitude of the natives as a whole was marked and unappreciative to a degree. The only difference to be found was in the individual characteristics of the people, for with all a terrible incubus of superstition prevailed, numbing the intellect and making it absolutely irresponsive and unaffected by the teachings of the missionaries. With one tribe, then, would be found excessive rudeness combined with marked simplicity; in some docility of heart leashed to a mind of adamant, while in others an abnormal condition of extravagance would stand forth preëminent. Another difficulty prevailing, especially with the Algonquins, was the nomadic character of the life led by them, which prevented any reliance being placed on individuals, some of whom would absent themselves from the settlement or village for months at a time, and thus lose the benefit of what little effect religious training may, up to that time, have had upon them. There were also other marked differences between the people of the Algonquins and Huron tribes. With the latter, we are told, were to be found hearts more rebellious, but a firm and consistent endurance in well-doing when the teachings of religion had once been accepted. Among the others, you would be sure to find pliant natures, which were more easily subdued; but with these unfortunately there was also less determination and a more limited conception of the duties of adherence. Both, then, were susceptible to religious training and many, as history has shown us, have embraced the faith with confidence and reliance, and adhered to it with a steadfastness of unquestioned and enduring power; but this condition, be it remembered, was only arrived at after years of toilsome labor and many noble lives had been sacrificed to the cause.

WHILE the good Fathers were devoting their entire energies to the cause of religion among the aborigines, the interests of the colony, both spiritual and temporal, were progressing with pleasing certainty. To augment these happy conditions, there was at this time (1635) established among the settlers an institution which undoubtedly aided much in the general prosperity of New France. This was brought about by René Rohault, who, at the time—some ten years previously—when the first Jesuits went to America, became a member of the Society of Jesus. He was the eldest son of the Marquis de Gamache, who, knowing of his ardent desire to see a college founded at Quebec, and being anxious to abet him in this most laudable undertaking, communicated with Father Mutius Vitelleschi, General of the Jesuits, proffering a gift of six thousand gold crowns with which to carry the project to completion. The work, however, was necessarily delayed, owing to the fact that it was at about that time that Quebec fell into the hands of the English. Regarding this enterprise[1], we are told in the Relation de la Nouvelle, France, that in letters issued by him Father Mutius Vitelleschi established, Nicholas Rohault, Marquis de Gamache, Baron of Longroy and Hincheville, Signeur of Beauchamp, Marieuil and Bonnicour, etc., and his wife, Frances Mangot, founders of the college. Here also appears somewhat of a discrepancy regarding the amount of the donation, one giving it as sixteen thousand gold crowns, while by another it is stated as being forty-eight thousand lievres.

The colony now having come under the domination of the English, it became necessary to await such time and conditions as would bring about the most benefit for the settlers by the establishment of this institution. It was not until December, 1635, then, that active work was begun upon the building. It was at this time, also, that the colony experienced a terrible shock, in the almost irreparable loss of its governor, Champlain, who died December 25, 1635. Of this excellent and pious man, it can safely and most truthfully be said that his entire life was one continuous example of unselfishness spent in behalf of his fellow men, and the religion which he had always so faithfully served. Champlain was born at Brouage, in Haitonge, in 1567 or '70, his father being reputed a nobleman, who during the civil wars fought for the King of Brittany, under d'Aumont de St. Luc and Brissac. An uncle of his also held high rank in the Spanish navy. It was after an extended voyage to Mexico in the service of Spain that Champlain was first induced to go to New France, with which country, until the time of his death, his career was thenceforth identified. He married Helen Boullé, sister of a fellow navigator, who, though at the time a Protestant, returned to the ancient faith, and on her husband's death became an Ursuline nun, under the name of Mother Helen de St. Augustine. She died at Meaux December 20, 1654, at the age of fifty-six, in the convent which she had founded. They left no issue. Of Champlain's personal character, the historian Charlevoix says: "Mr. de Champlain was beyond contradiction a man of merit, and may well be called 'The Father of New France.' He had good sense, much penetration, very upright views and no man was ever more skillful in adapting the most complicated affairs. What all admired most in him was his consistency in following up his enterprises; his firmness in the greatest dangers; a courage proof against the most unforeseen reverses and disappointments; ardent and disinterested patriotism; a heart tender and compassionate for the unhappy, and more attentive to the interests of his friends than his own; a high sense of honor, and great probity. His memoirs show that he was not ignorant of anything that one of his profession should know; and we find in him a faithful and sincere historian, an attentively observant traveler, a judicious writer, a good mathematician and an able mariner.

(1). In the notes attached to volume six of the Relations, 1633-1634, we find the following, which throws a more positive light upon this enterprise and its conception: "Rene Rohault, eldest son of Nicholas Rohault, Marquis de Gamache (or Gamaches) a nobleman of Picardy, was born May 25, 1609, near to the city of Ameins, where he early became a pupil at the Jesuit college. He became a novice in that order March 9, 1626, at Paris, largely through the influence of Coton, then Provincial of France, whose death occurred about ten days later. Upon entering his novitiate, Rene persuaded his father to give the Jesuits a part of his own patrimony, for the establishment of a school in connection with their Canadian mission. De Gamache accordingly gave them for his son 16,000 ecus of gold (Charlevoix erroneously says 6,000); and added as a personal gift from himself an annuity of 3,000 livres, to be paid as long as he lived. Rene pursued his studies successively at Paris, Ameins, Eu and La Fleche, and preached three years at Eu, where he died June 29, 1639."

"But what crowns all these good qualities is the fact that in his life, as well as in his writings, he shows himself always a truly Christian man, zealous for the service of God, full of candor and religion. He was accustomed to say, what we read in his memoirs, 'that the salvation of a single soul was worth more than the conquest of an empire, and that kings should seek to extend their domain in heathen countries, only to subject them to Christ. He thus spoke especially to silence those who, unduly prejudiced against Canada, asked what France would gain by settling it. Our own kings, it is known, always spoke like Champlain on this point; and the conversion of the Indians was the chief motive which, more than once, prevented their abandoning a colony the progress of which was so long retarded by our impatience, our inconstancy, and the blind cupidity of a few individuals. To give it a more solid foundation, it only required more respect for the suggestions of Mr. de Champlain, and more seasonable relief on the part of those who placed him in his position. The plan which he proposed was but too well justified by the failure of opposite maxims and conduct."

In spite of their great and seemingly irretrievable loss, the Jesuits at once proceeded without unnecessary delay to establish the institution towards which liberal donations had already been made. But aside from the original purpose of this institution, there were other and weighty reasons why immediate benefit might be expected from its establishment in the colony. Principal among these was the fact that many natives of France, being made aware of the possibilities thus afforded for giving their sons an education unattainable in many parts of their native country, would remove to the new colony and settle there. It also had its effect upon the Indians, who, becoming duly impressed with the power of a nation which could carry out such a mammoth and elaborate undertaking with ease and confidence, flocked in great numbers from all parts of the country to the neighborhood of Quebec. The influence thus brought to bear upon the Indians also proved of much material benefit in carrying out the general plan for their evangelization. This was made still easier by means of food and other comforts which were distributed with a liberal hand among them, thus making them docile and far more approachable when the question of religion was brought up for discussion. Thus they became, to a certain degree, civilized and acquired a liking and friendliness for the French, which not only effected a better and more desirable condition throughout the settlement, but also aided largely in the advancement of the interests of Christianity. It was even proposed to introduce a number of Indian boys into the college, where their spiritual and material interests would receive constant and watchful care; but the undertaking failed of fulfillment, owing to the scarcity of funds with which to carry on the work.

After the death of Champlain, the government of the colony was administered by Mark Anthony Bras-de-fer (de Chateaufort), governor of Three Rivers, who remained in charge until the arrival of Mr. de Montmagny, who was appointed March 10, 1637, and reached his destination, Quebec, on June 10th or 11th. Mr. de Montmagny was a Knight of Malta as also was Mr. de Lisle, who was given charge of Three Rivers. One of the first improvements attempted by the new governor was to establish and bring into active operation a school for Indian boys in connection with the college as already proposed by the Jesuit Fathers. The experiment, for such it may be deemed, was begun with the Hurons, who were regarded as farther advanced in religious matters and in their general condition than those of other tribes. It was also believed that these children would to a certain extent stand as hostages for the good behavior of the people. The Hurons readily acquiesced in this proposition, promising to send their children at a stated time to Quebec to be instructed in all matters pertaining to the Catholic religion and the general amenities pertaining to a civilized existence. When the time arrived, however, for fulfilling these promises, so great was their affection for their children, and so marked their dislike for parting with them, that they absolutely refused to let them go. At this time Father Daniel, who was to have acted as convoy to the party and who, in fact, did make a portion of the journey with some of them, paid a visit to Quebec, arriving there in a canoe accompanied by three or four Indians. A letter of Father le Jeune's reporting this occurrence describes him as being barefooted, and completely exhausted, his breviary hanging to his neck, a shirt falling to pieces, and a tattered cassock on his attenuated body, but with a happy countenance, charmed with the life he led and by his air and words inspiring all with the desire of sharing the crosses to which the Lord imparted so much unction. So impressed were all others at his words, and with the undoubted sincerity of his professions pertaining to the greatness of the work, that before the end of the year 1636 there were no less than six members of the Jesuit Order located in different towns throughout the Huron nation. Here was the opportunity, then, which had been so incessantly sought by the lamented Champlain, and no less desired by his worthy successor to establish a permanent settlement among the Hurons. This most desirable undertaking, however, was sadly retarded by the want of both men and money.

Here was the great desideratum upon which hinged the progress and prosperity of the colony, as well as in fact everything pertaining to a well-defined condition of affairs; for aside from the fur trade, which enriched but a few directly interested in that branch of commerce, nothing whatever prospered. As a result of this extreme inertion there was but little, if anything, in connection with the settlement and its affairs, which could be said or written at that time, to arouse an active interest among the moneyed class of France, or those who were ever on the alert for safe commercial investment. From the missions, of course, came voluminous and interesting recitals which were given willing audience in every home throughout the nation, but had not the slightest bearing or effect on other equally important though less spiritual affairs. Thus was evidenced, as in the present day, that calculating coldness which marks the progress and supremacy of commerce the world over. The view then which had been taken of the colony, as a commercial investment by those who had ventured their money in the undertaking, was far from satisfactory to the interests of the struggling settlement. This was, to say the least, strange, especially with such a magnificent stretch of territory at their command, such unrivaled possibilities, and such generous concessions as had already been made to them. True, the journey was long and hazardous, and the land of their investment practically unknown to them, though they had the word and experience of such a man as Champlain, and others equally reliable, upon which to form an opinion and guide them safely in their deliberations. Yet they faltered and became indifferent at the very time when assistance was most needed, and a helping hand stretched forth in the fulfillment of their obligations would have saved much misery. Better still it would have brought to the cause of commerce as well as religion a new tenure of life, re-enforcing the spent energies of the settlers with a buoyancy pregnant with renewed hope for the future, and unabated confidence in those who had pledged themselves to see the undertaking safely through.

Then, too, these conditions had an ill effect upon the Indians, and changed in a marked degree their attitude toward the settlers. Many of the nations had regarded an alliance with France in the light of an assurance that such an arrangement would insure them success in their raids upon the enemy. They relied, in fact, more upon the physical force thus made available than moral influence, about which, at best, their knowledge was of a most limited and superficial character. There is no doubt remaining in the minds of many that these relations with the natives were effected all the more easily from the fact that they relied implicitly upon the promises made. Nor can the breach of confidence be questioned, knowing as we do that prominent among these people were the Hurons, Tionontates, or Petuns, Algonquins and Nipissings, all of whom suffered defeat more or less severely at the hands of their enemies, from having placed reliance upon a volume of specious promises, which led them into the still greater error of negligence and want of preparation when forced into the presence of the foe.

Nor was the enemy slow to take advantage of the situation. Of all the tribes that roamed for leagues around, or, for that matter, within the bounds of the continent, none were more crafty or subtle, more devilish in device and inhumanly cruel, than the Iroquois. They never rested in their course of wanton destruction, but with hands ever raised against their fellows, made of life one continuous carnival of blood. Their greed, their insatiable desire for slaughter, their purpose of annihilation kept them ever wakeful, alert and vigilant, while with the dash and energy of conquering legions, or deep dissimulative art, they carried this war of extermination into the very lodges of the foe. A scheme of unparalleled treachery adopted by them was to treat for peace with one portion of the nation, while slaughtering those dwelling at remote distances from the center of the territory. To pacify and lull suspicion as far as possible, when these depredations became known, they offered the plausible excuse that such occurrences were the outcome of private grievances and quarrels, in which they, as a nation, had no interest whatever. And so suspicion slumbered among their less astute and crafty foe, until all too late they found this rapacious and merciless destroyer at their very door. They woke to be blinded by the glare of the firebrand and smoke of their burning lodges, and die with the groans of their fellows and shrieks of victory uttered by the foeman ringing in their ears. Then, assured of the dominance and strength of their unconquerable forces, the Iroquois became emboldened, and, casting aside the mask, declared openly for a war of extermination.

Thus they became a menace to the entire community, both white and red, although upon the latter the effect was most deplorable as well as lasting. It seemed as though time but added to their discomfort, the panic among them increasing to such an extent that they became absolutely demoralized and unable to comfort themselves or direct the affairs of the tribe with their old-time judiciousness and skill. Uncontrollable panic seized upon them, every move became a blunder, every effort redounded to their loss, until, driven hither and thither, the victims of endless adversity, they dropped into the monotony of a useless and almost aimless existence.

Following the last expedition made by Champlain against the Iroquois, that tribe effected a treaty with the Hurons. The war, however, went merrily on under the guidance of the master minds of the nation, who nevertheless strongly protested that the depredations committed by their people, from time to time, were but the outcome of personal grievances, and had no general significance whatever. These repeated protestations on part of the Iroquois lulled into security any rising suspicions, which unchecked might have precipitated the coming storm. As it was, however, the Hurons failed to perceive the evidences of their growing insecurity, which must be admitted were guarded with consummate skill. Thus the cloud, at one time no larger than a man's hand, grew ominously thicker, bearing in its spreading shadows the gloomy forebodings of a nation's peril, and beneath its curtained depths the iron hand of a fierce and vengeful people reached out menacingly toward them.

But matters were not even to remain in this semi-pacificatory condition for long, and toward the spring of 1636—the Relations also refer to certain attacks as having been made as early as 1634—the Iroquois, openly avowing their intentions, appeared in the enemy's country, fully armed, and in a manner which left no possible doubt as to their subsequent intentions. Fortunately for the welfare of the Hurons, there were a number of Frenchmen in the settlement whose presence there, together with the determined stand they took, impelled the enemy to retire without making any active demonstrations. Here again the Hurons made an egregious mistake, for no sooner had the enemy taken their departure than, instead of acting as former experiences would warrant, and at once preparing for open and aggressive warfare, they relapsed into their former condition of absolute indifference, from which neither argument nor urging could induce them to arouse.

Towards the close of the year 1637, a number of additions were made to the missionary force at St. Joseph, which made it possible for the permanent location of one at each of the principal towns throughout the nation, besides leaving a number who could be sent out among the neighboring tribes. At this particular time the missionaries thus employed devoted considerable attention to the Indians residing in the neighborhood of Lake Nipissing, in which direction, therefore, a majority of their expeditions were made. Among those engaged in this hazardous and laborious field of labor were Fathers Garnier and Chatelain, who, although almost overwhelmed by physical exhaustion and its attendant miseries, fought the good fight with great bravery, extracting much moral comfort from their labors, and rejoicing because they were enabled to administer the Sacrament of Baptism to many dying ones, thus affording divine unction to their speeding souls.

Of the tribes thus visited by the missionaries there were the Byssiriniens[1] (doubtless the Nipissiriniens or Nipissings as the real Algonquins were sometimes called). To these the Fathers refer in their extended memoirs, although later historians, it would seem, were somewhat, if not entirely, uncertain as to which nation they belonged—the Hurons or Algonquins. A little later and no reference whatever is made to them, thus leaving the impression that they were one of the numerous tribes who suffered extermination at the hands of the Iroquois.

The first journeyings of the missionaries among the more distant tribes resulted in little, if anything, to repay them for the dangers and privations they had undergone, or reflect any return for the efforts they had made to implant the germ of a Christian life in their midst. For years they followed out the same dangerous routine, never hesitating, although realizing the imminent peril in which they stood. Moreover, their labors still evidenced the same want of success as when first they ventured forth upon this self-imposed mission. So, even under these most trying conditions, it was not with the stolidity born of despair that they went forth, but with joyful acquiescence, praying, hoping, believing that their work was not in vain, and that it would repay their labors, anxieties and sufferings a hundred fold in the time to come. They felt also that they were accomplishing the commands of their Lord and Savior, who bade them go forth into the world and preach His gospel unto every creature, and that God in His good time would reward their labors with a bountiful harvest. It was indeed a labor of love, of beneficence and of implicit confidence in a divine power, that urged and upheld these noble men in the pathway so void of life's smallest complacency. Another cause that abetted the powers of evil in their warfare upon these missions was to be found in the ever-dreaded presence of the Iroquois, who kept the entire settlement in a continual state of anxiety and excitement.

(1). Byssiriniens, also supposed to be the Nipissiriniens or Nipissings, who lived in the neighborhood of Lake Nipissing, were called the "sorcerers" the reason that more medical men were found among them than among any other tribe. Charlevoix refers to them as the true Algonquins, whom, he assures us, alone had retained the Algonquin language without alteration.

Of this, another writer says: "This was an Algonquin tribe of Nipissings at the lake of that name. They were also called Bissiriniens; and their Huron name was sometimes spelled Askicouaneronons. Like other northern Algonquin nations, they rendezvoused at the lake only in the winter season. During the later wars between the Hurons and Iroquois they withdrew towards Hudson Bay, to avoid the fury of the latter, and there mingled with other nations. In recent years graves and other remains of this tribe have been found on Biscuiting Island and at other points along Lake Nipissing."

This aggressiveness on the part of the Iroquois had naturally been anticipated to a certainty, although it was both hoped and believed that the precautions already taken would prove sufficient in a great measure to impress them with the strength and formidable conditions of the French. In fact everything had been done to cover up and make as little apparent as possible the true condition of the colony. Such hopes, however, proved vain and illusive, the Indians satisfying their already aroused suspicions in regard to the true condition of affairs by making a thorough investigation. The result, as might be expected from a people whose only idea of justice was measured by the power to coerce, was that they determined to await the arrival of a band of Hurons, then on their way to Quebec with a load of furs, and attack and capture them in the very presence of the Governor, thus openly ignoring him, and setting his authority at defiance. This they succeeded in doing, marching away with their prisoners and trophies of war without the settlers being able to raise a hand in defense of the Hurons or their own honor.

This occurred during the month of August, 1637. But there were other and severer trials yet to come. Within a very few months of the time that the foregoing incident occurred, the entire country was visited by an epidemic so virulent in form, and disastrous in result, that it threatened to exterminate the entire population. Nor were its depredations by any means limited to the natives of the soil, the French being fully as subject to its attacks as were the Indians. With the former, however, there were but few indeed who succumbed, while with the Indians it in a majority of cases proved fatal. This difference in conditions, as will readily be surmised, was largely owing to the effect of the altogether more efficient nursing given to their invalids by the French, while on the other hand, though skillful and adept in the handling and treatment of wounds and fractures, the Indians knew absolutely nothing of internal diseases, their cause or treatment, and were, therefore, as in this instance, totally at the mercy of the pestilence. But the very fact of their want of success in treating their patients, while the French were in almost every instance successful, in itself proved a means of benefiting the missionaries and advancing them in the estimation of the savages. For even with all there was to command their attention during this period of affliction, the Indians found time to watch the French in their manipulation of the stricken, and to form an opinion of the value of their methods.

Heretofore anything unknown or unthought of by them, no matter of how necessary or common occurrence it might be, was attributed to witchcraft, and, as such, regarded with fear and hatred. As such, as remarked elsewhere, were deemed the most ordinary vocations of life, while in the performance of their religious duties the poor missionaries were often compelled to seek out some isolated spot where the ban of condemnation and consequent intolerant usage could not be put upon them. But in this instance superstition made ready place for art, while success verily trampled upon those bonds of ignorant unbelief which regulated to a great extent the Indian mind with unrestricted vigor. But even this modicum of success proved a welcome and valuable acquisition, inasmuch as to it alone was due that change in feeling without which the condition of the French would have become desperate indeed. But the Indians saw the French recovering when their own people were dying with rapidity which threatened absolute annihilation; they watched, and by so doing learned to treat their ailing ones in a manner so appreciably better that the percentage of fatalities was quickly and noticeably reduced. They noticed, too, that the missionaries hovered ever around the pallets of the sick, fearing nothing, and in fact oftentimes themselves becoming victims of the dread complaint.

Here, then, they discovered an exhaustless amount of fearlessness, constancy and gentleness which touched their savage nature in a manner entirely different to anything they had formerly experienced in the way of friendliness for the black gowns. It was something, in fact, that they could readily understand, could measure as to its value, or, if need be, condemn. To these creatures of stoical nature, among whom the power for physical endurance was of all powers the most admired; who learned from earliest youth to suffer and be silent, and who listened to the cry for mercy with derision, the reckless generosity of the missionaries did not appeal in vain. They saw these tireless workers labor without faltering, toil without murmuring; anxious, zealous and earnest in their ministrations, and, above all, by artful methods and generous remedies restoring to a renewed tenure of life many who had seemed hopelessly stricken. And it appealed all the more powerfully to them in that they had a most abiding and inherent fear of the disease themselves.

So, by one means and another, although they were not altogether to be regarded as the result of considerate and logical reasoning, the Indians came to regard the missionaries in a manner entirely different from that which had heretofore dominated their views concerning them and their coming among them. Nor was this the opinion of a few of the higher and broader minded, but may rather be regarded as the consentient opinion of the people.[1]

(1). According to the writings and records of the Jesuit Fathers pertaining to this particular period (1637), is would seem that this of

But this most admirable regard for the spiritual condition of the savages, as well as the much expressed desire for their immediate conversion to the Catholic faith, was by no means limited to those occupying that particular locality, where this work of progress was being carried on. On the contrary, it was far reaching in its purpose, finding many godly and zealous adherents throughout Europe. Most particularly, of course, was this the case in France, where the motive first originated, and from which country the greater portion of this work had thus far emanated. This spirit of desire was naturally to a great extent evoked through the efforts of the Jesuit Fathers, whose letters to their native country were full of hope and promise for the undertaking and evangelization of the Indians. Thus they represented, as their firm conviction, that a strong hold might be gained on these people, in a spiritual sense, through the medium of relief which might be afforded to their temporal requirements. This was hardly to be considered in the light of a new idea, neither was it to be regarded as a novel one, except so far as it might pertain to the case in question, where the same means applied in reducing a wild beast to a reasonable state of submission was in this instance used for inculcating the doctrine of civilization in the savage. However, be that as it may, the cause was of sufficient interest to awaken the people of France to a sense of their duty as Christians and promulgators of the true faith. Thus inspired, many individuals readily contributed to the undertaking whatever they could afford, while religious organizations in Paris, as well as throughout the entire country, made diligent and concerted effort in behalf of the work. There was inaugurated, in fact, a popular movement associated with which were to be found, not only the actual workers and their own immediate supporters, but also a greater number of the nobility and even royalty itself. It was also proposed to broaden the scope in which this work applied, and to that end it was decided to establish a number of benevolent institutions throughout the new colony. This but intensified the interest of all classes of people, the result of the new proposition being that many Sisters of different religious orders tendered their services to the cause, earnestly soliciting their selection as candidates for the position. The priests and their pious associates were also greatly comforted and assisted at this time by the earnest and active support of Commander de Sillery, who was recognized as an ardent and zealous worker in every undertaking which tended to advance the interests of the Church.

Nor was it by word of mouth alone that he qualified his adherence and strict integrity of purpose, taking active participation in whatever of value might be brought to the surface for the advancement of the undertaking. It was then a matter of eminent satisfaction to him when a project for the establishment of an Indian town was broached. This organization, it was proposed, was to consist of Christians and proselytes only, who should be sheltered from depredations of the general enemy—the Iroquois—by the French. It was further stipulated that these Indians should as far as possible be made self-supporting, being taught to till and cultivate the soil, and otherwise provide through more modern channels for their general comfort and support. So heartily, in fact, did de Sillery favor this movement, that he individually incurred the expense of sending a number of artisans to Quebec in 1637 for the purpose of erecting the necessary buildings, and otherwise placing the settlement in perfect working order. In this connection, also, he addressed himself to Father le Jeune, under whose immediate supervision he had placed this force, urging him to take immedate action in the matter. The first thing, of course, was to select a suitable and advantageous location, which was found at a point on the river about four miles above the city of Quebec. Here, then, they began work on this grand and novel undertaking, giving to the place the name of Sylleri, after him whose beneficence had made it possible for them to thoroughly test the feasibility of the plan.

It was not long after the commencement of this work that some of the Indians began to take cognizance of it, inquiring of the missionaries its purpose, and in many other ways exhibiting their interest and curiosity. Some even went so far as to suggest that it would be considered acceptable shelter by them, should the missionaries deem it expedient to devote it to that purpose. On this subject, however, Father le Jeune preferred to remain non-committal, although fully aware of the ultimate disposition to be made of the property. So he told them that he could give no definite answer at that time, but that they must wait with patience till the arrival of the owner and master of the settlement. This uncertainty and delay but increased their desire for possession, a condition altogether in keeping with the wishes of the missionaries.

During the year following, de Sillery gave his consent to the proposed investment, and soon after two large families of the Montagnais took possession of the place, and made their residence there. From that time on there was not the slightest question as to the success of the undertaking, so that within a few years the settlement had grown into a town of considerable size, the entire population of which was composed of Christian Indians.[1]

Of the man who, though he did not project this under-all times was the one when the missionaries experienced the greatest and most persistent persecution. With such undeniable evidence with which to contradict them, it is hardly to be wondered at that the statement is received with considerable allowance; in fact the Relation of 1639 by no means justifies its acceptance.

(1). These were the families of Negabamat and Nenaskoumat. In his account of this enterprise, Charlevoix has given the number of families as twelve, but this, Shea says, is wrong.

taking, furnished the plans and sinews with which it was carried out, there is but little more to be said than has already been intimated—that he was a zealous and consistent Christian, whose hand was ever active in doing good, and whose voice never failed in proclaiming the beauties and advantages of a Christian life. The Chevalier de Sillery was born during the month of December, 1577. He belonged to a wealthy and opulent family, whose prestige, in addition to his own great personal merits, gained for him many positions of trust and confidence within the gift of the King of France. Thus as ambassador from that country to the courts at Madrid and Rome, he was not only regarded for his personal qualifications, but also for the great magnificence in which he lived. At a later date he withdrew from the world, and, receiving orders, thenceforth lived in retirement. A zealous Christian, he proved of great assistance to his friends, St. Vincent de Paul and St. Jane Frances de Chantal, in their works of charity and spiritual reform. He died on September 26th, 1640, and was buried in the Church which he had founded. Many years after (1835), when this property had come into the possession of a Protestant congregation, his body was removed by the Visitation Nuns to their convent in the Rue St. Etienne de Mont, and later to the Rue d'Enfer.

The Indians took very kindly to their new surroundings, following implicitly and with much earnestness the direction of their reverend preceptors and in every particular attempting to vie in their manner and mode of living with the Christian families who surrounded them. This evident desire on their part to do right, was of much comfort and solace to the results accruing from their long and arduous labors. But it must not be forgotten that this most desirable condition of affairs was, to a great extent, brought about by means of the laity, whose model and exemplary manner of living was duly accepted by the savages as the true type of a perfect and Christian life.

Of this cause and the success which followed, Charlevoix says: "The neighborhood of Quebec and the exemplary conduct of its people contributed not a little to ground the new inhabitants of Sylleri in piety, and inspire them with a kind of government suited to their character. All led a very regular life and most of them displayed a fervor which filled old Christians with shame, impressing them with the importance of not being outstripped in piety and regularity by savage neophites."

Another thing which operated strongly in favor of religious progression at this time was the fact that the earlier French colonists in North America were formed largely of a class of honest and industrious working people, who were ever engaged in performing the duties of their calling, while a few of higher class came there from choice, desiring to live a more retired life and thus be enabled to devote a still greater portion of their time to religion. Of course, as in every state and condition, the unleaven to a certain extent was bound to appear, so that, occasionally, men were to be met with in Quebec who, as the saying goes, "had left their country for their country's good." These, however, came in such insignificant numbers and their actions were so carefully watched, that not the slightest difficulty resulted from their presence. On the contrary, we may even go so far as to say that quite a number of them, being thus brought under the influences of Christian life, sought consolation in its teachings and thereafter became consistent and respected members of the community.

It will therefore be readily gathered from the foregoing that the patient labors of the missionaries were already reaping an abundant harvest, while the seed which had at first apparently been planted on stony and unfruitful soil, was yielding of returns an hundred-fold.

There is a certain line of progression which marks the growth of every community where the refining influences of civilization have been brought to bear upon it. One condition succeeds the other with almost the same regularity that marks the revolution of the earth upon its axis, or notes the flight of time. In life, there is really nothing new, so that, taken as a whole, the growth of the Catholic parish in our country to-day is but the repetition, perhaps, in a somewhat modified form, of spiritual evolution or progression two or three hundred years ago. Then, even as now, a nucleus was necessary, although while at the present time it consists of men already imbued with the spirit of Christianity, which then lay deep and dormant within the unawakened souls of the untutored savage. Then, too, as now, the missionary Fathers came to labor and impress, only, that formerly, the work was accomplished through a thorough arousing and regeneration of the spiritual system while now their coming is always anxiously awaited; and so the similarity continues; the congregation is formed, mission established and church erected. Here, then, the pastor finds something tangible to work upon; a body of people banded together for the purpose of upholding and perpetuating the faith of their Fathers, and, as though to give further assurance of their earnestness and sincerity in the work, giving and dedicating a structure to the service of Almighty God. Then in the natural course of evolution comes the school, that equalizing and uplifting force which clears the mind of its numberless inherent sophistries and leads it to that higher plane from which alone the good, the pure and beautiful may be appreciated and understood.

And so in this new colony, where under the most advantageous conditions the surroundings were but crude and prospect most uncertain, having obtained a momentary foothold and created, as it were, a general feeling of moral responsibility among the people, the missionaries turned their attention and bent their energies towards the establishment of a school. In connection with this undertaking, it was also deemed advisable, if possible, to arrange for the erection of a hospital. In doing this, their purpose was evidently twofold, the object, so far as the hospital was concerned, being to care for the colonists and Indians alike, while the school would afford an education to the children of the latter as well as to those of the French.

The erection and establishment of a hospital at once found favor among the people of France, a number of whom worked diligently in behalf of the undertaking. Foremost among these was the Duchess de Aiguillon, a niece of Cardinal Richelieu, who desired to become foundress of the institution. As a consequence of all this, three Sisters of the Hospital Nuns of Dieppe were chosen, although many others cheerfully urged their claims for choice, and prepared to start for this new and untried field of labor, as soon as the first opportunity should be afforded them to do so.

As regards the school, however, matters did not, by any means, progress so favorably, which may be accounted for by the fact that the company controlling the settlement at that time deemed the undertaking an inexpedient one and therefore not to be considered.

Naturally enough, most of the prominent individuals who were subsequently approached with a view of obtaining their assistance in the furthering of this matter were also disinclined to act upon the proposition or, for that matter, give it any consideration whatever. Matters therefore looked exceedingly unpromising, and the effort for the time being, at least, was about to be abandoned, when a widow lady, Mme. de la Peltrie, assumed the responsibility of the undertaking, devoting both time and fortune to that purpose. This noble and self-sacrificing creature, whose memory will ever be revered by pious Catholics, was a daughter of Mr. de Chauvigny, Sieur de Vaubegon, and was born at Alencon in 1603. When seventeen years of age she married Charles de Grival Seigneur de la Peltrie, a gentleman of the house of Tourvoys, who died five years later. She never became an Ursuline, but devoted her life and services to them, and finally died in the convent at Quebec on Nov. 18th, 1671, aged sixty-eight years.

Having fully decided upon the undertaking, Madame de la Peltrie exhibited commendable activity in carrying out the details and making all necessary arrangements for immediate departure. She at once left Alencon, where she had previously resided, and proceeded to Paris, there to complete whatever business there was to be done regarding the establishment of the Ursuline[1] Order in New France. From Paris she went to Tours, where she obtained the assistance and co-operation of two Sisters, and thence to Dieppe, where she secured still another to add to her little family.

Here, too, she ordered a vessel to be in readiness, in which they embarked on the 4th of May, 1639, for their new home. On the same vessel also sailed Father Bartholomew Vimond, who was on his way to Quebec to succeed Father le Jeune as Superior-General of the missions, having for his companions an additional force of priests and proselytes for the missionary field. The party at length arrived safely at its destination, landing at Quebec on August 1st, 1639.

With the arrival of this much-needed and valuable contingent in the colony, new life was infused into the people, each of whom seemed to fully realize the importance of the acquisition as a means of still farther impressing upon the Indian mind the benefits to be gained through a firm alliance with the French. They also created additional interest among them by demonstration, showing how anxious these people must have been for their spiritual condition, and how self-sacrificing, too, to brave the perils of a long and tedious journey, leaving the calm tranquillity and even luxury of their former homes to care for them, and to instruct their children in the ways of civilization and in the Christian religion. Nor was such an appeal as this made without effect; even the mind of the untutored savage seemed to a certain extent to grasp the wonderful self-denial which such action meant.

The arrival of this band of workers was the cause of great and unrestricted joy to the people of the colony, who regarded their coming in the light of new tryst with the motherland, and general benefaction. So they received them with demonstrations of great rejoicing, the entire population turning out to bid them welcome. Nor were the newcomers less affected than those among whom they came. Here, then, Madame de la Peltrie and those accompanying her took up their life's work, devoting wealth, energy, comfort and even life itself to the regeneration of the savages and proper education of their children. Here, too, Madame de la Peltrie was in her element, and being a woman of sound judgment and exalted views, proved an ideal leader in this most noble undertaking. Already she had given her fortune to the cause—a slight test to one who had never desired to be rich—but this was not enough in her estimation, so that she further emphasized her determination by resolving to spare herself in nothing where the salvation of souls was to be effected. But aside from her power as a moral force, she was an ever present and active factor in the more material undertakings of the colonists. Thus it was no uncommon occurrence to see her tilling the soil, while in her goodness of heart she quickly bereft herself of absolute necessaries, in order that the children might be properly clothed. "Such and other acts of heroic charity," says the historian Charlevoix, "have forever endeared her memory to all New France, where the fruit of her good work is perpetuated to the great advantage of all that colony."

(1). In the Brief Relation (1632-33) of his journey to New France, Father le Jeune makes reference to this Order as follows: "We are under peculiar obligations to the benevolence of Monsieur le Curé of Havre, and of the Ursuline Mothers; for as we had not foreseen our departure, if Father Charles Lallemant of Roüen and these good people in Havre had not assisted us in the hasty preparations we were obliged to make, we should without doubt have been very badly off."

The Order of the Ursulines was founded Nov. 25, 1535, at Brescia, by Angela Merici. To the three vows of St. Augustine it added a fourth, requiring the instruction of girls. It became established in France by the end of the sixteenth century, thence spreading to Germany.

Here, then, we find in the year 1639 representatives of two great religious orders—the Ursulines at Quebec and Hospital Nuns at Sylleri—well established and in a position to wonderfully assist in the advancement of moral progress and its extension throughout the land. At the latter place the effect was really marvelous, the number of Indians drawn to that settlement by the establishment of the Sisters there increasing day by day.

But there were many drawbacks to contend with, one of the greatest being the limited quarters afforded by the convents. Be it said, however, to the honor of the Sisters, that whatever distress and inconvenience was caused by this unhappy lack of accommodation, it was all cheerfully and uncomplainingly borne by them, nor were its ill effects felt at any time by either patients or pupils. But there were harder trials yet in store for these tender-hearted souls which bid fair to decimate the entire colony. The small-pox came, and, having first attacked the Ursuline seminary, spread with great rapidity throughout the settlement. As quickly as discovered, those attacked were conveyed to the hospital, but so rapidly had the epidemic spread, and so many were its victims, that soon there was no further available space to be had. Through all of these fearful experiences the good Sisters staid faithfully at their posts, doing as best they could with the limited means at their command and caring for all with the utmost solicitude and devotion. It was indeed a matter of wonder how it could be possible for these people of gentle birth and tender nurturing, to so happily withstand the extreme change in life, climate, food and general surroundings as they did. It is still more surprising to learn that, in addition to the distress as well as the multitudinous duties thus put upon them, they also found time to acquaint themselves to no inconsiderable extent with the Indian language. It is not to be wondered at, then, that the tender solicitude exhibited by the Sisters for the wants and comforts of others, and entire forgetfulness of self, should have had very marked effect upon the people, and thereby lent a generous impulse to religious force throughout the colony. Among the Indians at this time, changes were particularly noticeable, and so generally apparent did it become that great hope was expressed that ere long the entire people would come under the dominion of the Church. In fact, as the historian has said: "The outlay made at Sylleri to gather the newly converted and those who were anxious to be instructed; the convent school and hospital; all of the missions reinforced by unwearied men who never spared themselves; the piety and charity of the chief settlers, who refused nothing to aid them, even to lending their own beds for the use of the sick, made this one of the most precious moments which it is of importance to seize, and which never returns when allowed to pass without being improved to the utmost."

About now it also seemed to have become the general opinion in France that a more active interest should and must be taken in the welfare of the colony; that it afforded an abundant and resourceful field to those who for want of means, or from desire to obtain still greater acquisitions, were compelled to seek out a new home, and that everything possible should be done to exploit the advantages thus offered, and, if possible, impel a tide of emigration in that direction. It was, of course, regarded as a certainty that an increase in the population meant an improvement in business, which to the thrifty people of the French Capital and other cities of note was a most desirable theme to dwell upon. But in spite of all this public opinion, which augured so well for the colony, the Company of One Hundred associates and others, in fact, who should have shown the most evident interest in the settlement, became noticeable for their lack of appreciation and want of sympathy or whatever it may be proper to call it.

Hence the situation was reversed from what, under normal conditions, it should have been. The missions and other religious institutions proved the sole support of the colony, which with a properly conditioned environment should have supported them. This really placed the colony in a rather precarious condition, as the very resources from which it drew its sustenance were themselves dependent upon a well-meaning, though uncertain patronage. Indeed, this unfortunately proved to be the case so that it was but a short time afterwards that there was a perceptible diminution in the resources of the missionaries, which was sadly felt by that zealous and struggling little community.

In addition to these most natural causes for disquiet, which with men of less pertinacity and noble intent would undoubtedly have had a most disheartening effect, fresh disturbances arose among the Indian tribes, resulting in a renewal of fierce hostilities among them. In this again, however, the Iroquois must be recorded as having had the upper hand, a natural consequence to their career in the field, which, as we have heretofore related, was one of unqualified and continuous success. But although the Hurons, disheartened and subdued by many consecutive and crushing defeats, were wont to be regarded as entirely inadequate to the task of maintaining their own against such a powerful and aggressive enemy, their inherent habits of bravery maintained to a remarkable degree, causing them to throw off that indifferent and lethargic tone which had marked their general condition for some time past, and even aided them in regaining a portion of that prestige for which they were heretofore renowned.

It was during this last outbreak that an incident transpired which marked an epoch in the annals of missionary labor. There had been a fierce encounter between the Hurons and a prowling body of the Iroquois, which had resulted disastrously for the latter, one of whom fell into the hands of the victorious enemy. He was brought back to the Huron village and burned, but before passing through this most fearful ordeal he was baptized in due form by Father de Brebeuf, who was present, and an eye witness to that which followed. This was undoubtedly the first case on record where any one of the Iroquois nation had submitted to the influence of religion to such an extent, and, therefore, it is deemed worthy of more than passing notice at the present time. Of this occurrence, the historian, Charlevoix, writes: "As soon as the prisoner reached the village, the sachems held a council to decide his fate, and the conclusion was that he should be put into the hands of an old chief in order to replace, if he so chose, one of his nephews taken by the Iroquois, or to dispose of him as he saw fit. On the other hand, Father de Brebeuf was no sooner informed of what was passing than he hastened to the prisoner, determining not to leave his side till he had opened to him the way of salvation. He first perceived him amid a band of warriors, clothed in a new beaver robe, with a wampun belt around his neck and another around his head, like a diadem. He was made to sing without giving him a moment's relaxation, but he was not ill-treated. What most astonished the missionary was that he was as tranquil and had a countenance as serene as if he had suffered nothing, or was sure of his life; yet he had endured much in the first days of his captivity, and had more to fear than to hope from the future.

Father de Brebeuf was invited to make him sing according to custom, but he excused himself, and approaching a little nearer, he remarked that one of his hands had been crushed between stones and one of his fingers torn off; that two fingers of the other hand were gone, cut off with an axe; and that the only dressing applied to these wounds was a few leaves bound with strips of bark. In addition to this, the joints of his arms were burnt, and on one he had a deep gash. He had been reduced to this state on his march, for from the moment he had entered the first Huron town he had received only good treatment. Every cabin had feasted him, and a young woman had been assigned him to act as his wife. In a word, to him among these Indians no one would suppose that the people who showed him so much friendship would be so many demons furiously tormenting him.

Father de Brebeuf, who had free liberty to converse with him, began by telling him that, although he could do nothing to mitigate his pains, he wished at least to teach him to suffer them—not precisely as a brave, to acquire a glory that would be useless to him after death, but from a more solid and elevated motive; that this motive was the well-grounded hope that his pains would be followed by a perfect and endless happiness. He then briefly explained to him the most essential articles of Christian doctrine, and he found him not only docile, but, contrary to the usual custom of Indians, very attentive and taking pleasure in what was told him. He profited by this good disposition, and believed that he saw Grace working powerfully in the heart of this captive. He completed his instruction, baptized him and called him Joseph.

He then obtained permission to take him with him every evening and keep him with him during the night. He would have desired more, but the fate of the prisoner did not depend on those from whom he could have obtained his deliverance. His wounds gave him much to suffer, as they swarmed with worms. He earnestly asked that they should be taken out; but it was impossible to do this, the vermin burying themselves at every attempt to extract them. The feasts continued always in his name; and he did the honors, singing till he was hoarse. He was then taken from town to town, compelled to sing all the way; he had no rest except when Father de Brebeuf or some other missionary had permission to entertain him. Then he was not only interrupted, but all the Indians gathered round to hear the Father, and many profited by what they heard.

At last they reached the village of the chief to whom the prisoner had been given, and he had not yet declared the decision to which he had come. Joseph appeared before this sovereign arbiter of his destiny with the countenance of a man to whom life and death are indifferent. He was not long in suspense as to what was to befall him. "Nephew," said the old chief, "you cannot conceive the joy I feel in learning that you are mine. I had imagined that he whom I had lost had risen again, and I had resolved to put you in his place. I had already prepared a mat for you in my cabin, and it gave me great pleasure to think that I was to spend the rest of my days with you; but the condition in which I see you forces me to change my resolution. It is evident that with the pain and trouble you endure life can be but a burden, and you will doubtless thank me for shortening it. It is those who mutilated you thus who put you to death. Courage, then, nephew. Prepare for this evening. Show that you are a man, and be not depressed by fear of torture."

The prisoner heard this as though it did not concern him. He replied in a firm tone, "this goes well." Then a sister of the one whom he was to replace came and offered him food, as if he had really been her brother, serving him with every appearance of the most sincere and cordial friendship. The old chief himself caressed him, put his pipe in his mouth; and seeing him all drenched with sweat, wiped it off, and gave him all possible marks of truly fatherly affection.

Towards noon the prisoner made his farewell feast at the expense of his uncle; and all being assembled, he said: "Brothers, I am going to die; enjoy yourselves boldly around me; think that I am a man; and rest assured that I fear neither death nor any torture you can inflict upon me." He then sang, several warriors joining with him, after which food was served up. There is no invitation to these banquets; everyone has a right to go; but most of them bring no platter, and come as mere spectators. The banquet over, the prisoner was taken to the place of torture, a cabin set apart for this use. Each village has one of this class, styled "the cabin of blood or of severed heads," and it is always the cabin of a war-chief. As soon as a prisoner sets foot in it, it is no longer in the power of any one to spare his life. It is not, however, always the place of execution, which may be performed anywhere.

Towards eight o'clock at night eleven fires were lighted about six feet apart. All arranged themselves in line on either side, the old men behind on a sort of platform, and the young men, who were to be actors, in the front rank. As soon as the prisoner entered, an old man advanced, exhorted the youth to do well, adding that this was an important action and that Areskouy[1] would look down upon them. This short harangue was received with applause, or rather with yells wild enough to strike terror into the stoutest. The captive at the same time appeared amid the assembly, between two missionaries, and the cries redoubled as he was seen. He was next seated on a mat, and his hands bound.

He then rose and went around the cabin, dancing and singing his death-song. This done, he returned to his place, and sat down on the mat again. Then a war chief took off his robe, and, showing him thus naked to the assembly, said: "Such a one (naming another chief) takes this captive's robe; the inhabitants of such a village will cut off his head, and give it with an arm to such a one (whom he named again), who will make a feast of it." Then began a most tragic and horrible scene; and Father de Brebeuf, who was present at the whole, gives a description that makes one shudder. This missionary induced the executioners from time to time to give their victim some relaxation. He profited by it to exhort him to offer his sufferings to a God who could reward him for them, and who had himself undergone for us every indignity and torment.

While he spoke, all kept silence and listened attentively. Joseph replied to all as though he felt no pain; and during his whole torture nothing escaped him which his charitable instructors could rebuke. He even spoke at times of the affairs of his tribe as though he were in the midst of his family and friends. His tortures were prolonged, because the old man had declared that it was important that the rising sun should find him still alive. As soon as day broke he was led out of the village and no longer spared. At last, when they saw him about to expire, for fear he should die otherwise than by steel, as his sentence required, they cut off his foot, hand and head. The distribution was made, as had been directed, and the rest of the body was put into the kettle."

(1). Areskouy, Areskoui or Agreskoui, a deity of Iroquois mythology, for whom claims of supremacy were made. "His most prominent attributes are those of a god of war. He was often invoked, and the flesh of animals and of captive enemies was burned in his honor. Like Jouskeha, he was identified with the sun, and he is perhaps to be regarded as the same being under different attributes. Among the Iroquois proper or "Five Nations" there was also a divinity called Tarangowagon or Teharoniawagon, whose place and character it is very difficult to determine. In some traditions he appears as the son of Jouskeha, who had a prodigious influence; for it was he who spoke to men in dreams. The Five Nations recognized still another superhuman personage—plainly a deified chief or hero. This was Taounyawatha or Hiawatha, said to be a divinely appointed messenger who made his abode on earth for the political and social instruction of the chosen race, and whose counterpart is to be found in the traditions of the Peruvians, Mexicans and other primitive nations."—Parkman.

Instances of sacrifices to Areskoui were by no means infrequent. One is mentioned by Father Jogues in a letter dated August 5, 1643, in which he refers to an occurrence witnessed by him, when a female prisoner was burned to Ariskoui, and two bears offered to him to atone for the sin of not burning more captives.

Regarding the Indian deities there is quite a diversity of opinion, some writers going so far as to assume that Areskoui is the Devil and Tarenyowagon, God. Parkman, however, tells us that the Iroquois name for God is Hawenniio, sometimes written Owayneo., which word used in that sense was wholly due to the interpretation put upon it by the missionaries. Hawenniio is an Iroquois verb, meaning, he rules, he is master, but there is, the historian assures us, no Iroquois word which in its primitive meaning can be interpreted the Great Spirit or God.

Early writers, we are told, failed to discover any trace among the aborgines of a belief in a Supreme Being, although it is said that the Foxes and Sacs believed in a great genie who lived not far from the French settlements.

IN nearly every walk of life, we are at times confronted by conditions so seemingly at variance with our interests and intentions, that we are prone to look upon them as distinctly antagonistic to our general interests and well-being, and therefore treat them with that careful deliberation which marks the course invariably pursued by people of conservative ideas. But these deviations are, as a rule of rare occurrence and short duration, while in many instances they prove to be a means to the end which we have most properly mapped out for our own use and business direction. How different were the conditions surrounding the lives and labors of the missionary fathers! Here they were assailed on all hands by a state of affairs from which no possible or satisfactory deduction could be drawn. They found themselves compassed about by people whose ways were utterly at variance with anything with which they had heretofore been familiar, whose thoughts had been formed in a different mould, whose minds were teeming with numberless superstitions, whose sense of justice was mosaic, whose reasoning powers were limited to those of animal instinct, whose natures partook largely of the brutal and the bestial, and whose very lives proved an ever-existing state of uncertainty and bewilderment. On the other hand, they displayed a really genuine affection for their children, and showed a ready appreciation of any kindly or generous act. In the latter case, however, this sense of acknowledgment was limited by the scope of their understanding, which was strikingly deficient. In religious matters, also, there was that same peculiarity, which to the eyes of the missionaries made the question of their moral regeneration one full of vexatious perplexities. For instance, they would stop while inflicting the most hideous tortures upon an enemy, to listen with patience, docility and respect to the missionaries' story of the Cross, and then with unabated vigor renew the attack upon their quivering victim. It was undoubtedly these repeated and ofttimes unexpected transitions from good to bad which solaced the Jesuits with the belief that there must be a moral tone underlying the peculiar characteristics of these people, which, though at that time dormant, would ultimately result in a vigorous as well as generous fruition.

In the Huron missions we find a plentiful example of this state of contradictions with which the good fathers were called upon to cope. They found themselves ever confronted and even dismayed with these extremes of good and evil, being at times surprised almost overwhelmingly by the seeming conscientious interest shown by the Indians in their own regeneration, while on the other hand their vindictive and vicious excesses would almost lead the missionaries to believe that their efforts as a means of saving these depraved and misguided creatures had been entirely in vain. It was, in fact, in a state of endless suspense that they from time to time, under the most painful and harrowing conditions, brought themselves to indite long accounts of their daily experiences among the aborigines, and the lives which they were in consequence compelled to endure. These writings or histories were received with unbounded satisfaction by the people of their native land, who devoured them with interest. This interest was made all the more apparent because they appreciated the earnestness and honesty, the candor and simplicity, with which they were evidently written. It was, in fact, in a spirit of self-abnegation that these experiences were given to the world, in which it was made evident that all the work attempted and accomplished and all the sufferings endured, had been rendered in the service of God, and for the good of mankind.

Of this peculiar condition of affairs, the historian Charlevoix says: "The details they give in their letters are truly touching; and these letters are written with so much simplicity and candor, that we cannot be surprised that they excited the interest of so many people of piety in the conversion of the heathen in Canada. On the one hand, we see savages, drawn by the secret impressions of grace and by the charity of their masters in Christ, presenting themselves in crowds for baptism; numbers of Iroquois entered, like this one described, into the way of salvation and by the same gate as he, and showed till the last sigh sentiments that touch their very enemies; finally unhoped-for conversions, where the finger of God makes itself felt even by the most incredulous.

"On the other hand, they showed the preachers of the Gospel, ever on the point of falling victims of a popular outbreak, excited by some unforseen incident; by the resentment of a father who imagined that the prayer or baptism caused the death of his child; by the caprice of some ill-disposed man, in whom a pretended dream or evil report has heated the bile or disordered the imagination."

But it was by no means at the hands of the Hurons alone that the missionaries experienced all of their harsh and discourteous treatment, as will readily be realized by what follows. Of this particular incident, which clearly demonstrates the viciously superstitious condition of this entire people, Parkman relates: "Father Francis Du Peron came up the Ottawa in a Huron canoe in September, 1638, and was well treated by the Indian owner of the vessel. Lalemant and Le Moyne, who had set out from Three Rivers before him, did not fare so well. The former was assailed by an Algonquin of Allumette Island, who tried to strangle him in revenge for the death of a child which a Frenchman in the employ of the Jesuits had lately bled but had failed to restore to health by the operation."

Another authority tells the story in this way: "Father Jerome Lalemant,[1] brother of Father Charles Lalemant, of whom I have already spoken, was on his way to the Hurons by the way of the great Ottawa River. He met some Algonquins who had pitched their cabins on the banks of that river, and his Huron guide thought fit to stop some time with them. The missionary took the opportunity to recite his breviary, and retired a little apart. He had scarcely begun when he was called and taken to a cabin. Here he was told to sit down beside an Algonquin, whose dark and angry brow heightened the sinister expression of a malignant face.

"The missionary was no sooner seated beside him, than the Indian, looking at him askance, reproached him that a Frenchman passing through his village had bled one of his sick relatives and killed him. With these words he burst out in fury, seized an ax with one hand and a rope with the other, and told the missionary to prepare to die, to appease the manes of his kinsmen, and that he only gave him the choice of the mode of his death. The Father could only use reason with the madman, but he was in no condition to hear it. He even sprung on the missionary and endeavored to strangle him, but either his fury had not reached its height, or left him too little self-possession to know what he was doing. His cord got entangled in the collar of the missionary's cassock, so that, though he pulled with all his might, he could not do him much harm.

"After toiling in vain, he perceived his stupidity and wished to loosen the collar, but failing to do so, raised the hatchet to tomahawk the missionary, who escaped from his hands. The Hurons stood by, unmoved spectators of this scene, as a thing that did not concern them in the least; but two Frenchmen, attracted by the noise, rushed violently on the Algonquin, and were going to kill him, when Father Lalemant interposed, representing the consequences that might ensue from the death of this man. He added that it was better to tell the Hurons plainly that the Governor-General would hold them responsible if anything befell a missionary confided to them; and the Frenchmen followed the advice.

"The Hurons then held a council, after which they told the Algonquins that Father Lalemant was under their safeguard. This declaration at first had no great effect, and as those who made it went no further without sustaining the Frenchmen, and the Algonquin was well attended, the missionary was still for a time in very great danger. At last, seeing the savage a little calmer, either because weariness had mitigated his fury, or because he had really never intended to go to extremes, the Hurons told him that if he would release the Father they would cover the dead man—that is to say, would make him some present—to console him for the loss of his kinsman. This proposal completely calmed him. The Hurons gave him some furs, calculating shrewdly that they would be no loosers, and at once embarked with the missionary.

"This was not the only unpleasant adventure that befell Father Lalemant on this voyage, and there was not one of his fellow missionaries who did not experience something of the kind."

In spite of this, however, the missionaries continued with zealous persistence to offer the consolation of religion to their savage persecutors, and to do everything in their power to win them from their gloomy and unrepentant condition to one of moral ascendency and spiritual progress. It was, in fact, their sole object and aim in life to humbly and uncomplainingly bear the cross and its attendant sufferings, rejoicing even when in direst necessity, did the result but strengthen their hopes by bringing a sinner to the foot of the cross. Call it what you please; view it from whatever standpoint you may desire; regard it with general commiseration, or frown upon it as a needless waste of energy and life, and yet as age makes dim the vista of its accomplishment, and the personality of those who wrought is lost amidst the length and breadth of centuries, the echo of their still resounding foot-falls, the breath of their ceaseless exhortations, the sigh of their martyred and departing spirits, live on to tell the magnitude of the undertaking and the glory of its achievement.

(1) The spelling of this name is somewhat diversified, some writers using but one, while others prefer the use of two l's, thus, Lalemant, Lallemant.

They went forth to battle for the right, and having placed their hand to the plough, not one moment of time remained to them but was devoted to the cause they so faithfully upheld. From early morning until late at night, they labored continuously, calmly enduring whatever fate might be their portion, and sparing themselves in nothing, so long as the work be carried forward to an abundant harvest. In this great undertaking in which each had his allotted duties to perform, some, we are told, visited the sick, others went out into the fields and cultivated the soil, while some persisted in their missionary labors, journeying throughout the country from town to town, and thus affording those located at the remotest distances from the mission an opportunity of acquiring some knowledge of the Christian religion and its purposes.

The very fact of this activity on the part of the missionary Fathers had its good effect, for the reason that through their continued presence among them the Indians became more accustomed to their manners and actions so that they no longer regarded their every movement as having some sinister intent. Gradually, indeed, their useless prejudices gave way before the refining influences of civilization. They readily agreed to the baptism of their children, and though tenacious of previous customs, became more susceptible to religious influences themselves when ailing. In fact, so tractable had many of them become that instances where individuals absented themselves from the Sacraments for an entire week became the exception. Then again the Indians had come to appreciate the wonderful healing qualities of the medicines offered to them when sick, learned to welcome the missionaries' gentle ministrations, and in many different ways expressed their confidence and good will. Thus an altogether better feeling was aroused among the natives, which resulted to a certain extent in bettering their condition by causing them to not only see the fallacy of many of their superstitious views and customs, but to totally abandon many of them for ways more decorous and in every respect better suited to their more enlightened condition.

During this period of evolution, one at least of the missionaries remained in the village or town, conducting religious services with exacting regularity, maintaining the schools and attending to the moral enlightenment of the many Indians who from curiosity or an earnest desire to obtain a more thorough knowledge of the Christian religion continually thronged about the mission. It was indeed an interesting study to note the workings of these minds, so immature in all pertaining to a civilized understanding as well as working under the bonds of an education and surroundings fraught with the superstition of generations. And so towards the close of each recurring day they gathered together in solemn conference, making known their individual doubts, as well as impressions concerning what they had heard or had been taught. These occasions pertain more especially to meetings led by the neophytes and proselytes, which were always conducted in the little mission chapel, for when a general meeting was to be called one of the missionaries with bell in hand would go around through the entire village and immediate vicinity, calling earnestly upon every one to follow him, and listen to the words about to be spoken for their benefit. Generally speaking, a large number would gather together on such occasions and listen respectfully to the exhortations of the missionaries, and the Relations tell us that but few indeed were the occasions when a number were not won over to the cause of true religion.

While following along this line of thought, it may not be amiss to make a special reference to the many obstacles thrown in the way of the missionaries in their efforts to convert the Indians of the Northwest. One writer insists that such an explanation is necessary from the fact that there were many to be found who implicitly believed in the statement that the opposition met with by the missionaries was neither so powerful nor far-reaching as had been asserted. As regards his own views, however, he believes that he has at least done justice to all, and that "those who are of the persuasion that the Faith has made no progress among those Indians," cannot accuse him of having "dissembled them," while he feels equally certain that he cannot be charged with "exaggerating the energies, the sufferings, and the perseverance of the apostolic laborers, who have irrigated with their sweat and blood this part of the vineyard, which the Father of the family had confided to them." He, however, goes on to say: "All New France for more than a century renders so public a testimony to the severe and truly apostolic lives which they led, and the eminent sanctity of many, that it cannot be allowed to doubt, and is impossible to deny."

Such unreasonable doubters might in all fairness be called upon for an explanation as full and unreserved as that which has marked the course of those whose writings and authorities they have sought to belittle. The position taken by them, however, is most ably stated and answered by Charlevoix, whose views upon that subject we proceed to quote: "Experience teaches us that three sorts of persons will be extremely on their guard on all these points. Those who have known Indians, while agreeing that they are not devoid of a kind of ability, maintain that they are altogether limited as to all that does not fall under their senses, or has no relation to their affairs, of which the sphere is very restricted; when they conclude that it is impossible to impress them sufficiently with the great truths of our religion to make even ordinary Christians. Others, regarding only the dissembling and unstable character of these Indians, imagine that they cannot be gained and fixed so as to ground them in the sincere practice of Christian virtues. A third class proclaim against the very name of all that surpasses the ordinary strength and course of nature; and if we see them daily treat as false the best attested miracles most solemnly approved by the Church, with what hauteur then will they not reject all related in this sort of Christendom composed of neophytes who had, they will say, to be made men before they could be rendered adorers of Jesus Christ!

"But none of these reflect sufficiently. 1st. That the conversion of an infidel as well as the conversion of a sinner can be the work of grace alone, before which obstacles disappear, whether the greatest or the least. It overcame the Jews, to whom Christ crucified was a stumbling block; and the Gentiles, who regarded His cross as folly. It can raise up children to Abraham from the very stones (Matt. iii. 9)—that is to say, make the most lively faith and ardent charity germinate in the hardest hearts and most brutish minds. And should prejudice go so far as to doubt, with some, whether the American Indians are men, may we not answer with the most celebrated doctors of the Church: 'Man and beast Thou wilt preserve, O Lord.' (Ps. xxxv. 7.) Now that the all-powerful operation of grace has wrought these great changes, is it lawful for any man to set limits to it, and say that it could not raise these new Christians to the most eminent sanctity, if they were but faithful to it?

"2d. That the promise made by the Savior of the world to his disciples, whether for the conversion of the world or the supernatural means by which he was to coöperate with them, applies to all who, till the flock of the elect is gathered together, receive a lawful mission to labor for this assembling. If miracles, according to St. Augustine, were necessary in the commencement of the Church, they are by the same principle in all nascent churches; and the power of casting out evil spirits, granted, not to the first preachers of the Gospel alone, but to the faithful, and which forms part of the deposit intrusted to the Church at all times, presupposes the empire of the evil spirits over all who have not received the sacred character imprinted on us by the Sacrament of Regeneration.

"3rd. That of all nations in the world, there is none for which the kingdom of Heaven is not open (Matt. xxviii. 18), nor to which the Apostles and their successors were not expressly enjoined to announce the Gospel—'Teach ye all nations'; and that to attempt to exclude a single one from the benefit of redemption and the treasures of Heaven which it contains, would be to gainsay the whole Bible, which speaks in the most formal terms on the point.

"They may say, then, what they list to dim the glory of the Apostles of the New World, but they cannot deny that they are of those to whom our Lord has said 'Go, teach all nations.' If they did not receive their mission immediately from Him, they received it from those who had authority to give it; and intrusted with an important part of the work, could rely on the same aid, and be assured of the same assistance from Him who promised to be with those sent to preach His law to the end of time. Nay, more. The august ministry with which they were honored would naturally form in our minds this preconceived idea, that they were in general what they should have been; and all that we relate of their heroic virtues—of what they did and suffered in the exercise of the ministry—is so probable that we might be surprised if they were not such men. Only those who venture to assert that, in spite of our Saviour's promise, the gates of hell have prevailed against the Church, can refuse to acknowledge that she has still, and will have to the end, apostles, martyrs, saints, in all conditions and countries to which her sway extends, and that the power of miracles will never fail her."

But it must be remembered that, though quoted extensively as regards their experience among the Huron tribes, the missionaries by no means limited the field of their operations to that people. For be it understood, their scheme of civilization was a general one, promising a generous distribution of religious teachings and administration throughout the entire length and breadth of the land, including, without reserve or one sign of partiality, all tribes and conditions of people. Naturally such an undertaking adopted upon so broad a scale engendered numerous difficulties and augmented dangers inasmuch as not every tribe by any means would prove so tractable and amenable to common-sense reasoning and gentle treatment as the Hurons. Particularly might we cite as an instance of this the Iroquois, who were naturally of a more aggressive and warlike disposition, while their worst passions and strongest animosity had been aroused against the French by Champlain's action in needlessly taking sides in the numerous embroilments which occurred between them and the Hurons. So bitter and deeply seated became their animosity towards the French, that they availed themselves of every possible condition known to their craft and peculiar methods of warfare to utterly annihilate them from the land. Nor did they in carrying out their design resort with any frequency to subterfuge, being plain spoken and openly aggressive. The only marked exception to this rule of which we have any remembrance being in their endeavors to form an alliance with the French, which was undoubtedly done with a view to breaking up the coöperation existing between them and the Hurons, thereby materially weakening the forces of both parties. But that they were sincere in a desire for enduring peace relations, is hardly to be believed, particularly in view of the many atrocities committed by them under the guise of friendship against the Hurons.

We find, then, that at Three Rivers the missionaries were administering to the spiritual condition, not only of the Algonquins, but a number of tribes as well who came to the settlement from the far north, remaining there for a considerable period, or at least so long as the season was propitious. Noticeable among the different tribes or clans were the Attikamegues[1] who lived in the Lake St. Thomas region.

Fortunately these people were of a tractable disposition and seemed easy of direction, although the progress of spiritual inculcation was necessarily slow and laborious. However, they were thoroughly well pleased with the French, and attached themselves to them with a persistency that overruled all attempts to direct their allegiance in other directions. Without doubt a continuous residence among them meant their ready conversion to the Christian faith. But here was where the first difficulty arose, for when the bad weather and dark bitter days of winter set in, they returned to their homes, there to await the coming of another spring. To people of their limited mental capacity, the interim meant not only a lack of progression, but a condition of easy forgetfulness, which left them almost as ignorant and unapproachable as when first the missionaries took their spiritual training in charge. As to the mission at Tadoussac, affairs remained about the same, it continuing to be the chief rendezvous for nearly all of the tribes in that region, although the Montagnes, the Papinachois, the Brisciamites and Porcupines were most prominent, as all did the greater portion of their trading at that post. The population at Tadoussac, however, was largely transient, the greater portion of the Indians congregating there, returning home as soon as their trading had been accomplished. Thus, to facilitate matters, it frequently occurred that the missionaries in their excessive zeal and desire to improve their conditions and carry conversion to the hearts of the savages, would accompany them on their hunting expeditions, which often led them into most gloomy and unapproachable localities, where, owing to the natural surroundings, game was certain to be plentiful. Quite a number of the Iroquois, however, would take up their winter quarters in the neighborhood of Tadoussac, thus affording continuous labor for the missionaries remaining there.

Other favorite resorts much frequented by the natives at certain periods of the year were to be found along the shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and at Miscou Island, where the fishing was known to be excellent. Here undoubtedly a successful and remunerative trading post might have been established, but unfortunately affairs were mismanaged to such an extent that the private gains of individuals overruled the desire for general advancement which should have certainly prevailed among the colonists. In fact, concerted action meant much to them had they but taken the time to give due consideration to that all-important measure, for a series of well conducted posts meant augmented safety to the entire colony, and of that they were lamentably in need. As a result of this indifference on the part of the colonists or a dominating desire for individual accumulation, the settlement utterly failed to obtain any lasting good or even momentary benefit from the business done, the trade in fishing and furs proving particularly unproductive. The Indians who visited this post most frequently and in the largest numbers were the same as those of Acadia, although more generally known as Gaspesians, having acquired that name from the fact that they came from the vicinity of Cape Gaspe, where a majority of vessels first called and anchored. In disposition they were mild, and their confidence was easily acquired, but owing to the nomadic character of the life they led it was next to impossible for the missionaries to make any lasting impressions upon them, or to instruct them in the ways or truths of a religious life.

To men of less thoroughly firm convictions and determination, the results of such labors as those performed by the missionary fathers would have proved discouraging indeed. But with them the effect was entirely different, their every action or remark pertaining to the work evincing the liveliest interest and most worthy and

(1) Of the Algonquin tribes, all on the borders of Canada were gained in process of time to the Faith. A glance at a map will show their chief divisions. Above the St. Lawrence bordering on the Esquimaux of Labrador, and stretching off towards the Hudson Bay, were the Montagnes; below the gulf lay the Gaspesians and Micmacs or Souriquois, occupying the present colonies of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Maine was occupied by the tribe of the Abnakis, the head waters of the Connecticut by the Sokokis, while along the St. Lawrence and Ottawa lay the Algonquins, properly so called, with the Nipissing dwelling on their own lake, and the Attikamegues above Three Rivers.

West still the Ottawas and Chippewas lay near the outlay of Lake Superior, while below lived the Menomonee, the Sac, the Fox, the Kikapoo, the Mascouten; and round the circling shore of Lake Michigan were the numerous clans of the Illinois and Miamis, who have left their names to the territory which they possessed.—Shea's Catholic Missions.

commendable pride in the undertaking. Here in the midst of peril and privation it was no unusual thing for them to yield up their lives uncomplainingly to the Cause, not as butchered innocents or martyrs, as alas far too many have done, but through absolute physical disability to bear up under the self-imposed task and ceaseless round of duties which each of them not only willingly but eagerly took upon themselves to perform. Such an instance is afforded in the case of Father Charles Tursis, who died of hardship and exposure on the island of Miscou, yet in two preceding years of personal effort among the Indians he had succeeded in baptising but one child. Nor were others laboring in the same locality more successful, Fathers Julian Perroult and Martin Lionnes being among the number. The only feasible plan, although one which incurred great danger and privation, was adopted by the missionaries who, fully realizing that it would be impossible to retain the Indians in one locality for any length of time, followed them from place to place, joining in their hunting expeditions, and in fact by every means available maintaining the closest possible relations with them. But even in spite of such heroic efforts and faithful services on their part, the result accomplished seemed meager in the extreme. Finally, when almost despairing of further improvement in the general condition of affairs, means were devised by which the Indians were to be brought into a state of semi-subjection, when it was hoped a firmer and more lasting hold might be obtained upon them. This was undertaken in the adoption of a plan for colonization which was later brought into such admirable and active practice at Sylleri.

But this progressive condition into which certain tribes may be said to have been led, while limited in its sphere and never regarded with any degree of certainty as to its length of duration, was only arrived at after years of unrelenting toil and anxiety. After acquainting themselves pretty thoroughly with the many peculiar characteristics pertaining to the Indians, the missionaries had arrived at the firm conviction that the most effective method of reaching them was through the arts of civilization, and hence that civilization "must precede, or step by step accompany every effort to Christianize them." The same authority goes on to say, "these two agencies may be mutually helpful, but that thus far the religious lesson, the condemnation of the faith which the savages were supposed to hold, and the urgent proffer of a substitute for it, had preceded any actual redemption of the savage from barbarism to a stage of civilization."

At about this time—the year 1640—there was a peculiar custom involved in following out this religious education of the Indians, which has met with somewhat questionable recognition from a number who have written upon that subject. This peculiar characteristic, or innovation as perhaps it might better be termed, was first referred to as the "worship of the cross," which according to Charlevoix is said to have been maintained from time immemorial throughout all of the eastern part of Canada. Regarding this peculiar rite, the historian tells us that M. de St. Vallier, Bishop of Quebec, in a letter which he published on his return from his first visitation to his diocese, speaks of this worship as an attested and indubitable fact. He has it from the Recollect Father Christian le Clerck, who has taken great pains to give it currency, but he had as many gainsayers as he has still enough readers. Moreover, this religious was the only one who had advanced this paradox, known to those who had lived among the Indians before him—many of whom knew their language and studied their traditions better than he was able to do, having discovered nothing of the kind. What misled the historian was apparently this: A letter of Father Julian Perroult, written in 1635, informs us that these Indians took pleasure in imitating all that they saw Europeans do; that having especially remarked that they even made the sign of the cross on themselves, they did the same. When they met a European, they made the sign of the cross on different parts of their body, but without the least idea of its being a mark of religion. This custom, already of long date when Father Christian le Clerck resided among the Gaspesians, and perhaps become a superstitious practice, induced that missionary to believe it was so originally. It may also be that, on questioning some of these Indians, these savages, often confused in their traditions, have perhaps seemed to him to include it amongst their most ancient.

Other authorities pertaining to this somewhat remarkable custom state that Bishop St. Vallier (or Valier as some write it), did not quote Father le Clerck, but gave as his authority Mr. de Fronsac, a son of Mr. Denys, who had obtained his information from an Indian who had died some years previously. Le Clerck states in his Relation de la Gaspesie that in his time the Indians had lost their respect for the Cross, while in the Relation de la Nouvelle France, 1635, Father Perroult says they painted the cross on their persons.

WHILE the missionaries were straining every nerve and incurring all possible kinds of danger in order that the work of religious progression might be carried along, the war between the Iroquois and the Huron tribes was continued with relentless and unabated fury. This caused an unusual amount of anxiety among the people of the colony, who were only too painfully aware of their weak and helpless condition as well as the feelings of antipathy entertained for them by the Iroquois, who were rapidly acquiring an autocratic influence among the other tribes.

It was on one of these predatory incursions of theirs that a war party of the Iroquois fell in with a distantly located family of the Hurons, whom they at once ruthlessly committed to the sword. It was a terrible slaughter, people of both sexes and all ages becoming welcome victims to their merciless oppressors. Indeed, so general was the massacre that but very few escaped to bear the story of their annihilation to the far-off lodges of their people. Here, in a worn-out and generally deplorable condition, they met with the kindliest reception, the people of their tribe, having learned of their misfortunes, vieing with each other in their efforts to care for them and provide them with suitable raiment and provisions, of both of which they were greatly in need. In fact, we are told their actions and expressions of sympathy were such as would have done honor even to a Christian people. The example set by these Indians, although not necessary, still had its beneficial effect, as the missionaries, noting their anxiety and excessive kindness, felt beholden to put forth their best efforts in behalf of the sufferers, as a result of which they were very well cared for indeed. These people, we learn from the Relation of 1639, were known by the name of Weanohronon or Wenrohronon, their country being some eighty leagues from Ossosane on the frontier of the Neuters, which was towards the Iroquois, consequently in New York. Of this occurrence, we are also told that the missionaries felt doubly repaid for whatever efforts they had made in behalf of the sufferers, in noticing the readiness and good faith with which they accepted the teachings of Christianity, giving tacit evidence that their hearts had been sensibly touched and that they had acquired a power of appreciation the like of which none of their kind had ever shown before.

Additional information regarding this welcome and noticeable change states further that, not only were they anxious to be instructed and to learn, but that many men who had most persistently ignored the entreaties of the missionaries and doubted their protestations were now foremost and most earnest in their request to be admitted into the ranks of the proselytes.

But this was by no means the extreme limit of satisfaction that was to follow as a result of that most unhappy event, which had cost them so dearly, for the time was not far distant when they were to reap a revenge in every way more commensurate with the loss they had sustained. In saying this we do not desire to convey the idea that revenge is to be considered as a desirable qualification, but rather that it proved beneficial as a means to an end, for in a subsequent success in arms against the Iroquois the Hurons saw but a sign of approbation from the Deity whose religion they had but recently espoused, and as a result awarded to Him and the missionaries the consideration believed to be due to them for bringing about that favorable condition of affairs.

As stated, it was not long after the reception of these exiles by the main tribe that the advance guard of a number of Huron and Algonquin braves came in contact with a considerably larger party of Iroquois and an encounter resulted in which one of the former was made prisoner. The Iroquois, not desirous of tempting the chances of fate by awaiting the arrival of a larger body, which they suspected were in the vicinity, were about to retreat when they were informed by their prisoner that his entire party was much inferior in numbers to that of his captors. Believing his story, they therefore awaited the coming of the enemy, the result of the meeting being graphically described by Charlevoix, as follows: "The Hurons and Algonquins soon appeared; and the Iroquois, desperate at being thus duped, wreaked fearful but not unexpected vengeance on him who had involved them in such a disaster. The majority then counseled flight; but a brave, raising his voice, said: 'Brothers, if we resolve to commit such an act of cowardice, at least wait till the sun sinks in the west, that he may not see us.' These few words had their effect They resolved to fight to their last breath, and did so with all the courage that could be inspired by hate, and the fear of dishonor by fleeing from enemies so often vanquished; but they were opposed to men who were not inferior to them in courage, and were here three to one.

"After a very stubborn fight, seventeen or eighteen Iroquois were left on the field, their intrenchment stormed, and all the survivors disarmed and taken. The Hurons took to their village the captives that fell to their lot, and outdid themselves in cruelty to these wretches; but God seems to have permitted their misfortune to display His mercy in their regard. The missionaries who were accorded liberty to converse with them freely, found their docility astonishing. They instructed them sufficiently in our Holy Mysteries, and baptized them all. These neophytes then sustained the frightful torture to which they were subjected—not with that brutal insensibility and ferocious pride in which these savages glory on such occasions, but with patience, sentiments and courage worthy of Christianity, and which their executioners could not fail to attribute to the power of Baptism."

Thus under such peculiar circumstances were the interests of religion advanced among the Indians, for it will be readily understood that the very pleasing results which followed this overwhelming defeat of the enemy aroused a certain prejudice among the aborigines which greatly favored the cause of religion, leading them to more openly avow their interest and belief in the new faith than they had heretofore done. In fact, the fight against the innovation of Christianity had been carried on almost as actively as heretofore, although undoubtedly the personal demonstrations had not been as marked or aggressive as formerly. The work of absolute conviction, however, was of slow and tedious growth, and when a Christian fell sick determined indeed were the efforts made to induce him to send for the "medicine man" of the tribe in preference to the priest. In many instances those converted to the faith were induced to return to their old customs and beliefs, overcome by the energy and display of those charlatans who, posing under the guise of seers and men of wisdom, imposed upon their limited understanding, or rather, as might more truthfully be said, upon their fears. The lot of the missionaries would have undoubtedly been less vague and uncertain and their condition greatly improved had it not been for the lack of concerted effort on the part of the allied tribes against the common foe. The trouble, we believe, was that they took too much for granted, and having gained a slight advantage were prone to believe that the enemy would desist from further attempts at conquest. This, as we are all aware, was a most fallacious and disastrous argument, as, contrary to their opinion, it had just the opposite effect upon the Iroquois, who, overcome by the shame wrought upon them in suffering defeat at the hands of the Hurons, left no stone unturned to regain their former prestige in their opinion. Therefore, no journey was too long or arduous, no undertaking too dangerous for them to attempt, in order that they might in an overwhelming defeat of the enemy crush out the memory of their own former want of success. It were better indeed had the Hurons taken to themselves the understanding that so long as one Iroquois remained in the land, just so long would they have an active, aggressive and unforgiving enemy to contend with. Under such circumstances, being fully their equal in numbers, and valiant and unflinching warriors, they might have acquired a power, if not surpassing, at least second to none in the country. But, unfortunately, they were of more desultory habits and having won a fight were content to rest upon their laurels, and failing to apply a natural amount of caution in their deliberations, seemed only too willing to accept as whole-souled and honest the flattering proposals of peace which were, from time to time, held out to them by the Iroquois. So it is not to be wondered at that the allies soon lost all of the prestige gained by their momentary success, for while they were lingering around their villages satiated with the victory acquired as well as contempt for their enemies, the Iroquois were busily engaged in preparing for vengeance. But it was not to an immediate and crushing defeat that they looked forward. They were altogether too diplomatic to make any such attempt, believing that by a certain amount of well-planned dissimulation they could, at least, keep the French in a condition of neutrality while preparing for a downward swoop upon the Hurons. To this end they sent out a body of some three hundred warriors, the same being divided into a number of bands who roamed the country over, treating all the Indians who came their way with the utmost inhumanity, while, on the contrary, all of the French they met with were allowed to go unharmed. At the same time, they were fully prepared for any emergency as was evidenced in the large parties which for a considerable period hovered around the neighborhood of Three Rivers, watching intently and with the utmost interest every movement made by the settlers. The second move in their attempt to widen the breach between the French and the Indians came in the form of a proposition for peace, which, however, they desired understood should not include the allies. This advance was made to Mr. de Champfleur, who had before for a short time been located at Three Rivers as Governor, in which office he was preceded by the Chevalier de Lisle. The matter was all very craftily arranged, the request being made by a Frenchman named Marguerie, who had for some time been a prisoner in the hands of the Iroquois and had been released in order that he might convey this message. Naturally, as may be expected, he as well as those who accompanied him had nothing but praise to say in regard to the treatment they had received from the savages, which was necessarily a part of their plan of action. In trying to coerce the French he was, however, frank in giving as his opinion that it would hardly be judicious for the settlement to seriously consider the matter. Here the French again found themselves in a somewhat unpleasant predicament, being in a condition which far from warranted their taking an aggressive position, while it was in no wise their desire to enter into closer relations with the crafty Iroquois. However, of the two evils they chose what seemed to them to be the least.

Commencing negotiations with them so that they could at least gain time until perhaps something might transpire by which they could be guided in conducting further deliberations, Governor Champfleur prepared for subsequent emergencies by notifying the Chevalier de Montmagny, who at once came to Three Rivers with a well-armed force, while Sieur Nicolet and Father Ragueneau were sent to the camp of the Iroquois, requesting them to send back the French prisoners they had retained as well as to learn more definitely their desires as regards the treaty of peace. These envoys were received with distinction and courtesy. What follows makes plain the tactfulness with which these Indians approached a subject of importance, as well as the extent of duplicity applied by them in their endeavors to overcome with a superabundance of honesty the scruples of their antagonists. In this instance the envoys having been properly seated in the council lodge, the prisoners were brought to them slightly bound. Then a war chief arose and in the choicest and most flowery language at his command endeavored to impress upon his hearers the fact that his nation could never be made so supremely happy as by living in peace and friendship with the French. "Then," says Charlevoix, "in the midst of his discourse he approached the prisoners, unbound them and flung their bounds over the palisade, saying: 'Let the river carry them so far that they be not spoken of.' At the same time he presented a belt to the two deputies and begged them to receive it as a pledge of the liberty which he restored to the children of Ononthio (Great Mountain, a name given to Chevalier de Montmagny by the Hurons and Iroquois). Then taking two packs of beaver, he laid them at the feet of the prisoners, adding that it was unreasonable to send them back naked, and that he gave them material for robes. He then resumed his discourse and said that all the Iroquois cantons urgently desired a durable peace with the French and that in their name he begged Ononthio to hide under his clothes the hatchets of the Algonquins and Hurons while the peace was in negotiation; declaring that on their side they would commit no hostility.

"He was still speaking when two Algonquin canoes appeared in sight of the spot where the council was held, and the Iroquois gave them chase. The Algonquins, seeing no prospect of resisting so large a force, jumped overboard and swam away, leaving their canoes, which were plundered before the eyes of the Governor-General. This outrage showed how little reliance could be placed on the word of these savages, and negotiations were broken off at once."

Thus once again the treachery and unreliability of the Iroquois nation was made plain to the settlers, to whom the inference alone was left that under no conditions whatever were these people to be trusted. In fact the Iroquois acted as though they cared but little as to how their actions were taken by the French, treating them with the utmost indifference and marked insolence. To bring them to time for such continued and unwarranted ill-behavior was of course impossible, and the unhappy condition and chagrin of the Chevalier de Montmagny was by no means lessened or improved when it became known to him that at about this time a number of Huron canoes laden with furs and coming down from Quebec had fallen into the hands of the enemy and been sequestrated by them. To a man of the somewhat exalted characteristics attributed to the Chevalier de Montmagny such a condition of affairs must indeed have been disheartening, he being fully aware of the fact that, while in his present condition he was but barely able to act as a balance between the Hurons and the Iroquois, with a force of from 4,000 to 5,000 Frenchmen at his command he could have controlled the entire Indian horde. These, however, could only be obtained through the influence of the Company of One Hundred, a society who were fain, however, to remain in their previous condition of semi-indifference as regards the colony and the welfare of the settlers. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that New France experienced a serious decline, its already limited numbers becoming lessened day by day. To those who had settled the country and thoroughly investigated its numerous resources, the action of the Company was inexplicable, as with a few more resources at their command, and the firmer backing which the Company could well and easily have afforded, there is no reason whatever but that the colony should have taken on a remarkable growth and acquired much value to those who had interests invested there. As it was, things appeared to be in a very deplorable condition, and there is no telling to what extent the decline might have gone had it not been for a slight revival in the general interest taken in the matter by the settlement of the Island of Montreal. This seemed to be regarded as a very desirable move, a majority of the missionaries having long regarded the establishment of a colony on this island as most necessary. The Company, however, had adverse views regarding the undertaking, in consequence of which it had been delayed until a majority of those most interested had come to the opinion that it could not possibly be brought about; that is, most assuredly, if the affairs of the country remained in the hands of those who then controlled them. Fortunately for the interest of the colony, there were, however, a few individuals left who were not so absolutely and naturally wrapt up in self and selfish interests as to ignore the possibilities of general advantage to be gained aside from what business might accrue to individuals furthering or promoting the undertaking. Nor was this the only consideration the design received, for while the members of the Canadian Company were noted for their unanimity in furthering their individual interests in the colony, they had never so much as given a second thought to the primary object of its settlement, the conversion of the savages to the Christian religion. Those who now took up the matter, however, that is, as far as the Island of Montreal was concerned, were people who were noted to a considerable extent for their zeal and piety, and they, having learned of the true condition of affairs and satisfied themselves as to the reliability of the authorities given, formed a society by means of which it was proposed to conduct on an extensive scale at Montreal what had already been brought to a successful issue, but in a more moderate way, at Sylleri. The idea as formulated was that a French town should be established on the island, the same being well and sufficiently manned and fortified to resent any encroachments that might be attempted upon it. Here, also, provisions were to be made for the reception of a large number of poor people who were to be given an opportunity to gain their livelihood by honest labor. The rest of the island was to be divided off into sections which were to be given up to the occupancy of Indians, irrespective of the tribe to which they belonged, provided they had made an earnest profession of Christianity or truly desired instruction in the Christian religion.

The Association was formed of thirty-five members (some say forty, and others that the exact number is not known), who under a grant from the king took possession of the island in 1640. During the following year, Paul de Chomedey, Sieur de Maisonneuve of Champagne, himself a member of the Association, started for the new settlement, accompanied by a number of families. There also went with him a Mademoiselle de Manse, a lady of good family who had been appointed to look after the interests of those of her sex. Upon arriving at Quebec, they were received by the Chevalier de Montmagny and Superior-General of the Jesuits, who went with them to Montreal, where on the 15th day of October, 1641, De Maisonneuve was duly declared Governor of the island. Soon after their arrival a site was selected for the proposed settlement, which was duly blessed by the Rev. Bartholomew Vimont on the 17th day of May, 1642, who also celebrated Mass at this time and dedicated a little chapel to St. Mary which had been erected there and in which he left the Blessed Sacrament. In connection with this undertaking, it may be also interesting to note that this gathering and dedication had been preceded by one held towards the end of February, when all of the members of the Association went to the Church of Notre Dame, Paris, where Mass was said in honor of the undertaking. In addition to this, further religious services were held on the island on August 15, 1642, on which occasion there were present a large number of French and Indians. It was on the latter occasion that Governor de Maisonneuve was informed by two old Indians that they formed part of the remnants of a nation which had formerly inhabited the island, from which their ancestors had been driven by the Hurons many years before. This tribe referred to were, it is believed, the Iroquois, although Charlevoix supposes them to be Hurons. Referring to Charlevoix's brief account of the settlement of the island, Shea says that when the former wrote nothing had been published bearing on the settlement of that island except the tract, "Les Veritables Motifs," which appeared in 1674. The Society of Montreal published no statements, and the Sulpitians had not the rule of writing to their superiors, which, established by St. Ignatius in the case of the Jesuits in order to keep alive the feeling of brotherhood and edification among the widely scattered members of the order, has led to the preservation of so much information. "The early history of the movement," continues the writer, "has, however, in our day found an investigator and chronicler in the laborious zeal of Mr. Faillon of Sulpice, who has issued a series of valuable works all bearing on the history of Montreal. The first one, according to this writer, impelled to undertake the settlement was a gentleman named Jerome le Royer de la Dauversiere, of le Fleche, in Anjou. The second similarly moved in 1636 was a young clergyman, Rev. John James Olier, who subsequently instituted the Seminary of St. Sulpice, at Paris. They finally met and resolved to obey the common inspiration. The next to join was Peter Chevrier, Baron of Faucamp, who, in 1640, sent out provisions and tools to Quebec to serve for the coming settlers. The celebrated Baron de Renty and two others were subsequently associated. John de Lauson, the proprietor of the Island of Montreal, induced by the Rev. Father Charles Lalemant, ceded it to these gentlemen August 17, 1640. To remove all doubts, the associates also received a grant from the New France Company on December 17, 1640; ratified and approved by the King February 13, 1644; the associates engaged to send out forty settlers to be employed in clearing and cultivating the land; to increase the number annually; to supply them with sloops, cattle, farm hands; after five years to erect a seminary, maintain ecclesiastics as teachers and missionaries, also nuns and hospitallers. On its side, the New France Company agreed to transport thirty settlers, the six associates then contributing twenty-five thousand crowns to begin the settlement; and Mr. de Maisonneuve embarked with his colonists on two vessels for Rochelle and Dieppe." It is further stated that in consequence of the danger accruing from the near presence of a number of bands of the Iroquois the Chevalier de Montmagny used every effort to persuade Mr. de Maisonneuve to remain at Quebec during the winter. All of these offers, however, he declined.

Of the Rev. John James Olier de Verneuil, one of the first to undertake this plan of settlement, we learn that he was born in Paris on September 20, 1618, and was second son to James Olier, who was secretary to King Henry IV., and master of requests in the King's palace. After a careful education under his father's direction, he embraced the ecclesiastical state, and became immediately connected with St. Vincent de Paul, interested by whose example he began to give missions in Auvergne, where he held the abbey of Pebrac. Refusing a bishopric and coadjutatorship at Chalons sur Marne, he accepted the parish of St. Sulpice at Paris in 1642, then in great disorder. Aided by some clergymen with whom he had lived in community at Vaugirard, he entirely reformed his parish and then began a long contemplated work, the founding of a theological seminary for the practical training of candidates for the priesthood. This he effected with royal approbation in 1645. His institute, known as the Seminary of St. Sulpice, has rendered immense service to religion, and soon led to similar establishments in other parts of France, under the direction of his community, commonly styled "Sulpitians." In America they have seminaries at Montreal and Baltimore.

Mr. Olier resigned this parish in 1652, and retired to his seminary, where he died April 2, 1657, at the age of forty-nine, revered by the best and holiest men in France. He wrote a "Treatise on Holy Orders," "A Christian Catechism of the Interior Life," and "A Christian's Days," while many of his letters have also been published.

In spite of the reinforcements brought to the colony in the settlement of Montreal, the people as well as de Montmagny were much disturbed by the actions of the Iroquois, whose insulting attitude towards the Governor and utter disregard of both pledges and promises, made it evident that their intentions were of anything but a pacificatory character. Indeed, the situation was viewed on every hand as most serious and alarming, and consequently every precaution was taken to make their position as safe as possible. The wisdom of this act on the part of de Montmagny certainly cannot be called into question, as in addition to the matter of self-reliance exhibited by the savages, their efforts to discomfit the French were heartily supported and endorsed by the Dutch of New Netherland, who, while not coming out in open declaration in favor of their actions, at least supplied them with the necessary munitions with which to maintain their aggressive attitude towards the French.

After long and careful deliberation on their part, the people decided to erect a fort at or near to the mouth of the Sorel river, that being the course generally followed by the Iroquois in their numerous descents into the colony. The task was by no means an easy one, and although the building was finally completed, the work was accomplished only under the most trying circumstances, a continual interference being kept up by a large body of Iroquois, who only too thoroughly appreciated the value that such a structure would prove against them, and as a protection to the colony. In fact they were vehement in their efforts to delay the work, lying in ambush, and harrassing the workmen at most unexpected periods, although they not only failed in each effort to materially delay the work, but met with considerable loss besides. When complete the fort was given the name of Richelieu, and was thoroughly well garrisoned and provisioned.

All of this work had been carried out and accomplished without the assistance or even abetment of the Canadian Company, who, had they followed any other than this "penny wise and pound foolish" policy of theirs, would have aided to an almost incalculable extent in the material growth and prosperity of the colony. Taken altogether, it is a question if a more propitious time for such arrangements could have been found, as a large majority of the Hurons were then in closer relations with the missionaries than they had been at any period previously, many of them having expressed an unqualified desire to become Christians. Thus, it will be readily seen that the attitude of the French and their evident aggressive intentions towards the Iroquois must have acted beneficiously upon the Hurons, who, fearful of the power of their general enemy, saw in this bold assertion of their rights a more enduring protection for themselves. Such an effect, in fact, did this have upon the Hurons that, aside from the natural inclination of many of them to embrace the Christian faith, it brought others under the domination of the "black-gowns," among them being not a few of those who had been most stubborn and rebellious, ignoring with almost insulting indifference all of the advances made to them by the missionaries. Particularly among these was one Ahasistari, a noted and valiant chief, who became an active medium in bringing quite a number of his people to a just appreciation of the Christian religion. Of the experiences of the missionaries with this man, the historian Charlevoix writes the following: "There was no great probability of success, this Indian being extremely attached to his superstition; but the difficulties of these great conversions is what often reassures apostolic men, who know that Grace, which is all-powerful, is often pleased to triumph over those who resist its inspiration most sternly. They were, therefore, not disheartened, and continued to make frequent visits to the Huron chief, although he always received them quite ill. Yet he yielded at last, and even began to look upon them with favor. They gradually found him less removed from the Kingdom of God, and at last he began to relish their conversation on religion.

"They then devoted themselves more than ever to his instruction. He heard them attentively, proposed his doubts, and when they were solved manifested his conviction. He requested Baptism, but the Fathers thought it not wise to admit to the bosom of the Church on a single request a proselyte of this character, deeming it better to make him long desire that favor. One day when he was earnestly soliciting it at one of the public conferences, the missionary who presided asked him to inform the assembly what had given him his first desire to become a Christian, and he replied in these words, which I took literally from the missionary's own letter: 'This thought engaged my mind even before you came to this country. I often ran great risks, and on many occasions I happily escaped when all my comrades perished at my side. Some powerful genius, I said to myself, must bear a special watch over my days, and I could never banish the thought that this genius must be infinitely superior to those who are honored among us. Nor could I avoid regarding as silly all that is told us of dreams. No sooner had I heard Jesus spoken of, than I felt assured He was the protector to whom I had so often been indebted for liberty and life. Stubborn and adherent as I may have appeared to our practices and traditions, I nevertheless felt internally moved to adore Him alone; and if I have so long deferred obeying this impulse of my heart, it was because I wished to be instructed before making the avowal. Even when I seemed least disposed to hear you, I undertook no enterprise without commending myself to Jesus and I put all my trust in Him. For a long time I have invoked Him every morning; and in His name I ask Baptism from you, that He may be merciful to me after death.'

"The missonaries thought it wrong to withhold this satisfaction longer from a man so well prepared. He was baptized the same day by the name of Eustace. He soon after raised a large war party in which he would receive none but Christians. His band being ready to start, he led it to the missionary of his town, in whose presence he thus addressed them: 'Brethren, we all serve one same Master; let us then be but one heart and one mind. We must carefully avoid all intercourse with the pagans; and all our brethren who are in affliction must find consolation and solace in us. Let us carefully hide the faults of Christians from the eyes of the heathen, and on occasions let them see that religion unites us more closely than the ties of blood and interest ever did. As to our kindred who do not profess the same religion as ourselves, it is good that they know that death will separate them from us forever, and our ashes cannot even be mingled with theirs. Let us publish everywhere, but by example rather than by word, the holiness and excellence of faith in Jesus, and endeavor if possible to make all the world embrace it.'"

With this general awakening among the Hurons regarding their spiritual duties, came an enlarging of the missionary field, for it was not long after the occurrence of the incident just quoted, that the Fathers were invited to send a pastor to the country of the Saulteurs[1] which was located near to a rapid, midway in the channel by which Lake Superior is connected with Lake Huron.

This new field was given in charge of Father Isaac Jogues and Charles Raimbaut[1], who, therefore, returned with the deputation which had been sent to invite their presence. The result of this expedition[2] was that the missionaries were, according to all accounts, well received, and thus enabled to effect much good among them. Unfortunately, just as their efforts began to take some noticeable effect, the missionaries were recalled, and we learn that upon their return to that country some years subsequently, it became readily evident that the former friendly sentiments of the Saulteurs for the French had virtually ceased to exist, and that consequently their previous labors had brought about no lasting result.

Of this same visit Parkman relates that during the autumn he (Father Jogues) with Father Charles Raimbaut had passed along the shore of lake Huron northward, entering the strait from which lake Superior discharges itself, pushing on as far as the Sault Ste. Marie and preached the Faith to two thousand Ojibwas and other Algonquins there assembled. In the meantime matters were looking anything but propitious for the settlers, as the Iroquois, being sure of the moral as well as material support of the Dutch, were maintaining an actively aggressive position towards the settlers. Every available avenue and water-course throughout the country swarmed with their canoes or bands of warriors, and played havoc with the numerous trading parties of the Hurons in their vain attempts to reach the settlement with peltries and other articles for barter. These articles, which assumed an aggregate of considerable value, were disposed of by the victorious Iroquois, in exchange for ammunition and arms, which were readily supplied to them by the Dutch. So frequent had these depredations become, that the Hurons, who from repeated defeats had become totally unmanned, and disqualified from maintaining anything approaching an equal footing with the enemy, became a more than useless incumbrance upon the hands of the French, and therefore were left not only entirely without the aggressive support of the alien forces, but, on the contrary, had to keep close serveillance of them and their interests. In fact a terrible storm cloud was hovering over the devoted heads of the missionaries which bid fair to envelope them into lasting and interminable gloom. First among those who suffered from this untoward condition of affairs was this selfsame Father Jogues, who may be regarded as the first victim of the pitiless storm which followed. His misfortunes may be said to have commenced upon his return journey from Sault Ste. Marie, from which place he had received orders to go to Quebec, starting on that journey on June 13, 1642. This journey was accomplished without any particular happening, but it was on his return to the country of the Saulteurs some months later that his actual trials and sufferings began. He begun his return journey on the first day of August, 1642, starting out with a convoy of thirteen canoes, stoutly manned and thoroughly armed. Of the experience which followed, Charlevoix gives the following account: "The strength of this escort was apparently the cause of its ruin, by inspiring all in it with overweening confidence. It was afterwards ascertained from the letters of Father Jogues that the chiefs of this band, consisting mostly of Christians or proselytes, thought far less of guarding against any sudden attack of the enemy than of exhorting their men to suffer for Christ; and most of them manifested sentiments which filled him with confusion. The wonder is that they persevered till death in these heroic dispositions. It is not astonishing that He who can turn even crime to good sometimes for His own glory permits men to stray from the laws of prudence.

"Be that as it may, the Hurons were not more than fifteen or sixteen leagues from Quebec[1] when on the day after their departure, at dawn, as they were about to embark, they perceived an Iroquois train on the bank of the river; but they despised an enemy to whom they deemed themselves far superior in numbers, and whom they consequently deemed not rash enough to begin an

(1.) The location is now known as Sault Ste. Marie. The report of this occurrence as it appears in the Minnesota historical collection, Vol. V., is somewhat different from that given by Charlevoix. In this we are told that the very interesting and glowing reports given by the traders who had just returned from that country so much enthused the missionaries to such an extent that they became eager and anxious to accompany them on their return journey. It seems that in the separation of the Ojibway tribes over three centuries ago at the outlet of Lake Superior a considerable band remained on their ancient village site at Bow-e-ting, or falls of Ste. Marie; and here some years prior to the first visit of the white men and "black-gowns" to the greater village in the bay of Shag-a-waum-ik-ong, traders and priests had established themselves, and these circumstances naturally conduced to draw hither from their more western and dangerously situated villages many families of the tribe till they again numbered many wigwams on this, the site of their Indian town. It was the first discovery of this tribe at this point which has given them the name by the French of Saulteaux, from the circumstance of their residing at the falls.

Saulteurs.—An Algonquin tribe originally bearing the name of Pauoirigoweteuhak, Pauoitigoueieuhak or Ouchipoues, which have since become generally known as the Ojibwas or Chippewas.

(1.) Also spelled Raymbault, Raymbaut

(2.) Of this incident the historian Shea gives the following account: "By command of their Superior, two missionaries, Charles Raymbaut, thoroughly versed in the Algonquin customs and language, with Father Isaac Jogues, no less complete a Huron, were detached to visit them. On the 17th of June they launched their canoes at the mission-house at Ste. Marie's, and for seventeen days advanced for the crystal waters of the inland sea, amid beautiful islands which stretched across the lake, clustering around the lake-governed Manitouline, so hallowed to the Indian mind. When they reached the falls, they found two thousand Indians assembled there, and amid their joyful greetings the missionaries gazed with delight at the vast field which lay before them. They heard of tribe after tribe which lay around, and ever and anon of the terrible Adowessi, who dwelt on the great river of the West. Earnestly did the Chippewas press the two Fathers to stay in their midst. 'We will embrace you,' said they, 'as brothers; we shall derive profit from your words;' but it could not be so. The paucity of missionaries in the Huron country did not yet permit the establishment of that distant mission. Raymbaut and Jogues could but plant the cross to mark the limit of their spiritual progress; yet they turned it to the south, for thither now their hopes began to tend. After a short stay they returned to St. Mary's, and hopes were entertained of soon establishing a mission on Lake Superior; but Raymbaut shortly after fell a victim to the climate, while Jogues began in his own person a long career of martyrdom, preluding the ruin of the Huron mission, the death of its apostles and the destruction of the tribe."

attack. They pursued their way without taking any precaution against surprise, and became the dupes of this unpardonable security. The Iroquois braves were seventy in number. One division lay in ambush behind some bushes that covered a point close at hand which the party had to pass; the other had crossed the river and concealed themselves in the woods.

"As soon as the Hurons came within reach of the first party, a well-delivered volley of musketry wounded several and riddled every canoe. This sudden and unforseen attack threw the Christians into disorder; but some of the most agile promptly sprang ashore, and succeeded in escaping. The bravest, supported by three or four Frenchmen who had accompanied Father Jogues, for some time made a resolute defense in their canoes; but as the water poured in and there was no means of flight, they were at last obliged to surrender, except a few who escaped in the confusion caused among the Iroquois by their resistance; the rest were seized and bound.

"It had depended on Father Jogues himself to follow the first who took flight; they indeed did all they could to induce him; but the servant of God, as calm amidst this tumult as if he had been at full liberty, baptized a catechumen and prepared him for any event. To those who urged him to seek safety, he replied that they did right to escape, but that it did not become him to abandon his children when they most needed his assistance. Charity, exacted by duty, does not fully satisfy an apostolic heart. The combat ended, the Hurons all taken or fled, Father Jogues had discharged his ministry to its full extent; but he sighed for martyrdom, and he believed that the services which he could render the captives, by consoling and exhorting them to death, was a sufficiently justifiable motive for exposing himself to it, and he would not miss the opportunity.

"He accordingly advanced towards the Iroquois, who seemed to pay no attention to him, thinking only of embarking with their capture, and he made himself the prisoner of the first one he met, saying that he would not be separated from his beloved children, whose sad fate he but too clearly foresaw. A Frenchman, William Couture, with whom the holy man had come down from the Huron country, had fled among the first; but he was no sooner out of danger than he was seized with shame for having abandoned Father Jogues, and without reflecting that he could no longer be of any service to him in the hands of the Iroquois, he used as much exertion to rush back into the danger as he had used to escape it."

Couture was, we are told, recovered some years later. He died in 1702 at the age of ninety-four, leaving behind him a numerous posterity in Canada, Msgr. Turgeon, Archbishop of Quebec, and Msgr. Bourget, Bishop of Montreal, are both descendants of this man.

Continuing his description of this encounter, Charlevoix goes on to say: "Father Jogues was pained to see him again, and reproached him gently with his imprudence in a course that could avail no one, but the error was committed. Couture had been seized as soon as he appeared and bound with the other captives. Moreover, some of the best Iroquois runners had started in pursuit of the fugitives, and brought in several. As they arrived the sighs of Father Jogues redoubled; and in a letter which he wrote to his Provincial in France, soon after his arrival among the Iroquois, he declares that he felt on this occasion the reverse of the maxim so universally received, that 'misery loves company.'

"The first thing the captors did when they no longer feared pursuit, was to inform their prisoners not to expect any quarter. Couture, at the commencement of the attack, having killed an Iroquois, was a marked man, and the first to feel the rage of the savages. They first crushed all his fingers, after tearing out the nails with their teeth. Then they ran a sword through his right hand. Father Jogues could not behold him mutilated in this way without being moved to the heart's core; he ran to embrace the young man, and as he wished to encourage him by the thought of the eternal truths, he found him in sentiments which charmed him, and more absorbed, he says, in his Saviour's sufferings than in his own.

"At that moment three or four Iroquois rushed with a kind of fury on the missionary, rained down on his head and naked body—for they had begun by stripping all the prisoners—so many blows with their clubs and stones, that they thought they had killed him. He lay for a considerable time, indeed, senseless. He had scarcely begun to recover when they tore out all his nails, and gnawed off his two forefingers with their teeth. Another Frenchman, named Rene Goupil, quite an able surgeon who had been received by the Jesuits as a brother, was treated in the same way; but nothing was done that day with the prisoners.

"Sometime after the booty was divided, and the captives, twenty-one in number, were also distributed, contrary to custom; this allotment being generally made in the village from which the war party sets out. At last they took up their march which lasted four weeks[1]. The wounds of Father Jogues and the two Frenchmen had not been dressed, and worms were soon engendered; yet the prisoners had to march from morning till night, with nothing scarcely given them to eat; but the holy missionary was touched only at the sight of his beloved neophytes destined to the stake, four of five of them being main columns of the Huron Church. He dared not flatter himself with the same lot, unable to believe that the Iroquois would in his case proceed to extremities, and by putting him to death make irreconcilable enemies of the French.

"After eight days' march they met a party of two hundred Iroquois, going to try their fortune. Great was their joy at the sight of so many prisoners, who were turned over to them for some time, and whom they treated with incredible barbarity, after firing a general volley in honor of Agreskoue (war-god of the Hurons and Iroquois). The Indians imagine that the more cruel they show themselves on these occasions, the greater will be the success of their expedition. This party was, however, deceived in its expectations for, having appeared before Fort Richelieu, they found there the Chevalier de Montmagny, who killed several and compelled the rest to retire in disorder.

"In the event just mentioned, Father Jogues was not more spared than the rest, but he was not so mutilated as to disable him from rendering the services required of slaves. This confirmed his belief that the Iroquois would not, by putting him to death, deprive themselves of the advantage they might derive from a hostage of his character. From the spot where the two parties met they made ten days' journey in canoes, after which they had to march again, and the prisoners, most of whom could scarcely stand, were, moreover, loaded with the baggage of their pitiless masters.

"Father Jogues in his memoirs states that the first days his captors did not stint them in food, but that this gradually diminished, and that towards the close of his march he was no less than three times twenty-four hours without tasting food, their provisions having almost entirely failed on account of the circuitous path which they had been obliged to take to avoid encountering hostile war parties. He adds that neither he nor Goupil, his companion, were bound like the rest at night, so that they might easily have escaped; but the reasons which had prevented him at first, diverted him to the last, and the young surgeon would never consent to abandon him.

"At last the whole troop arrived in a village of the Mohawk canton (Andagoron), where the captives were again told that they were doomed to the stake. Here they were treated with such inhumanity that not a spot on their bodies was left without a bruise or wound, not a feature recognizable. After enduring the first fury of the women and children, they had to ascend to a kind of scaffold, and at a signal three Frenchmen received some blows with a scourge on the shoulders; then an old man approached Father Jogues, attended by an Algonquin woman, a slave, to whom he gave a knife, ordering her to cut off the missionary's right thumb.

"This woman, who was a Christian, at first stood as if stupefied, then declared that what she was ordered to do was utterly impossible. The old man, however, resorted to such terrible threats that she obeyed. The holy man afterwards declared that his fear of seeing the woman tortured on his account, and the joy which he subsequently felt on seeing her escape the peril by her obedience, enabled him to endure the pain which she gave him; yet she made him suffer more exquisite torture by the irresolute and trembling manner in which she performed the operation, than if cruelty had guided her hand.

"The prisoners remained on this scaffold a day and a half, surrounded by a confused crowd of savages, who were allowed to subject them to any treatment short of death. They were then taken to a second village. Here, contrary to custom, they had to run the gauntlet; whereas, according to rule, this should be practiced only in the first town they enter. Then Father Jogues, unable longer to endure his nakedness, asked an Iroquois whether he was not ashamed to leave him in that state after having had so large a share in the booty. The Indian seemed to feel the reproach, for he went and got a box-covering and gave it to the missionary who used it as best he could to cover himself; but as the surface of his body was all raw, this cloth, rough in itself and bristling with bits of straw, caused him such acute pain that he was forced to abandon it. Then the sun pouring down on his wounds, set bleeding afresh by this cloth, formed a crust, which fell off, from time to time, in pieces.

"It is impossible to detail the cruel and unworthy treatment which the captives endured in the second village, especially at the hands of the young. The torture lasted two days, and no one thought of giving them any food. At night they were tied and shut up together in a cabin, but pain and hunger prevented sleep from bringing any truce to their miseries. They were treated with nearly as great inhumanity in a third village, where four Hurons were brought in captives by another war party[1].

(L) Regarding this Shea furnishes the following notes in his translation of Charlevoix: "The Mohawks were the Iroquois canton nearest to the Dutch, who adopted the Algonquin name for the tribe. The tribe was typically and as a unit 'the great she-bear'—Burgas, Racines, Agnieres. This term in Algonquin was 'Maqua' or, as the earlier Dutch writers gave it, Mahaknaas. This word ultimately became Mohawk. The tribe as individuals called themselves Gaguegueahaga or Kajinjahaga, the last syllable, 'haga,' meaning people (Bruyas megapolensis). They were not a numerous tribe and contained only the three primitive families—the Tortoise, Anaware: the Bear, Ochkari; and the Wolfe, Oknaho. They generally formed three towns; but after a lapse of over two centuries, the data are too indefinite to determine their site with absolute accuracy. Father Jogues names three towns—Osserenenon, Andagaron, or Gandagoron and Teonontogen, which he calls the most remote of the canton. The first was, according to the text of the Latin letter, twenty leagues from the Dutch post. Megapolensis gives three towns—Asserues, of the Tortoise; Banagiro, of the Bear; and Thenondiogo of the Wolfe family. Jogues on his second visit descended the Otogue or Upper Hudson to Fort Orange, and then followed the trail to the first town, formerly called Osserenenon. Wentworth Greenhalgh in 1677 gives four towns—Cahniaga, Canagorha, Can-

"At last after seven weeks' constant martyrdom, all contrary to their expectations, and in spite of oft-repeated threats, they were informed that none were to be put to death except three chiefs. Among these was the brave Eustace, whose conversion has been recently related. He as well as the other two received his death sentence as a sincere Christian, and till their last breath they carried their heroism as far as imagination can conceive. As soon as they had been given up to the deputies of the villages where they were to be burned, the other captives[2] were led back to the first village of the three through which they had been paraded. Here they were to be distributed.

"Up to this time as they belonged to no one individually, no one took any care of them, and on reaching this village they were in a state of complete exhaustion. Moreover, they were soon thrown back into a state of suspense as to their fate, from which they had just been delivered. The war party repulsed at Fort Richelieu came back breathing only vengeance. The chief and some of the bravest had been killed, while the number of the wounded was considerable. The prisoners, after having been so long the object of the insolence of victory, were now doomed to experience the rage and disappointment of defeat; and, notwithstanding the hopes which had been kindled in their hearts, they expected it to cost them their lives. The friends and kindred of the dead counted on it, when the Dutch, who were by chance in the village, asked that the three Frenchmen should be given up to them.

"This request embarrassed the Iroquois, and led to a kind of negotiation in which the fury enkindled against the prisoners somewhat abated; but this was all the benefit which the French derived. The council at last replied to the Dutch that the French were no longer at their disposal, it having been decided to restore them to their countrymen. This was a mere pretext, but whether the Dutch understood it or not, they pressed the matter no further and retired. Some of the more moderate of the Iroquois had indeed advised that Father Jogues and his two companions should be sent back to Ononthio, but all the others opposed it strongly. The three Frenchmen were then given to different masters; Couture's was in another village, and was apparently the same chief who had already rescued him from the hands of his torturer.

"Rene Goupil[1] knew his master only at the moment when that savage dealt him a blow on the head with his tomahawk, of which he expired a moment after. He was a young man of great innocence of life and of admirable ingeniousness. Although he had commenced his novitiate at Rouen, he was sent to Canada in his secular habit, that he might exercise his profession with more liberty and decorum; but though he did not wear the religious habit, his conduct was not the less strict, and in his piety merited the first crown of martyrdom in New France; for his master's motive in thus depriving him of life was that an old man, having seen him make the sign of the cross on a child, had told his master that if he kept Rene he would kill the whole village with his spells.

"Father Jogues, who had admired his virtue in life, did not scruple to invoke him after so precious a death as a confessor of Christ. He even expected to share his crown. He witnessed the execution, and not doubting but that they had also resolved to make way with him, he was about to kneel at the murderer's feet to receive his death-blow in that posture; but the Indian bade him rise, because though he deemed him as guilty as his comrade he had no power of life or death over him. The apostolic man, again disappointed in his hope of martyrdom, thought thenceforward only of sanctifying his chains, and rendering his bondage useful to those who had done him so much evil.

"At first he was rather closely watched, but in the sequel he had a little more liberty, and even traversed unopposed by his master the whole Mohawk canton in which he was, and the only one which till then had openly declared against us. In one of his excursions an event sjorha and Tionondogue. The Jesuit missionaries, who subsequently established permanent Mohawk missions, call Gandawague (the modern Caughnawaga, the place of Goupil's and Jogues' death. As to Teonontogen, there seems no doubt, its name having been retained by the village near Fort Hunter. Greenhalgh describes it as having a double stockade, as containing thirty houses and being on a hill a bowshot from the river. It was then north of the river, but was soon after removed, and Morgan (League of the Iroquois map) represents it as south of the Mohawk. Father Jogues, in representing it as the most remote, means remote from French, it being evidently nearest to the Dutch. The Andagagoron or Gandagoron of Jogues is apparently the Canagorha of Greenhalgh. It was on a flat with only one stockade and sixteen houses, and may be the Ganegahaga of Morgan, in Danphe-Herkimer county, opposite Canada creek. The Ossernenon and Osserrion of Jogues will then be the Cahniaga of Greenhalgh, and Caughnawaga of our times. This is the only town placed by Morgan north of the Mohawk. He places it near the mouth of the creek. Greenhalgh describes Cahniaga as doubly stockaded with four ports, each four feet wide, containing twenty-four houses, and situated on the edge of the hill about a bowshot from the riverside—meaning apparently Caughnawaga creek—the Mohawk being, as we may infer from Jogues' account of Goupil's death, three-quarters of a mile distant. This is too evidently the Andaraque taken by Courcelle in October, 1666, with its triple palisades and supply of water in tanks."

(1.) Rene Goupil—When he accompanied Father Jogues and Couture on their memorable expedition had been a novice, but was then a "donne," or given-man, one of a condition which were associated to Franciscan as well as Jesuit missions. These people gave themselves wholly to the service of the Fathers without any hope of earthly reward. Many of them subsequently became eminent men in Canada, and others are deemed as deserving the highest rank among the missionary laborers. Of this number, Shea mentions Kotour, le Coq, le Moyne and Donegas as particularly deserving of mention. Of his death the same historian also says he had been seen to make the sign of the cross on the forehead of a child, and as the Dutch had told the Mohawk that the sign was not good, the master of the cabin ordered Rene to be put to death. Two young men set out, and as Jogues and Rene, after long and fervent prayer and self-oblation to God, were returning to the village, they were met by the two braves, who ordered them to return at once. Conscious that death was nigh, they began to say their beads, and were just at the palisades when one of the Mohawks, jerking his tomahawk from beneath his mantle, buried it deep in the head of Goupil.

Rene Goupil was a native of Angers and educated as a physician. He entered the Society of Jesus, but was compelled to leave on account of failing health. On somewhat recovering, he offered his services as a "donne" to the Canada mission, where he rendered signal services, particularly in the care of the sick, and was admired by all for his goodness, piety, zeal, and devotion. He was put to death September 29, 1642, and the illustrious missionary Jogues did not hesitate to call him a martyr, not only to patience but also to good faith and the Cross.

occurred which gave him great consolation. As he went from cabin to cabin in a village near his own, to see whether he could find any dying children on whom he could confer Baptism, he heard a voice at a distance calling him; he ran to the spot, and entering the cabin from which the sound came he beheld a sick man who looked at him steadily and asked whether the missionary did not recognize him. He replied that he did not recollect having seen him. 'And I,' said the Indian, 'recognize you well. Do you recollect the day when you were hung up by the arms with ropes that cut deep into you and gave you such intense pain?' 'I remember it well,' replied the missionary. 'And I,' continued the Indian, 'was the one who took pity on you and cut you down.'

"The servant of God, overjoyed to find a man whom he had long sought to express his gratitude, threw himself upon his neck and embraced him: 'Brother,' he said, 'it depends only on yourself to let me render you a hundredfold all the good you did me, and the memory of which is as fresh in my mind as it was at that moment when you did me so great a charity. An enemy more cruel than all who then tortured me holds you in fetters; you are perhaps at the last moment of your life, and if before that fatal moment which will close your existence you do not throw off the yoke of this pitiless master, what will become of you? I shudder for you when I think of it. Eternal flames will surround and burn but never consume you. The most horrible torments you have ever conceived to glut your vengeance on your enemies do not approach what will be suffered through all eternity by those who do not die Christians.'

"These few words pronounced in that tone which renders apostolic men so powerful in words, made all the impression the missionary could desire on a heart in which charity paved the way for the operations of grace. The sick man asked to be instructed; and the missionary had scarcely begun to begin the chief mysteries of the faith than he perceived an unseen Master anticipated his teaching and impressed the truths of Christianity in this predestined soul. The sick man opposed no doubts to our most incomprehensible mysteries. He believed, was baptized and died a few days after in the arms of the servant of God, in all the sentiments which characterize the death of saints.

"A conquest of this kind was more than enough to make his bondage precious to the man of God; but it was not the only one, and ere long the whole Mohawk canton, which he had bedewed with his blood, produced an abundant harvest. Another Indian wishing to save his life received on his arm a blow of a tomahawk aimed at his life, and Heaven rewarded him in the same manner as it did the one I have just mentioned[1]. Many

(1.) Shea states that this case is misplaced, and that the Indian wounded in the arm while trying to save Father Jogues was Kiotsaeton, who was wounded when the missionaries was killed in 1647.

Of the foregoing experience of Father Jogues and the French which accompanied him, Parkman writes that they started on the morning of the 20 of August, 1642, with twelve Hurons, who slowly moved slowly along the northern shore of the expansion of the St. Lawrence, known as the Lake of St. Peter. There were thirty persons in this party altogether, including four Frenchmen, one of whom was the reverend missionary. Among the number of Hurons accompanying him, was the noted Christian chief Eustice or Eustache, Ahatsistan. Jogues occupied one of the leading canoes in the flotilla. At this time he was thirty-five years of age, having been born at Orleans in the year 1607. He must have had a striking presence, his oval face and the delicate mould of his features indicating to a marked degree a modest, thoughtful and refined nature. He is also reported as being constitutionally timid, with a sensitive conscience and great religious susceptibilities. He was a finished scholar and might have gained a literary reputation, but he had chosen another career, and one for which he seemed but little fitted. Physically, however, he was well matched for his work, for, though his frame was slight, he was so active that none of the Indians could surpass him in running. The twelve canoes had reached the western end of the lake of St. Peter, which is filled with innumerable islands, without incident. Here the forest was close to their right, as they were compelled to keep near the shore in shallow water, and close to a dense grove of tall bulrushes in order to avoid the current. Suddenly the silence was frightfully broken. The war-whoop rose from the rushes, mingled with the reports of guns and the whistling of bullets; and several Iroquois canoes filled with warriors pushed out from their concealment, and bore down upon Jogues and his companions. The Hurons in the rear were seized with a shameful panic. They leaped ashore; left canoes, baggage and weapons and fled into the woods. The French and the Christian Hurons made fight for a time, but when they saw another fleet of canoes approaching from the opposite shores or islands, they lost heart, and those escaped who could. Goupil was seized amid triumphant yells, as were also several of the Huron converts. Jogues sprang into the bulrushes, and might have escaped, but when he saw Goupil and the neophytes in the clutches of the Iroquois he had no heart to abandon them, but came out from his hiding-place, and gave himself up to the astonished victors. Couture had eluded pursuit; but when he noticed of Jogues and the captives had been left, he resolved to share his fate, and, turning, retraced his steps. As he approached, five Iroquois ran forward to meet him, and one of them snapped his gun at his breast, but it missed fire. In his confusion the discomfitted Couture fired his own piece, and laid the savage dead. The remaining four sprang upon him, stripped off all his clothing, tore away his fingernails with their teeth, gnawed his fingers with the fury of famished dogs, and thrust a sword through one of his hands. Jogues broke from his guards, and, rushing to his friend, threw his arms about his neck. The Iroquois dragged him away, beat him with their fists and war-clubs till he was senseless, and when he was revived lacerated his fingers with their teeth as they had done those of Couture. Then they turned upon Goupil, and treated him with the same ferocity. The Iroquois, now about seventy in number, embarked with twenty-two captives, but not until they had knocked on the head an old Huron whom Jogues, with his mangled hands, had just baptized, and who refused to leave the place. Then under a burning sun they crossed to the spot on which the town of Sorel now stands, at the mouth of the Richelieu, where they encamped.

From here their course was south up the River Richelieu and Lake Champlain, thence by way of Lake George to the Mohawk towns. The pain and fever of the wounds and the clouds of mosquitoes which they could not drive away, left the prisoners no peace by day nor sleep by night. On the eighth day they learned that a large Iroquois war party on their way to Canada were near at hand; and they soon approached their camp on a small island near to the southern end of Lake Champlain. The warriors, two hundred in number, saluted their victorious countrymen with volleys from their guns; then, armed with clubs and thorny sticks, they ranged themselves in two lines through which the captives were compelled to pass up the side of a rocky hill. On the way they were beaten with such fury that Jogues, who was the last in the line, fell powerless, drenched in blood and half dead. As the chief man among the French captives, he fared the worst. His hands were again mangled and fire applied to his body, while the Huron chief Eustache was subjected to tortures even more atrocious. When at night the exhausted sufferers tried to rest, the young warriors came to lacerate their wounds and pull out their hair and beards.

In the morning they resumed their journey. And now the lake narrowed into the semblance of a tranquil river. Before them was a woody mountain, close on their right a rocky promontory, and between these lay the river, the outlet of Lake George. Here they landed, shouldered their canoes and baggage and took their way through the woods, and soon reached the shore where Abercrombie landed, and Lord Howe fell. Again the canoes were launched, and they continued their tedious journey until landing at length near the future site of Fort William Henry, where they left their canoes, and with their prisoners began their march for the nearest Mohawk town. Each was made to bear his part of the plunder, and even Jogues, though his lacerated hands were for the most part powerless, and his body covered with bruises, was forced to stagger on with the rest under a heavy load.

Thus they crossed the upper Hudson, and in thirteen days after leaving the St. Lawrence river neared the verdant goal of their pilgrimage, a palisaded town standing on a hill near the banks of the river Mohawk. Here the captives were met by their tribesmen, who thronged on the side of the hill. The old and young alike, armed with clubs or iron rods, arranged themselves in double file reaching upward to the entrance of the town. And through this "narrow road of Paradise," as Jogues calls it, the captives were led in single file. Couture in front, after him a half score of Hurons, then Goupil, then the remaining Hurons, and last Jogues. As they passed they were saluted with yells and screeches and a tempest of blows. One heavier than the others knocked Jogues' breath from his body, and stretched him on the ground, but it was death to lie there, and, regaining his feet, he staggered on with the rest. When they reached the town the blows ceased, and they were all placed on a scaffold or high platform in the middle of the place. The three Frenchmen had fared the worst, and were frightfully disfigured. Goupil especially was streaming with blood, and livid with bruises from head to foot.

They were allowed a few minutes to recover their breath, undisturbed, except by the hootings and gibes of the mob below. "Come, let us caress these Frenchmen," a chief called out, and the crowd, knife in hand, began to mount the scaffold, and they ordered a Christian Algon-other sick Indians listened with docility to the instructions of the holy missionary, in whom they were always accompanied by all that the most tender and ingenious charity can inspire in a great heart. And by his earnest care a great number of children went to swell the choir in Heaven that follows the Lamb without spot. These conversions cost him much toil. The mere journeys were a great torture to a man whose strength was exhausted, and who was forced to live almost entirely upon roots. Not that the Indians refused him the necessaries of life; but as generally nothing was set before him that had not been first offered to Agreskoue, he did not believe that he could in conscience touch it."

One of the tribes located in the region, to which we at present particularly refer, were the Neuters, who occupied the territory lying on both sides of the Niagara, one hundred miles from the country of the Hurons. This territory was about one hundred and fifty miles in extent, running from Buffalo on the northern shores of lake Erie in an almost direct line towards Detroit, Michigan. This country is elsewhere described as lying southward and five days' journey from the nine villages of the Tobacco Nation of Tionnontates[1], which were located in the valleys of the Blue Mountains, and about half that distance south of Nottawassoga Bay on Lake Huron. These people obtained their rather peculiar name from the fact that they took no part whatsoever in the hostilities existing between the Hurons and Iroquois. Their language was about identical with that of the Hurons, by whom they were called Attiwandaions, Attiwendaronk, Atirgagenrenrets, Rhagenratka and Attionidarons[2], and they, not the Eries, were the Kahkwas of Seneca tradition. It is stated that these people were visited as early as the year 1626 by the Franciscan Friar Dallion[3], who reported quite a numerous population living in some twenty-eight villages, besides a number of less important settlements. Regarding this people and the territory occupied by them, we also learn from the Relation of 1641 that the country was about forty leagues in extent, embracing wide and fertile districts on the north shore of Lake Erie. At this time the total population was estimated at some twelve thousand souls. Le Clercq also describes their country, which he says doubtless included oil-springs, since he mentions among their productions very good oil which they call átouronton. Sagard says the word means "O how much there is," and it is by no means inapplicable to the oil in that region.

It was at about at this time (1641) that these Neuters were first visited by the Jesuits. This may really be said to have been the first absolute impression made by the Religious upon them, for although, as formerly stated, Father Dallion had gone among them in 1626, his inability to speak their language had been such that he was only able to convey a slight idea of the reason for his coming, and the religion he desired to teach, by signs. So when the good and pious Fathers Chaumonnot and de Brebeuf came there, they found a virgin field in which to begin their labors. In fact the people of the tribe were as a general thing far from well-disposed towards them, although they had come in much hope, having been invited to do so by a number of the principal men of the tribe. Once more, then, it became a stubborn fight of mind against matter, for while the Neuters were noncommittal as well as non-aggressive regarding the troubles of their immediate neighbors, the Hurons and Iroquois, they were naturally a fierce and warlike people, carrying on a bitter and continuous warfare with a number of surrounding tribes. The missionaries went to work in their usual way, gradually gaining the confidence of the savages by acts of kindness and devotion until many became well-disposed towards them and the religion which they taught. The success thus acquired came as the result of months of patient and tedious labor, a lapse of time which would have discomfited if not totally discouraged men of less zeal and determination.

Then arose another difficulty. At the time when their endeavors began to show some evidences of triumphant attainment, they were compelled to leave their newly acquired charge and return to the Hurons, whose sufferings and misfortunes, owing to the relentless depredations of the Iroquois, were daily increasing. Nor was this all; for the hand of famine and disease rested heavily upon this people. Yet, strange as it may seem, these accumulated horrors and difficulties which were so fast depleting the ranks of the nation seemed only to become a buoyant influence in religious matters, strengthening them in their purpose and desire to become true and faithful adherents to their newly acquired faith. Of course in all of this a little of the leaven of superstition quin woman, a prisoner among them, to cut off Jogues' left thumb, which she did. A thumb of Goupil was also severed, a clam-shell being used as the instrument in order to increase the pain. At night they were removed from the scaffold and placed in one of the houses, each stretched on his back with his limbs extended, and his ankles and wrists bound fast to stakes driven into the earthen floor. The children now profited by the example of their parents, and amused themselves by placing live coals and red-hot ashes on the naked bodies of the prisoners, who, bound fast and covered with wounds and bruises which made every movement a torture, were sometimes unable to shake them off.

In the morning they were again placed on the scaffold, where, during this and the two following days, they remained exposed to the taunts of the crowd. Then they were led in triumph to the second Mohawk town, and afterwards to the third (a), suffering at each a repetition of cruelties the detail of which would be as monotonous as revolting.

In a house in the town of Teonontogen Jogues was hung by the wrists between two of the upright poles which supported the structure, in such a manner that his feet could not touch the ground, and thus he remained for some fifteen minutes in extreme torture until, as he was on the point of swooning, an Indian with an impulse of pity cut the chords and released him. (b.) While they were in this town four fresh Huron prisoners just taken were brought in and placed on the scaffold with the rest. Jogues, in the midst of his pain and exhaustion, took the opportunity to convert them. An ear of green corn was thrown to him for food, and he discovered a few rain-drops clinging to the husks. With these he baptized two of the Hurons. The remaining two received baptism soon after from the brook which the prisoners crossed on the way to another town.

still had its effect, which was noticeable in the fact that the almost utter annihilation of a Huron village immediately subsequent to the seizure and carrying away of Father Jogues, was generally conceded by these people as an evidence and result of God's displeasure. Of this appalling incident it is sufficient to say that the Iroquois stole upon the village at daybreak, burning every cabin to the ground, and destroying every inhabitant of whatever age or sex with the exception of the very few who managed to escape through the flames. More stress particularly was laid upon the incident as to its cause, from the fact that the residents of this village had always objected to receiving the advances of the missionaries, and were consequently in an absolute state of paganism when the disaster fell upon them.

There were many other instances less brutal, yet, according to the Indians, fully as convincing of the attitude of the Deity towards them. One instance particularly referred to was that of a war party which before starting on an expedition desired to attain the proper influences to assure them of the successful outcome of their adventure. Now it happened that a large number of the warriors engaged in this undertaking were still under the ban of paganism, so that they immediately set to work to invoke the countenance and sympathy of the war god Agreskoue, whom by many incantations and wild idolatrous performances they proposed to impress and conciliate. The Christian members of the party, though fewer in number, were fully as enthusiastic, so when they learned the war god's ultimatum, as made known through his ready and indefatigable tool and interpreter, the medicine man, they immediately went out into the village, and in the presence of the entire tribe earnestly and solemnly supplicated the Almighty, praying him not to permit such sacrilege to His sacred person as a success in arms granted by Agreskoue would mean. One leader in this band cried aloud, saying, "Thy own glory is at stake; show that Thou art the only arbiter of our lot. If the promises of the enemy of our salvation are accomplished, these men will blaspheme Thy holy name; but let us rather perish all than witness such a great evil."

Of course under such diverse influences these two factions could not remain together, so they separated, the Christians traveling in a westerly direction, which was known to all to be far the most dangerous, while the others passed down along the trail which had been designated as the one for them to take by the Deity whose blessing they had solicited. The result of the enterprise was both remarkable and gratifying, as while the Christian party returned intact, having utterly failed to meet with any mishaps, the others met with the enemy, at whose hands they received a crushing defeat. As a consequence of this, we are told many unbelievers voluntarily acknowledged the impotence and worthlessness of Agreskoue, willingly declaring themselves in favor of the Christian religion.

Incidents such as these, and as time progressed they became more frequent, were what helped as much as anything to buoy up and support the missionaries in their tedious and seemingly never-ending task of converting the heathen to the Christian faith. Occasionally, too, there were other happenings which brought a little sunlight and comfort to the otherwise monotonous life of the missionary Fathers. They were, therefore, greatly rejoiced, and the settlement was turned into a state of unusual excitement, when it became noised abroad that Father Jogues, that energetic, zealous and self-sacrificing spirit, who in spite of the merciless and cruel treatment received at the hands of the natives, had devoted his every thought and energy to their conversion and well-being, was still among the living. Previous news of his death had, while lacking absolute verification, been received as the truth, and therefore the announcement of his escape proved an unbounded and gratifying pleasure to the entire colony. This information was obtained by means of one of the Hurons who, having been taken prisoner at the same time, managed to escape, and had at length with much difficulty succeeded in reaching Quebec and the Chevalier de Montmagny, to whom he brought the grateful news. From him the people learned that Father Jogues was still the property of the village canton, for although in the immediate care of an Iroquois chief, the people had refused to allow his possession to pass from their authority as a whole. This of course made the situation more dangerous for him, as under the weird influences of their medicine man, the passions of the pagans were easily aroused, and they became both fierce and capricious. Not long after the arrival of this Indian at Quebec, another messenger came, bearing with him a communication in writing from the reverend Father himself. This letter stated that the Iroquois were in a great state of excitement and unrest, their passions having been wrought up to such a pitch that they were preparing for a grand onslaught, having decreed that they would neither rest nor pause in their career until the Hurons had been totally destroyed. He also urged fervently and earnestly upon the French the necessity of their immediately taking action in coming out staunchly and formidably as allies of the oppressed people, stating as his firm conviction that if they hesitated much longer there would be nothing left of the Hurons or their associates to be saved.

Owing to the remarkably passive condition of the French Company, and their inability or lack of desire to furnish the colony with a proper equipment and force of people to maintain the safety of the colonists and the dignity of France, the Governor was unable to carry out the wishes of the missionary in going directly to the assistance of the allied tribes. Nevertheless, he was greatly interested in the welfare of Father Jogues, and being much worried concerning him and his safety, took every available means in his power to bring about his release. One of the first things he accomplished towards this end was in purchasing the release of a Sokoki Indian, whose tribe rendezvoused in the country tributary to New England and were firm allies of the Iroquois. To this man, who had been brought a captive to Quebec by the Algonquins, he gave his liberty, and after having him treated with the utmost gentleness and care until he had entirely recovered from the numerous wounds received by him at the hands of his captors, accorded him a large number of valuable presents, and then sent him under proper escort back to his own people. It was through the influence of the Sokokis that an attempt was made to purchase the release of Father Jogues from the Mohawks, which, however, in spite of the handsome manner in which their representatives were received and the ready acceptance of the numerous presents sent, they, contrary to all former traditions, failed to accomplish. The Mohawks, in fact, declared that they had irrevocably determined to retain the missionary as a prisoner. In this condition he passed from the service of one to another, but finally, being believed to have been the cause of repulse which the Iroquois experienced in a raid upon Fort Richelieu, he was notified that his death had been determined upon, and that he would be burned as soon as the party arrived at the village. To all intents and purposes, therefore, his doom was sealed. But fortunately for him on its way down the party passed through a Dutch settlement, where his peculiar condition attracted the notice and attention of a Dutch officer, who made several inquiries concerning him. Being informed of the facts in the case, and very desirous of extending some courtesy towards the Governor of Quebec, he immediately formulated a plan by means of which he felt certain he could secure the safety of the missionary. Sending, therefore, for Father Jogues, he notified him that there was then a vessel at anchor near by which was almost immediately starting for Virginia, and that by this means he could gain a ready passage to Jamestown, from which place he could be easily transferred to any point he might select.

After considerable deliberation, Father Jogues concluded to accept this offer, and finally, having managed to elude the vigilance of his captors, made his way to the shore and from this by means of a boat which was beached nearby to the vessel, where he was received with the utmost kindness. Here he remained for two days, until the Indians became so insistent for his return that it was necessary to remove him from the vessel and take him to the house of the Commandant, where he remained for two weeks. During that time, also, numerous bands of Iroquois came and demanded his return to them, causing not a little embarrassment to the Commandant, who was in no condition to put up a formidable defense should the Indians conclude to attack the post. Happily, however, this officer was able to secure his release, for which he thankfully made a number of valuable presents. He then as soon as possible sent Father Jogues to Manhattan, where on the 5th day of November, 1643, he embarked on a small vessel for Holland.

Arriving at Falmouth, England, in safety he almost immediately took passage on a collier for Brittany, from which he landed at a point between Brest and St. Paul de Leon at the beginning of the following year. On the 5th of January, 1644, worn out by hardship and exposure, and in the guise of a common sailor, he arrived at the college at Rennes, asking for the rector, for whom, he informed the attendant, he had tidings of Father Jogues. Of the meeting Charlevoix writes: "The rector at once came down, and the supposed sailor, without uttering a word, handed him an open letter given him by the Governor of Manhattan with a view of obtaining for him in Holland whatever he might need to reach France. The rector before reading the paper asked him what had become of Father Jogues. The holy man looked at him with a smile. The rector recognized him, then fell on his neck, bathed him in tears, and was so affected that for a time he clasped him to his heart unable to say a word." The servant of God remained a few days at Rennes, and set out for Paris, where his escape was known, as he himself impatiently expected. The Queen mother wished to seen him, and gave him a welcome worthy of her piety. The Pope[1], from whom he solicited permission to celebrate the Divine Mysteries with his mutilated hands, replied that it would be unjust to refuse a martyr of Christ the right to drink the blood of Christ.

But great as was the reverence shown him, and general the desire to do honor to him who had sacrificed so much of personal interest for the benefit of the cause, they were far from satisfying a man of such noble attributes as he, to whom such unwonted honors proved most unwelcome. Continually chafing under these bonds of friendly and generous feeling, it is therefore little to be wondered at that his energetic spirit longed for a return to those scenes of his former labors where even the fact of previous barbarous treatment and almost certainty of its continuation, should he again fall into the hands of his former captors, could not prevent him from desiring. Therefore but a short time after arriving in his native country, learning of the increasing troubles throughout the colony, and that the Hurons were suffering enormous and continual losses at the hands of the Iroquois, he seized the first opportunity of returning to the field of his chosen labors, where all too soon he was to sanctify a noble and glorious life by the sufferings of martyrdom.

(1.) It was necessary that he should receive this special permission from the Pope, owing to the fact that a priest with any deformity of body is debarred from saying Mass. Thus it will be seen that the teeth and knives of the Iroquois had inflicted a greater injury than the torturers had imagined, having robbed him of that privilege which constituted the chief consolation of his life.

EVEN as the moth is allured to its doom by the brilliancy of the flame and weak and vacillating mortals are led into the commission of heinous crime by the glitter and tinsel of sin, so, too, are the good, the great and the inspired lifted from out their natural surroundings and cast within the maelstrom of contending passions, there, by their energy, their works and their example, to better the conditions of mankind.

Thus we see it in the refined and artistic mind, which often, failing to secure its ideal in Nature's unmeasured realm of beauty, finds it amidst the gloomiest and most uninviting resorts of man—the homes of degradation and filth, the prison-pen, the scaffold and the grave. The poet, too, seeks music in a sigh, and with it stirs the innermost depths of human nature; the orator takes suffering for his theme and with it blends the tears of joy and sorrow; the organist evolves those waves of splendid harmony from out the dark and silent loft; and so, even in the most humdrum and common-place instances, our lives are spent in "toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing"—a strange admixture of incongruities, yet ever potent factors in our being.

Thus, too, was it with the Jesuit Missionaries of long ago, whose zealous interests and noble inspirations led but too surely to a premature and bloody grave. Raised amidst scenes of refinement, trained in the art of letters, nurtured in almost rigid seclusion, brought up in an atmosphere abounding with benevolent and religious motives, these men still felt it incumbent upon them to abandon all, to desert home, friends, country, the possibility of advancement in churchly ways, public recognition and admiration, to not only sink their identity in the labors of a far-off mission, but to endure the hardships produced by a change of climate, the scarcity of food, lack of raiment, the utter want of cleanliness, the barbarous and inhuman treatment of the natives, and only too frequently the martyr's fate.

Of such a mould and character was Father Jogues, who further emphasized his readiness to do and to suffer in behalf of humanity by an early return to his uncompleted labors—the evangelization of the Hurons. Of the times which record so graphically the life of this noble man, one has said: "These times of storm and persecution have been, in all infant churches, seasons of plenty in all heavenly benediction, and have never failed to be very fruitful in good Christians. Canada at the close of the last century was a very striking proof of this truth, and we have seen many illustrious witnesses. I enjoyed even the happiness of living with some of those who were actors on that bloody stage, and who could, like St. Paul, show on their bodies the marks of Christ. But not only were the apostles of New France not unworthy of being compared with the founders of the noblest churches, but some of their neophytes also recalled the fairest days of the Primitive Church; and I should deem myself wanting in fidelity to history, were I, in deference to what is called the taste of our age, to pass over in silence the more wonderful acts of these men, that I find in the annals of Canada, and more capable of glorifying Him who from the heart of barbarism could raise up children to Abraham."

But what seemed most remarkable in the general condition of affairs was the fact that, while the Hurons were suffering tremendous losses at the hands of their ever-wakeful and aggressive enemy, their spirit of moral fervor remained firm, constant and unyielding to the insistent glamour of pagan ceremony.

So upon his return to Canada Father Jogues discovered that, while the Hurons were hard pressed and their ranks rapidly thinned by the continuous and vicious onslaughts of the Iroquois, they remained firm and valiant upholders of the Faith, doing battle for it even to the stake, where their behavior evoked unstinted commendation from their sternest foes.

Among many such as these was the Indian Joseph Taondechoren, who had borne the welcome tidings of Father Jogues' survival to Quebec. He was a man of reticent and quiet behavior, who said but little, rarely even censuring those who had done him most harm. His reason for so doing was, he said, "because God diffuses over suffering endured for His sake joys so pure and consolations so strong that no animosity can be felt against those who have been the instruments." The Cause was also greatly strengthened at the time by the unexpected conversion of an Algonquin chief, who had theretofore been noted for his apparently inconquerable antipathy for the Christian religion. His sudden request for instruction in the Christian doctrine came as a complete and welcome surprise to the good missionary, Father Vimond, to whom it was made, and the only explanation he could give in any way accounting for it was that he was proceeding from Fort Richelieu to Three Rivers when a sudden change took place in his mind which he did not understand, and that under an influence he seemed unable to control he had returned to Montreal for instruction. To this statement he added that his wife was equally earnest in her desire to attain a proper understanding of the true religion, and that if the missionary saw fit to refuse their request they would at once apply for information to the Hurons, who, they felt confident, would grant it. It hardly need be stated that such an alternative was unnecessary, the missionary being overwhelmed with joy at the opportunity thus afforded. This voluntary act on the part of the Algonquin chief led to the conversion of many others, so that the work soon by far exceeded the capacity of the two missionaries then in charge at Montreal.

From that time forth, much progress was made among the people of the Algonquin missions, who seemed almost spontaneously to realize the benefit to be gained by such a change. Nor did time alter their opinion or fervor in this respect. So many and frequent, in fact, were the acquisitions of the community that it was not long before the number of Christians at Montreal exceeded that of the heathens. Matters were still further advanced in conveying the Word to all parts of the country by means of a number of Christian Indians who had undertaken the work of instructing their less fortunate and unenlightened fellows in behalf of the missionaries. This was also the case at Three Rivers and Tadoussac, where a number of neophytes were engaged in the work, many of them expressing their devotion to and interest in the Cause by making long and tedious journeys through all kinds of weather, and suffering much privation and numerous other inconveniences rather than that the work should experience any delay.

At Sylleri the work was also progressing noticeably and favorably, but, unfortunately for the settlement, it soon became a mark for roving bands of Iroquois, who never failed where opportunity presented itself to capture those whom they might discover unprotected at any distance from the town. This inaugurated a season of hardships for the inhabitants of Sylleri, inasmuch as it prescribed the possibility, at least without great danger, of their taking advantage of the hunting season. Neither could they with safety go forth as previously and cultivate the soil, but rather were compelled to remain shut up within the palisades, where at last they were brought to a stage of destitution which was most deplorable. From this state, although desirous of doing so, the French were unable to relieve them to any extent, being themselves subjected to the most rigid economy in order that they might subsist.

But here a new trouble arose, for while the material interests of the colony were undergoing these most oppressive and disheartening conditions, the people became both alarmed and indignant at numerous charges arising in France which had been made against the honesty and purity in motive of the missionaries, who, it was loudly insinuated, had taken up their residence in Canada with a view rather to advancing their own material interests by means of trade than for any disposition they might have for the enlightenment and civilization of the Indians. Naturally, as all evil reports are sure to do, these statements spread rapidly, receiving more or less credit, and in fact were so strongly emphasized that, though disgusting to the sensitive natures of these noble men, actually compelled them to argue and make statements in their own defense. However, there was one contingent their calumniators had not foreseen which was sure to quickly and effectively react upon their foolish statements. This appeared in the person of the Company of One Hundred Associates, who, by such trade as that imputed to the Jesuits, would have been the ones to suffer the most severely. In fact, they were in a condition to know that these statements were false and had been made without the slightest attention to truth or consistency, and they felt in honor bound to defend these men by making a united declaration, which was as follows:

"The directors and associates in the Company of New France, in Canada, having heard that some persons were persuaded and spread the report that the society of the Jesuit Fathers has a share in the embarkation, returns and trade carried on with that country—seeking by those means to allure and destroy the esteem and value of the great labors which those missionaries undertake in said country, with incredible pain and hardship and at the peril of their lives, for the service and glory of God, in converting the Indians to the faith of Christianity and the Roman Catholic Apostolic religion, in which they have made and duly make due progress—of which the said Company is particularly informed, having deemed themselves bound by the obligation of Christian charity to disabuse those who entertained this belief by the declaration and certificate which they make by these presents, that the said Jesuit Fathers are not associates in the said Company of New France, either directly or indirectly, and have no interest in the sales of goods made there. In testimony whereof the present declaration has been signed by the said directors and associates[1], and sealed with the seal of the said Company the first day of December, 1643."

Thus was the calumny brought to an inglorious ending, although the Jesuits were much humiliated to think that having traded a few beaver skins for the necessaries of life should have gained for them a reputation for mercenary motives which was far from being theirs. This was more particularly the case when, in the uncalled-for degradation thus incurred, they but too readily noted the willingness on the part of others to overlook the many horrors which accompanied their vocation; the memory of those who had already fallen victims to the murderous instincts of the Iroquois; the number of zealous workers who were prisoners in the hands of the foe, and of the hundred and one other instances which had gone to show an earnest desire for the promulgation of Christianity on their part, and at whatever cost to them. The condition of the missionaries was, in fact, anything but to be desired; for, not only had their characters as men been thoughtlessly and viciously assailed, but their material interests had been disregarded, while, at the same time, they had for three years been left without the slightest assistance from Quebec in the way of supplies. Finally a number of Hurons who had undertaken a similar journey started forth with a load of clothing and provisions, and were on that occasion, at their earnest request, accompanied by Father Francis Joseph Bressani,[1] who volunteered for that purpose. So, in the latter part of April, 1644, he set forth from Quebec, accompanied by a young Frenchman and six Hurons, two of the latter having but recently escaped from the Iroquois. Thus they traveled without incident as far as the entrance of Lake St. Pierre, where they fell into the hands of a party of Iroquois. By these people Father Bressani was treated with such extreme brutality that it seemed almost a miracle his life was spared. However, when he had about given up all hope, a council meeting was held, at which it was decided to spare his life, and he was finally taken to the nearest Dutch post, where he was received kindly and as soon as his condition permitted sent back to his native country.

These hostilities continued between the tribes, although the Iroquois, who had always declared their intention of making their war upon the Hurons one of extermination, had on several occasions made advances toward the French and shown a decided inclination for peace. The Governor of Quebec was naturally quite ardent, too, in his desire that such a condition of affairs should be brought about, as the number of his people available in case of an attack was quite limited, while, owing to the laxity or indifference on the part of the Company, he was quite often without the necessary munitions in case a protracted war should be entered upon. It was while in this uncertain and most uncomfortable condition and some time subsequent to the affair of Father Bressani, previously related, that M. de Champfleur, governor of Three Rivers, sent him word that a party of Hurons had just arrived at the settlement, bringing with them three Iroquois prisoners,

(1) Those signing were de la Ferte, Abbe de la Magdeleine, Margonet, Berruyer, Robineau, Sabouet, Berruyer, Verdier, Fleurian, Caset, Bourguet, Clarentin.

(1) Father Bressani was a native of Rome and entered the Society of Jesus at the age of fifteen, spending many years as professor of literature, philosophy and mathematics. Filled with zeal for the salvation of souls, and doubtless moved by the example of Chaumonot and Poncet, he solicited the Canada mission, and was sent to America in 1642. For two years he was employed among the colonists and Algonquins near Quebec. Sent then to the Hurons in 1644, he fell with his companions into a Mohawk ambuscade near Fort Richelieu and was taken prisoner. Father Bressani was tortured and condemned to the stake. Led with every brutality to the banks of the upper Hudson, he was compelled to run the gauntlet, beaten, cut, and mangled; then hurried on again over rocks and thorns, famishing with hunger, spent with blows and loss of blood, he reached the first Mohawk village to run again the fearful race and meet the torture on the scaffold and in the cabins. He was now a living mass of corruption, the worms that fed in him dropping as he moved. Yet he lived, and when they changed their resolution and gave him to an old woman, she sold him to the Dutch, who treated him kindly, and sent him back to France. Canada was still his choice, and he returned in July, 1648, and accompanied the party to Quebec, which, attacked by the Mohawks, defeated them with loss. He returned the same year. After the death of Daniel de Brebeuf and Lalemant, he was sent to Quebec again in 1649 for aid, but could not return till the following year. Wounded on the way by the Iroquois, who again attacked him, he met the first Huron party emigrating to Quebec, and learned of the final ruin of the mission. He sailed for Europe on the first of November, 1650, and after preaching many years in Italy, died at Florence on the 9th day of September, 1672. He published in 1653, at Macerata, his Breve Relatione, of which a translation appeared at Montreal in 1852.—Shea.

one of whom they had, however, given to the Algonquins. He further added that he had arranged with these people to make no disposition of the prisoners until they had heard from Quebec, believing that, could he secure their release and return them to their people, it would be the means of effecting a friendly alliance with the Iroquois, or at least induce them to relent to a certain extent in carrying out their former determination of bitter and relentless warfare.

On learning of the situation, de Montmagny at once hastened to Three Rivers, where he set before the Indians the necessity for such a step as that proposed, and, in addition, to enforce and emphasize his desire in regard to the matter, gave them a number of presents as an evidence of his extreme regard for them. The chief of the Algonquins immediately acquiesced in his request, paying a grateful tribute to the worth of the Governor and stating blandly that it would be impossible for him to deny him anything. But he was momentarily embarrassed by the actions of one of the Hurons, who strongly maintained his desire to be considered as a warrior, not a trader; that if the Governor desired his prisoners, he could have them, but not in return for gifts; for that he could replace them or die in the endeavor, although in the latter case his people would charge his death to Ononthio. Following him arose another Huron, a convert, who said: "Ononthio, let not the words of my brother indispose you against us. If we cannot consent to give you up our prisoners, it is for reasons that you will not disapprove. We should lose honor if we did so. You see no old man among us; young people, as we are, are not masters of their actions, and warriors would be dishonored if, instead of returning home with captives, they made their appearance with goods. What would you say yourself, father, to your soldiers if you saw them come back from the war in the guise of merchants? The mere wish which you express to have our slaves might take the place of ransom; but it does not lie with us to dispose of them. Our brethren, the Algonquins, could do what you ask of them, because they are with their sachems, who are answerable to no man for their conduct; not being restrained by the same motives as ourselves, they could not in courtesy refuse you so trifling a matter. Our sachems, when they know our intentions, will doubtless pursue some course. We all desire peace: we enter into your views; we even anticipated them, for we have done no harm to our prisoners; we have treated them as men who are to be our friends; but it does not become us to forestall the consent of our seniors, nor deprive them of so brilliant an opportunity of showing our father how they respect his will.

"Another reason also restrains us, and I am sure that it will be as legitimate as the first in your eyes. We know that the river is covered with our enemies; if we meet a force superior to us, what will your presents avail except to embarrass us and animate them the more to the combat, to profit by our booty? But if they see among us some of their brethren who show that we desire peace; that Ononthio wishes to be father of all the nations; that he can no longer permit his children, whom he bears alike in his bosom, to continue to destroy each other, their arms will fall from their hands. Our prisoners will save our lives and they will labor much more efficaciously for peace than if too great anxiety is shown to set them free."

The plea was well and ably made, it being evident to all that it would prove the most satisfactory as well as certain means of bringing about a favorable termination of the existing difficulties. None were keener to appreciate this act than the Governor of Quebec, who not only heartily endorsed the proposal made by the Huron chief, but did everything in his power to induce them to carry out and complete the idea. So the matter was amicably settled, the Hurons departing for their country accompanied by Father de Brebeuf, who had for some time impatiently awaited an opportunity of returning to his mission, which he had been compelled to leave for a period for the purpose of securing necessaries otherwise unobtainable. Accompanying him were two other missionaries of the Jesuit Order—Fathers Leonard Garreau and Natalis Chabanel.[1]

So the party started out, although the Governor, wary of former experiences, sent a sufficient escort along to protect them from wandering and aggressive bands of the enemy with whom they might come in contact. Fortunately, however, the journey was accomplished without any difficulty whatsoever; so that when the party had safely arrived within the limits of the Huron country it was decided, at a meeting of the chiefs then held, that, in accordance with his request, the Iroquois prisoners should be returned to the Governor of Quebec. De Montmagny had, however, not waited for the return of his people, having already set at liberty the Iroquois prisoner who had been given over to him, and returned him with suitable offerings to his people.

(1) Of the former's experience among the Huron missions, a more extended notice will be given at a later period. Of the latter it may be said that the life to which he was subjected was extremely objectionable to him, and that it was only the extreme firmness of his moral character, and the great desire on his part to do something that would reflect credit on the Order and be of benefit to his fellow men, that induced him to undertake the task. Father Chabanel, in fact, Parkman tells us, detested the Indian life—the smoke, the vermin, the filth, the food, the impossibility of privacy. He could not study by the smoky lodge fire, among the noisy crowd of men and squaws with their dogs, and their restless, screeching children. He had a natural inaptitude to learning the language and labored at it for five years with scarcely any signs of progress. The devil whispered a suggestion into his ear: let him procure his release from these barren and repulsive toils, and return to France, where congenial employment awaited him. Chabanel refused to listen, and when the temptation still beset him, he bound himself by a solemn vow to remain in Canada to the day of his death. This act of severity on his part is most duly given and attested in the Relation of Ragueneau, 1850, in which Chabanel's vow is given verbatim.

The wisdom of this act on his part was made manifest in the reply of the numerous Iroquois cantons, who, to show their appreciation of the act and anxiety for a better understanding with the French, returned to him the Frenchman Couture, who had remained a prisoner in their hands for some considerable time. Accompanying this man also came the Iroquois prisoner, besides a number of deputies from the tribes, to whom had been accorded the authority to confer with the Governor and arrange for a treaty with him. That their coming was a welcome evidence of the desire of their nation for an understanding, was fully appreciated at Quebec, and their arrival at Three Rivers being announced, de Montmagny lost no time in arranging for a specific date[1] at which a general council and discussion of the situation might be held. On this occasion the scene was a most imposing one, the French being represented by the Governor, M. de Champfleur, Governor of Three Rivers, Father Vimond,[2] and a number of the principal inhabitants of the colony, while the deputies of the Iroquois, five in number,[3] were seated at his feet, a point selected by them in order to show their great and lasting respect. In addition to these, a number of Montmagnez, Algonquins and Attikamegues were present in a body, while a numerous representation of the Hurons were scattered throughout the meeting among the French.

The story of this meeting is both interesting and instructive, affording in a most graphic manner an excellent idea of the many peculiar features attached to such occasions, the remarkable gift of oratory exhibited by many chiefs and their suave and cautious method of handling a delicate subject, which would even obtain credit for the lofty ideals of statesmanship in civilized countries. And while many of their speeches appear excessive in grandiloquence and overburdened with redundancy, they were, perhaps, made more apparently so by the method of illustration which was ever a part or detail of set speeches on such occasions. To this particular gathering, we are told, the emissaries of the Iroquois nation brought seventeen belts,[4] which represented, according to their manner of presentation, seventeen distinct propositions which they desired to lay before the council for consideration and adoption.

In order that they might be enabled to do so with the utmost effect, they erected two posts, between which a cord was stretched, and upon this cord, as each particular subject was brought to the notice of his hearers by the orator, a belt was hung.

The particular oration to which we at the present time refer is graphically described by Charlevoix as follows: "All being ranged in the order described, the orator of the canton (Kiotsaeton[5] or the Hook), rose, took the belt, presented it to the Governor-General, and said: 'Onontbio, give ear to my voice; all the Iroquois speak by my mouth. My heart has no evil thought; all my intentions are upright. We wish to forget all our songs of war and let them give place to chants of joy.' He immediately began to sing, his colleagues keeping time with their hey, drawn in cadence from the bottom of the chest, and, while chanting, he walked with great strides and gesticulated in a manner ludicrous enough.

> us, for you cannot deliver us from death; think of the living; rescue them from the knife and the fire. When I heard this voice I went on my way and journeyed hither, to deliver those whom you still hold in captivity." The purpose of the fifth, sixth and seventh belts was to open and make available the waterways between the French and Iroquois, to drive away all hostile canoes, and to temper the elements generally, so as to make the journey smooth and inviting. The eighth performed the same office for the way by land. Here the orator began in pantomime to hew and fell the trees, saying: "Look, the road is open, smooth and straight. There is no thorn or stick or log in the way. Now you may see the smoke of our villages from the door of the heart of our country." The ninth belt, a remarkable beauty, designated a bond to cement the friendly relations proposed between the Iroquois, the French and their Indian allies. Another belt invited the French to a feast in the country of the Iroquois. "Our country," stated the Iroquois, "is full of fish, venison, moose, beaver, and game of every kind. Leave these filthy swine that run about among our houses, feeding on garbage, and come and eat good food with us. The road is open; there is no danger." The burrowing of another belt was to scatter the clouds, so that the sun might continually shine on the hearts of the Indians and French, and reveal their sincerity and truth. The fifteenth belt was designed to express the desire the Iroquois had always felt for the safe return of Father Jogues to his people. The orator therefore expressed his sorrow at their inability to do so, owing to the fact that he had been stolen from them by the Dutch. "But," continued the orator, "if he had been patient I would have brought him back myself." This caused the Reverend Missionary to smile as he remarked to a fellow Jesuit: "they had the pile laid to burn me. They would have killed me a hundred times if God had not saved my life." After the purpose of the remaining belts had been properly designated, the orator concluded by saying: "I go to spend what remains of the summer in my own country in games and dances and rejoicing for the blessing of peace."

(5) Or Kietsaton presented a most striking figure as the embassy approached Three Rivers in their canoes, his tall, erect figure, covered from head to foot with belts of wampum, standing in the bow of the sail-boat, which brought him and his companions from Fort Richelieu. Having landed, he and his colleagues were conducted to the private apartment of the Commandant, where they were graciously received and handsomely entertained. Of the interview which followed Parkman gives this interesting account: "'We are glad to see you,' said Champfleur to Kiersetan; 'you may be sure that you are safe here. It is as if you were among your own people and in your own house.' 'Tell your chief that he lies,' replied the honored guest, addressing the interpreter, Champfleur, though he probably knew that this was the Indian mode of expressing dissent, showed some little surprise, when Kiersetan, after tranquilly smoking for a moment, proceeded: 'Your chief says it is as if I were in my own country. This is not true; for there I am not so lonely and cast down. He says it is as if I were in my own house; but in my own house I am sometimes very ill served. Here you feast me with all manner of good cheer.' From this and many other replies the French conceived that they had to do with a man of esprit."

He undoubtedly belonged to that class of professed orators who though rarely or never claiming honors of hereditary chieftainship, had great influence among the Iroquois, and were employed in all affairs of embassy and negotiation. They had memories trained to an astonishing tenacity, and were perfect in all conventional metaphors in which the language of Indian diplomacy and rhetoric mainly consisted, knew by heart the traditions of the nation, and were adepts in the parliamentary usages which among the Iroquois were held little less than sacred.

(1) It is stated that the Iroquois embassies were feasted continuously for a week, through which time they were the guests of the French, the Hurons, and Algonquins, respectively. At the end of that period the grand peace council took place.

(2) Also Vimont. It is also stated that a number of other Jesuits were present at the council, among them being Father Jogues.

(3) Parkman states that there were but four altogether in the party, one being the liberated Iroquois, two renowned ambassadors of the Mohawk nation, and the fourth Guillaume Couture, who had long since been given up as dead.

(4) In this peculiar display of illustrative oratory, the third belt was used as a symbol to declare that the nation of the orator, the Iroquois, had sent presents to the other nations to recall their war parties in view of the approaching peace. The fourth belt was presented as an assurance that the memory of slain Iroquois no longer stirred the living to vengeance, being emphasized in the following graphic language as presented by Parkman: "I passed near the place where Piskaret and the Algonquins slew our warriors in the spring. I saw the scene of the fight where the two prisoners here were taken. I passed quickly; I would not look on the blood of my people. Their bodies lie there still; I turned away my eyes that I might not be angry.' Then stooping, he struck the ground and seemed to listen: 'I hear the voice of my ancestors slain by the Algonquins crying to me in a tone of affection, "my grandson, my grandson, restrain your anger; think no more of calmer air, and continued his speech. 'The belt which I present you, father, thanks you for giving life to my brother; you have rescued him from the teeth of the Algonquins, but how could you let him set out alone? Had his canoe turned, who was to help him to right it? Had he drowned or perished by any accident, you would have had no tidings of peace, and perhaps have cast the blame on us, when it rested solely on yourself.' With these words he hung the belt on the cord, took another, and, binding it on Couture's arm, he again turned to the Governor and said: 'Father, this belt brings back your subject; I was far from saying, 'Nephew, take a canoe and return to your country.' I should never have been tranquil till I had sure tidings of his arrival.

"'My brother whom you sent back has suffered much and run great risk; he had to carry his pack alone, row all day, drag his canoe over the rapids, be always on the watch against surprise.' The orator accompanied his words with very expressive gestures, sometimes seeming to see a man urging on his canoe with a pole; sometimes turned off a wave with a paddle; sometimes he seemed out of breath, then took heart again, and for some time remained calm enough.

"He then pretended to strike his foot against a stone while carrying his baggage; then he limped as if lamed; 'Even,' he cried after all this pantomime, 'if he had been aided to pass the most difficult spots! Indeed, father, I do not know where your mind was, to send back one of your children alone and unaided. I did not do the same with regard to Couture. I said to him, "Let us go, nephew; follow me. I will restore you to your family at the risk of my life."'"

In his reply to the propositions of the Iroquois as presented by Kiotsaeton in the grand peace council, de Montmagny accepted the proffered offer of peace, emphasizing his acceptance by numerous gifts of considerable value. A demand made by him, however, at this time, upon which particular stress was laid, was to the effect that the Indian allies should be left unmolested till their head chiefs had been notified of the result of the meeting and had been given sufficient time to make a formal acceptance of the treaty in their own behalf. At the conclusion of the Governor's speech, the Algonquin Chief Piskaret[1] made numerous valuable presents to the Iroquois, saying, among other things, "Here is a stone which I set on the grave of all who fell during the war, that no one may come to move their bones or think of avenging them." Much stress was laid upon the evident earnestness of the remarks made by this chief,[2] who was recognized as one of the bravest men in all Canada.

(1) Also Pieskaret.

(2) This man stood out as a bright peculiar star from among the others of his nation, whose inferiority to a great extent resulted from their serious lack of organization. But he was a recognized chief in deed as well as name, and as such was regarded and respected by the Indians of all nations. "He dwelt," says Parkman, "on a great island in the Ottawa of which le Bourgne was chief. He had lately turned Christian in the hope of French favor and countenance—always useful to an ambitious Indian—and perhaps, too, with an eye to the gun and the powder-horn which formed the earthly reward of the convert. Tradition tells marvelous stories of his exploits. Once, it is said, he entered an Iroquois town on a dark night. His first care was to seek out a sleeping place, and he soon found one in the midst of a large wood pile. Next he crept into a lodge and found the inmates asleep, killed them with his war club, took their scalps and quietly withdrew to the retreat he had prepared. In the morning a howl of lamentation and fury rose from the astonished villagers. They ranged the fields in vain pursuit of the mysterious enemy, who remained all day in the wood pile, whence at night he came forth and repeated his exploit. On the third night every family placed its sentinels; and Piskaret, stealthily creeping from lodge to lodge, reconnoitering each through crevices in the bark, saw watchers everywhere. At length he descried a sentinel who had fallen asleep, near the entrance to a lodge, though his companion at the other end was still awake and vigilant. He pushed aside the sheet of bark that served as a door, struck the sleeper a deadly blow, yelled his war-cry, and fled like the wind. All the village turned out in furious chase, but Piskaret was the swiftest runner of his time, and easily kept in advance of his pursuers. When daylight came, he showed himself from time to time to lure them on, yelled defiance, and distanced them again. At night all but six had given over the chase; and even these, exhausted as they were, had begun to despair. Piskaret, seeing a hollow tree, crept into it like a bear, and hid himself, while the Iroquois, losing his traces in the dark, lay down to sleep near by. At midnight he emerged from his retreat, stealthily approached his slumbering enemies, nimbly brained them all with his war-club, and then, burdened with a goodly bundle of scalps, journeyed homeward in triumph." Many other wonderful escapades and adventures are accorded to him, but he finally met with the fate so often meted out by him to others, for, taken unawares and under the guise of friendship, he was, in 1647, murdered in cold blood by a number of Iroquois warriors who returned with his scalp in triumph to their companions.

The Chief of the Montagnez, named Negabamet, also presented the ambassadors of the Iroquois with a moose skin with which to make themselves moccasins, so that their feet might not become injured on the homeward journey. Of the other tribes present, none took active part in the discussion, although acquiescing as a whole in the decisions arrived at between Montmagny and the others. Thus, at least for a while, and many hoped definitely, was settled the dispute and hostilities between the nations, a condition which was alike approved and rejoiced in by a majority of those concerned, that is, at least so far as the French and their Indian allies were concerned.

The treaty, therefore, having been satisfactoriiy arranged for, the emissaries of the Iroquois started upon their return journey, two of the French, two Hurons and two Algonquins accompanying them, while three of their people remained as hostages at Three Rivers. The treaty was finally ratified by the Mohawk canton, after which the two Frenchmen and four Indians returned to Three Rivers. They also brought with them a pressing invitation from the Iroquois for some missionaries to come and take up their abode with them. They further averred that the other tribes of the Huron and Algonquin families were satisfied with the treaty and ready to stand by its provisions.

It was at about this time that the missionary, Father Bressani, reached Quebec, from which place in a few days he continued his journey, in company with Father Poncet, on his way to the Huron missions, although he strongly urged his claims for a like position among the Iroquois, if that field were open for missionary administration. Matters now continued in a most pleasing and satisfactory manner to all parties concerned, the winter of 1645-6 being made notable from the fact that the peace arrangement had brought about a co-mingling of tribes never before deemed possible. It was also a time of great benefit to the missionaries, who, owing to the generally peaceful condition of the country, were enabled to enlarge their field of operation and to strengthen and upbuild many points of operation where previously the work, though arduous and sincere, had given but little intimation of improvement or success.

The peace also enabled the colony to advance its commercial interests and improve its fur trade, the result of which was that a fleet which sailed for France on October 24, 1645, carried 30,000 pounds of beaver. Another striking feature at this time was the effort made by the Society of Montreal to have an Episcopal See established at that settlement. This undertaking would doubtless have been brought to a successful issue had it not been for the sudden and unexpected death of the Rev. Mr. Legauffre, a worthy and zealous member of the society. Subsequently, however, the matter was taken in hand by Cardinal Marzarin and the French bishops, but it finally failed of accomplishment.

During the earlier part of the year 1646 the missionary force of New France met with a severe loss in the death of Father Enemond Masse, who died at Sylleri while still in the active exercises of his duties. This unhappy event occurred somewhere between May 11 and 16 of that year. This blow was doubly felt, as it followed by but a few months the loss of the revered Anne de Noue.[1]

For some time now following the peace gathering at Three Rivers the colonists had enjoyed many desirable benefits accruing from the general understanding, for, not only had it afforded to them a special opportunity for enlarging their sphere of commercial action by enabling them to open up new channels and thereby add considerably to their material condition, but, what was better still, it had given to them the privileges of a free and independent style of living, so that, unhampered by the fear of treacherous and lurking foes, they could go forth to their labors or enjoyment in freedom and unrestraint. Unfortunately, this condition of affairs was but of short duration, for hardly had the good people begun to appreciate the happiness and true desirability of the situation, when war clouds lowered once more upon that unfortunate country.

A serious misunderstanding arose, which, owing to the treacherous actions of the Sokokis, came near embroiling the Hurons and Iroquois once more in a deadly and destructive strife. These Sokokis, it would seem, had always maintained a bitter hatred towards the Algonquins; so much so, in fact, that they had utilized every available means in their power to estrange the Iroquois from them and prevent that tribe from establishing a peace footing with them. Unable to do this, they waited patiently an opportunity when, by means both vindictive and cruel, they could arouse the slumbering passions of the tribes. One day an opportunity presented itself. Three of the native residents[2] of Sylleri who had ventured a short distance beyond the confines of the town were found murdered, and hardly had the people overcome their first surprise and alarm at the occurrence when two others—man and wife—were tomahawked, scalped and left for dead. The woman

(1) Father Masse was one of the Jesuits who occupied the mission house at Quebec in 1634, at which time Father le Jeune was Superior. He had been nicknamed "le Pere Utile," owing to his many useful qualities, and had accompanied Father Biard in 1611 to assist in maintaining a mission in Acadia. Like others of the Order, he too had endeavored to become satisfied with, or rather inure himself to a life among the natives, but the hard fare, the smoke and filth and other noticeable features pertaining to that condition were altogether beyond his endurance. After a life of remarkable adventure, he, with two others of the brotherhood, Charles Lalemant and Jean de Brebeuf, embarked for the missions of New France, so that a decade and a half after Biard and Masse had landed in Acadia Canada first became acquainted with those who subsequently did so much towards the settlement and evangelization of that country. Father Masse's death occurred at the advanced age of seventy-two, it even then being hastened by the arduous duties which he was wont to impose upon himself.

Father de Noue had been a page at the court of France during his earlier years, and before entering the society of Jesus. He first went to Canada in 1626 or 1627, and afterwards returned to that country in 1632, where, after several years of labor, he was frozen to death on the St. Lawrence, near Isle Platte, about the 2d day of February, 1646.—Shea.

Of this occurrence Parkman says: "On the 30th January, 1636, Father Anne de Noue set out from Three Rivers to come to the Fort built by the French at the mouth of the river Richelieu, where he was to say Mass and hear confessions. De Noue was sixty-three years old at the time of his coming to Canada in 1625. As an indifferent memory disabled him from mastering the Indian languages, he devoted himself to the spiritual charge of the French and of the Indians about the forts within reach of an interpreter. For the rest he attended the sick, and in times of scarcity fished in the river, or dug roots in the woods for the subsistence of his flock. In short, though sprung from a noble family in Champagne, he shrunk from no labor however humble, to which his idea of duty or his vow of obedience called him.

"The old missionary had for companions two soldiers and a Huron Indian. They were all on snow-shoes, and the soldiers dragged their baggage on small sledges. Their highway was the St. Lawrence transformed to solid ice, and buried like the country beneath two or three feet of snow, which far and near glared dazzling white in the clear winter sun. Before the night, they had walked eighteen miles, and the soldiers, unused to snow-shoes, were greatly fatigued. They made their camp in the forest on the shore of the great expansion of the St. Lawrence called the lake of St. Peter—dug away the snow, heaped it around the spot as a barrier against the wind, made their fire on the frozen earth in the midst, and lay down to sleep. At two o'clock in the morning de Noue awoke. The moon shone like daylight over the vast white desert of the frozen lake with its bordering fir-trees bowed to the ground with snow; and the kindly thought struck the Father that he might ease his companions by going in advance to Fort Richelieu and sending back men to aid them in dragging their sledges. So he set forth. Before dawn the weather changed. The air thickened, clouds hid the moon and a snow-storm set in. The traveler was in utter darkness. He lost the points of the compass, wandered far out on the lake, and when day appeared, could see nothing but the snow beneath his feet, and the myriads of falling flakes that encompassed him like a curtain impervious to the sight. Still he toiled on, winding hither and thither, and at times unwittingly circling back on his own footsteps. At night he dug a hole in the snow on the shore of an island, and lay down, without fire, food, or blanket. In the meantime the two soldiers and Indian, though failing to discover his footprints, started towards the fort, but the Indian being ignorant of the country and the Frenchmen unskilled they lost their way. Towards evening they encamped on the shore of the island of St. Ignace, where the Indian left them to pursue his journey to the fort. Here he finally arrived and was much excited and surprised on learning that de Noue had not been seen. At daybreak parties were sent out to search. The soldiers were quickly found, but the missionary was nowhere to be seen. Thus they hunted throughout the entire day. On the following morning the search was renewed by an Indian named Charles and a companion, who, with a French soldier, started out in the vain hope of finding him. Not long after they came upon his footsteps, and thenceforth traced him through all of his journeyings, discovered the camp by the shore of the island, and thence followed him to the Fort. He had passed near it without discovering it—perhaps weakness had dimmed his sight—stopped to rest at a point a league above, and thence made his way about three leagues farther. Here they found him. He had dug a circular excavation in the snow, and was kneeling in it on the earth. His head was bare, his eyes opened and turned upwards, and his hands clasped on his breast. His hat and his snow-shoes lay at his side. The body was leaning slightly forward resting against the bank of snow before it, and frozen to the hardness of marble. Thus in an act of kindness and charity died the first martyr of the Canadian mission."

recovered, and it was through that most fortunate and almost miraculous occurrence that the Iroquois were relieved of the suspicion which had momentarily rested upon them, while the real culprits, the sneaking and brutal Sokokis, were discovered and their villainous plot revealed. Had the circumstances surrounding the outcome of this incident been less fortunate, it is hardly possible to estimate the amount of damage which would have been done, not only to the material interests of the colony, but to the spiritual condition of affairs which had consumed such an immense amount of time, labor and suffering to bring it to its even then crude and unsatisfactory condition. As it was, however, the occurrence proved, it might almost be said, a blessing in disguise, for it had the effect of opening the eyes of all parties concerned to the seriousness of the case, as well as to the great responsibility devolving upon each as a factor in the new arrangement and the necessity for their careful and deliberate consideration of all points which might arise or be brought forward for the purpose of breaking in upon or destroying their present friendly relations. They therefore came together once more and the treaty which had been authorized by the peace gathering of the previous year was again ratified by emissaries of the Iroquois, the object of their visit to the colony also being to bear the condolence of the tribe to the settlement for the great loss they had sustained in the deaths of Fathers de Noue and Masse.

But here, undoubtedly, the small point of the wedge had been entered, which, ere long, driven by the passions and excesses of the savages to its full extent and to the very heart of this quivering and desolate country, was to cause not only the absolute annihilation of a number of the largest and most prominent tribes of Canada, but also, to a great extent and for a considerable period, neutralize the effects of religious culture, which had cost so many years of patient suffering and persistent labor on the part of the missionary fathers, the lives of many of whom, in fact, had been cheerfully rendered in behalf of the Cause.

The subsequent difficulty of which the foregoing incident was the precursor was also perhaps hastened to some extent by an unintentional oversight on the part of de Montmagny, who had been advised by the representatives of the Iroquois nation to keep a vigilant watch on those of their people who had not as yet become parties of the treaty and who had been holding back, awaiting friendly action on his part in the anticipated release of a number of braves belonging to their several cantons who were held prisoners by the allies. There were four of these tribes or settlements who thus stood aloof from the general arrangement, not actually becoming aggressors, but evidently feeling the slight which they deemed had been put upon them, and naturally, as with those whose minds have ever been trained to act in unison with instinct or on the spur of the moment, began to think all kinds of unpleasant things, thus gradually, although perhaps all unthinkingly, fanning the slumbering embers of discord into an apparent and menacing flame.

It was at this juncture that Father Jogues again became an active factor in the field, and realizing the seriousness of the situation with that whole-heartedness and entire lack of individual interest which had ever marked his course through life, offered his services as preacher and teacher to go among these people, whose language he thoroughly understood, and thereby gain an additional hold upon their moral being which would doubtless have a beneficial effect upon their actions as regards the material conditions of the country.

So he returned with the envoys, hoping and promising, if successful, to come back with the news of their good fortune and the promised allegiance of all of the cantons to the treaty. On this journey he was accompanied by the Sieur Bourdon, a leading citizen of Quebec, proprietor of the fiefs of St. John and St. Francis in the dependency of Quebec, chief engineer and subsequently procurator-general of New France, who came to the colony in 1633 or 1634 and was made Seigneur of Domburg (now Neuville and Pointe aux Trembles) in 1637. They left Three Rivers on May 16, 1646, taking their final departure from Fort Richelieu two days later. In addition to those already named, there were two Algonquins who followed in an extra canoe which was loaded with presents from their people to the Iroquois. The party made this journey by way of Lake George, the Mohawk name for which was Andiatarocte or "Where the lake closes," to which Father Jogues gave the name of Lake Ste. Sacrament or Lake of the Blessed Sacrament, owing to their arrival there on the eve of Corpus Christi; then they forded the upper Hudson, striking the river again at Ossarague, a fishing post, from whence they descended in canoes to Fort Orange, where they arrived on June 4. Two days later they left the fort and continued their journey, reaching the town of Osserrion, which the missionary called Holy Trinity, on the following evening. Here they were met by the Sachems with every courtesy. Having delivered the presents sent to them by the Governor with appropriate remarks, and expressing a desire for continued and lasting friendship between them, after a few days rest among these people, Father Jogues set forth June 16 on his return journey to the settlement, arriving at Fort Richelieu on June 27. Here he reported to de Montmagny the condition of affairs as it appeared to him, although the Governor seemed prone to attribute his enthusiasm to an undue amount of reliance on the part of the missionary in the nation's pledges.

Now, it is a generally conceded fact that the Iroquois were perfectly conscientious and honest in professing a desire for peace, as was made still more evident in their reiterated statements to the same effect after their return from the council at Three Rivers. But the treaty, we are told, had two glaring defects; one being the natural capriciousness and unreliability of the Indian character, while the latter—equally, if not far more important—was constituted in the fact that the envoys visiting Three Rivers represented but one nation (the Mohawks), and not the entire Five, as had naturally been supposed. Each of these nations was wont to act independently of the other regarding matters pertaining to peace and war, and even their enemy was by no means necessarily a common one, as evidenced in this instance or at this time, where the Mohawks had conducted operations particularly against the French and their Indian allies on the lower St. Lawrence, while the four other nations divided their time between the Hurons, Upper Algonquins and other tribes occupying the interior. But, though far from perfect, the treaty, even as it stood, was fulfilling a great mission, and as such was fostered with utmost circumspection by de Montmagny, the missionaries and colonists alike.

At the time of which we speak, the Mohawks were most numerous of all the Iroquois nation, excepting the Senecas, who, a few years earlier than the period we write of, were double at least their number. No cause is known for this somewhat appalling diminution in their ranks, saving alone for their active and warlike spirit and tireless activity in pursuit of the enemy. In or about the year 1646 their numbers were estimated at from six to seven hundred warriors. But, though they figured more often as victors than victims, their rapidly succeeding hostilities with the Mohegans, the Andastes and Algonquins and the French, depleted their ranks to an alarming extent, so that well within two decades they had become reduced numerically from second to next to last among the Five Nations. To be more specific, the total number of Iroquois in 1660 was estimated at 2,200, being divided as follows: Mohawks, 500; Oneidas, 100; Onondagas, 300; Cayugas, 300; Senecas, 1,000. In 1677 there were 2,150 Iroquois, the division then being: Mohawks, 300; Oneidas, 200; Onondagas, 350; Cayugas, 300, and Senecas 1,000.

The country occupied by the Iroquois nation at this time was between seventy and eighty leagues in extent from east to west and between forty-one degrees and forty-four degrees north. Here the territory occupied by the Senecas lay south of Lake Ontario and running perhaps a little east from its center down to the shores of Lake Erie; east of these lay the Cayugas, whose villages nestled around the margins of some smaller lakes, the southern part of one of which reached down into the territory occupied by the Onondagas, who came next; then came the Oneidas, whose principal settlement was on the banks of the small lake bearing their name, which was situated south of the east end of Lake Ontario; directly east of the Oneidas lay the territory of the Mohawks, through which, in a northwesterly direction, ran the Mohawk River, a confluent of the Hudson, which enters the parent stream some distance above Albany, or Fort Orange as it was then known. North and south this territory covers a distance of between forty and fifty leagues. The territory is bounded on the south by the Ohio River and Pennsylvania, on the west by Lake Ontario, on the northwest by Lake Erie, on the north by Lake St. Sacrament and the River St. Lawrence, and by New York partly on the south and partly on the southeast. The little lake in the territory of the Onondagas called Gannentaha has in its vicinity several salt springs, the edges of which are almost always covered with fine salt. Two leagues away, we are told, and in the direction of the canton of Cayuga, there was a spring of milk-white water of very sharp odor, which when set on fire resolved into a kind of salt as acrid as caustic. This spring Shea refers to as being probably one located near Camillus. The soil throughout this region is exceedingly rich and productive, although that in the canton of Cayuga is said to surpass all others in matter of excellence, while the climate is noted for its superiority. The tract of country occupied by the Senecas developed many charming and valuable spots of soil throughout, averaging above the medium. Here earth is said to have been discovered which when well washed developed a very pure quality of sulphur. Throughout the entire territory occupied by the Five Nations all the fruit trees of Europe could be satisfactorily cultivated; some, in fact, were known to grow there without receiving any care whatsoever. As to the woodlands, the forests abounded in chestnut trees, and nut trees of two kinds, one bearing very sweet and the other a very bitter nut—the winter cherry. There are also several kinds of fruit for which this section of the country was noted for producing large quantities. Among other growths peculiar to this section is one commonly known as the universal plant, the leaves of which, bruised, close all kinds of wounds. The root of this plant is said to have the odor of the laurel. There were also other roots fitted for dyeing, some of which give quite brilliant colors. Of animals and reptiles, besides rattle snakes which were found there, as in all of the most southerly provinces of North America, there was a black snake, which, however, was not venomous. The grey tiger, or rather American panther, also abounded in this territory, their flesh being estimated by many as equal to mutton. The most valuable peltry in that region was the black squirrel, which was very lively, gentle and easily tamed. Of the skins of these little animals the Iroquois made robes, which when finished were valued at seven or eight dollars apiece. Pigeons were also extremely numerous in that section, being sometimes flying in such large numbers as to completely darken the country over which they passed. To this portion of the country is also attributed the discovery of stones containing diamonds, some of which are said to have been of excellent quality.

It was here, then, that the Reverend Father, after a short residence at the settlement and the completion of his political errand, returned to fulfill the mission of his life in exalting the cause of religion through his martyrdom. Of his ultimate and tragic end he undoubtedly had premonition in that, when called upon to undertake the dangerous task, he asserted as his firm belief that he would never return.

Again the war between the tribes broke out with renewed fury, the Iroquois this time becoming the aggressors. Like a pestilence the contagion spread far and wide till throughout the entire territory were to be heard the war-songs of the tribes, or bands of painted warriors seen pursuing their horrible trade of murder and destruction. Again was the entire country subjected to a condition of unsafety which had never before been equaled even in the most disastrous times, for now the wretched colonists, and their still more miserable associates, the allies, weakened, dispirited and almost driven to desperation by fear of the malignant foe, knew not which way to turn for succor or for safety. All of the peaceful vocations which for a short period had brought so much hope and comfort to these people, were in a moment forsaken, and in place of their following the more tranquil pursuits of life were to be seen the sneaking forms of savage foes who soon infested the entire territory. Even the settlements were hard pressed, those of Montreal and Three Rivers being all the while beset by murderous hordes; and indeed so much was the ferocity they exhibited on these occasions that they even attacked the forts themselves, a strange and most infrequent occurrence in Indian warfare. As to Fort Richelieu, that was at last abandoned, plundered and burned. It was in fact a general epidemic, every available man in the Iroquois nation going into active service on the warpath.

The first incident connected with this new outbreak was an attack on a Huron village by a band of Iroquois braves. It was not exactly a case of surprise, as the Hurons had been warned, or at least were acquainted with their intentions, so that they were on the lookout and prepared. Of this fact the Iroquois quickly learned, but in order to withdraw without having accomplished at least a part of their intentions, they concealed themselves in the woods, and there awaited the proper opportunity for taking action. At the same time the Huron sentinel, desiring it to be thoroughly understood that he was alive to his duties, kept up a continual hubbub throughout the night. Towards morning, however, he suddenly ceased his clamor, and after allowing a sufficient length of time to elapse, so that proper caution might be observed, two of the Iroquois passed over the intervening distance, climbed noiselessly over the obstruction, behind which they found two men sound asleep, one of whom they tomahawked, while they scalped the other. The howls of the wounded man attracted the attention of the entire village, so that but a few minutes had elapsed since the perpetration of the deed before the entire force of Huron warriors was in the field. The murderers were never captured, although quickly and industriously pursued. In the attempt, however, a number of Huron warriors who had been most active in following their trail came in the nighttime to a Seneca village. Here they stole noiselessly among the cabins, and finding at last that everyone slept they cautiously cut their way through the side of one of these slender habitations and entered. Then each of them (they were three in number) selected a man whom he killed and scalped, after which they immediately retired, but not until they had set the canton on fire. These men were pursued by the enemy for many days, but escaped with their trophies, with which in due time they arrived at the village.

But in spite of the general uprising of the Iroquois it still remained evident that many of them had been far from desiring a renewal of hostilities, two thirds of the number at least, under one excuse or another, returning to their settlements after but a brief absence. Still there were enough aggressively inclined, so that not less than two hundred were actively engaged in the depredations which occurred at this time. Another incident of this outbreak occurred on Ash Wednesday, on which day, while the French at Three Rivers were attending Mass in the chapel, a band of Iroquois silently approached a couple of dwellings which were located quite close to the fort, and stripped them of everything. This loss was more keenly felt owing to the fact that a number of settlers, feeling insecure in their own houses, which were located at some greater distance from the fort, had brought their goods and valuables to these two particular buildings, and stored them there. After having accomplished this act, the Iroquois party started in search of a number of Christian Algonquins who had gone forth on their usual winter's hunt. On arriving at their camp, to which they were unerringly led by a couple of Algonquin traitors who had become their prisoners, they found it vacated by all except the women and children. These they captured, after which, a number of them having been left in charge of the prisoners, the rest started in search of the hunters. The first of these to meet them and his doom, was the noted warrior Piskaret, whom they immediately killed and scalped, and all of the hunters were similarly waylaid and killed or taken prisoners. Numerous other instances of equal brutality followed quickly, and on one occasion when a band of Christian Algonquin prisoners were resorting to prayer and religious exercises, in order to strengthen and fortify themselves, their inhuman captors ridiculed them, and even crucified a small child by nailing it with wooden spikes against a thick sheet of bark. Of the final disposition of the prisoners, we are told that the men were all burned and tortured to death, but the women and children were spared, so that the nation of the conquerors might be strengthened by their addition to its forces. Many of these became used to this new life, and even satisfied with it, but a few could never reconcile themselves to the change in their surroundings, and therefore did not rest until they succeeded in making their escape.

Among those who were thus successful was Marie, the wife of one of the principal Algonquin converts, Jean Baptiste by name, who had been burned to death some time previously. It was early in June of the year 1647, we learn, that she appeared in a canoe at Montreal, where Madame d'Aillebout, with whom she was well acquainted, received her with greatest kindness. The story as told by her of her imprisonment and escape was that one night as she was lying in a cabin, bound hand and foot with cords which were made fast to stakes, and surrounded by Indians who lay upon the cords, she discovered that they were all asleep. Then she attempted slowly to extricate herself from the bonds, a remarkably delicate undertaking considering the fact that the slightest movement on her part was almost certain to be felt by those who surrounded her. However, she succeeded, upon which she arose softly, stepped to the cabin door, took a hatchet, brained the Indian who lay nearest to her, and then sprang to a hollow tree close at hand which she had on former occasions observed to be close to the cabin. The struggles of the dying man roused the entire village, and as a natural consequence a pursuit by the entire available force ensued. Noticing that nearly all of them had gone in one particular direction, she came out from her shelter and skillfully maneuvered so that she at length reached the woods without having been observed. Once under cover, she kept steadily on her way, and as none of her pursuers thought of changing the direction of their course, she made considerable headway without being disturbed. In fact it was not until well into the next day, when her tracks were discovered in the snow, that the Iroquois awakened to the understanding that they had all the time been looking for her in the wrong direction. Still safety was not entirely assured, for on the third day of her precipitate flight while on the margin of the lake, she heard a noise, and, looking round, perceived a number of Mohawks who were evidently in pursuit of her, so she at once boldly waded out into the water up to her neck, and when the Indians came near her submerged herself entirely and afterwards slowly raised her head behind a bunch of welcome flags sufficiently to enable her to both breathe and watch. The Indians, after carefully scrutinizing the surroundings, took their departure, after which she crossed an intervening marsh and continued on her journey. For more than a month she traveled along, existing as best she could on roots and berries, until at last she reached the St. Lawrence at a point a little below St. Peter's Lake. Here she quickly constructed a raft and crossed the river. from which point she at last safely arrived at Three Rivers.

The recital of this adventure also led her to refer to a previous occasion on which she had been a prisoner of the Iroquois. Then she was taken by the Onondagas from the Mohawks, who upon arriving in the vicinity of one of the Oneida towns left her hiding in the forest to await their return. Here she said she lay concealed all day, and at night approached the town under cover of darkness. Of her further experience on that occasion, Parkman says: "A dull red glare of flames rose upon the jagged tops of the palisade that incompassed it; and from the pandemonium within, an uproar of screamy yells and bursts of laughter told her that they were burning one of her captive countrymen. She gazed and listened, shivering with cold and aghast with horror. The thought possessed her that she would soon share his fate, and she resolved to fly. The ground was still covered with snow, and her footprints would have inevitably betrayed her if she had not, instead of turning towards home, followed the beaten Indian path westward. She journeyed on, confused and irresolute and tortured between terror and hunger. At length she approached Onondaga, a few miles from the present city of Syracuse, and hid herself in the dense thicket of spruce or cedar, whence she crept forth at night to grope in the half-melted snow for a few ears of corn left from the last year's harvest. She saw many Indians from her lurking place, and once a savage with an axe on his shoulder advanced directly towards the spot where she lay; but in the extremity of her fear she murmured a prayer, on which he turned and changed his course. The fate that awaited her if she remained—for a fugitive could not hope for mercy—and the scarcely less terrible dangers of the pitiless wilderness between her and Canada, filled her with despair, since she was already half dead with hunger and cold. She tied her girdle to the bough of a tree, and hung herself from it by the neck. The cord broke. She repeated the attempt with the same result, and then the thought came to her that God meant to save her life. The snow by this time had melted in the forest, and she began her journey for home with a few handfuls of corn as her only provision. She directed her course by the sun, and for food dug roots, pealed the soft inner bark of trees, and sometimes caught tortoises in the muddy brooks. She had the good fortune to find a hatchet in a deserted camp, and with it made one of those wooden implements which the Indians used for kindling fire by friction. This saved her from her worst suffering, for she had no covering but a thin tunic which left her legs and arms bare, and exposed her at night to tortures of cold. She built her fire in some deep nook of the forest, warmed herself, cooked the food she found, told her rosary on her fingers, and slept till daylight, when she always threw water on the embers lest the rising smoke should attract attention. Once she discovered a party of Iroquois hunters; but she lay concealed, and they passed without seeing her. She followed their trail back, and found their bark canoe, which they had hidden near the bank of a river. It was too large for her use; but as she was a practiced canoe-maker, she reduced it to a convenient size, embarked in it, and descended the stream. At length she reached the St. Lawrence, and paddled with the current towards Montreal. On islands and rocky shores she found eggs of water-fowl in abundance, and she speared fish with a sharp pole hardened at the point with fire. She even killed deer by driving them into the water, chasing them in her canoe, and striking them on the head with her hatchet. When she landed at Montreal, her canoe had still a good store of eggs and dried venison. Her journey from Onondaga had occupied about two months, under hardships which no woman but a squaw could have survived. Numerous other instances of a similar character might be given, but such are the heartrending conditions surrounding them and the story of the suffering and cruelty involved that we refrain.

Thus the war continued, increasing in intensity and blood-thirstiness, until the missionaries became well-nigh discouraged, fearing that what little hold they had obtained upon the Indians would be entirely lost. Fortunately, however, for their encouragement, the Indians residing in the neighborhood of Montreal and Quebec showed no intention on their part to withdraw from the ministrations of the church, neither did they exhibit any less intensity of feeling regarding the duties thereby involved. But the Iroquois, as on previous occasions, proved the principal distinguishing influences in both the material and moral affairs of the country, so much so in fact that before long even Father Jogues, who had always stood valiantly by them, expressing his belief in their ultimate conversion and general good faith, was compelled, although not willingly, to admit they were not to be relied upon. Probably this feeling had already been acquired by him when he offered his services to undertake this dangerous mission, especially as he emphasized it by the utterances already given, to the effect that he should never return.

Nor was he to be disappointed in this belief, for hardly had he arrived at Three Rivers, than his guards deserted him in a body, leaving him entirely alone, with the exception of a young Frenchman named la Lande, who, like himself, was entirely unacquainted with the surrounding country. He still persisted in advancing, however, although the majority of people would undoubtedly have been anxious to retrace their steps, for by the action of his guides it had been brutally made evident that his reception at the cantons would be anything but of a welcome character.

However, he continued on his way, and after enduring numerous hardships at length arrived with his companions at a Mohawk village. Here he was met in no friendly spirit, his reception being more like that of a prisoner, for both he and his companions were stripped of nearly all their clothing and beaten severely with clubs. The cause for this peculiar treatment is to be found in the following accounts, which are given by Charlevoix: "Two letters from New Netherland—one written by the Governor himself to Mr. de Montmagny, and the other by a private individual to Sieur Bourdon, Father Jogues' companion the preceding year—after giving some details of the holy Missionary's death, ascribe it to the conviction in which the Mohawks were: That he had left the devil in their country. (This undoubtedly refers to the box left by him at the Mohawk village on the occasion of his previous visit there.) The letter to Sieur Bourdon added that this perfidy was exclusively the work of the Bear tribe—the Wolfe and Tortoise having done all in their power to save the lives of the two Frenchmen, even to telling the Bear, 'Kill us rather than thus massacre men who have done us no harm and come among us on the faith of a treaty.' Both letters warned the French Governor that the Iroquois designed to take him by surprise, and that four hundred men were on the point of setting out to strike simultaneously at the French colony."

The drama was now fast nearing its end for, when Father Jogues asked for the reason of his being treated in such a manner, he was curtly informed that both he and his companion had been condemned to death. The incidents surrounding this tragedy will certainly lose none of their thrilling interest if given in the language of the historian previously quoted: "In vain did the servant of God represent to them the unworthy character of such a course; the confidence with which he came to put himself into their hands; their invitations given to induce him to come and live among them; their word so solemnly pledged to him; the conduct of the French towards them; their treaties, their oaths, and the little they had to gain by the war in which they were about to plunge anew. A fearful, gloomy silence showed him that he spoke in vain. He accordingly thought over of preparing for death and fitting for it the young man who had so faithfully clung to him.

"During the whole of the ensuing day, the 17th of October, they said not a word to him until evening. Then a Huron came to conduct Father Jogues to his cabin under the pretext of giving him food, for neither he nor his companion had as yet tasted anything that day. The Missionary followed the Huron, and as he was entering his cabin an Iroquois hidden behind the door dealt him a blow on the head with his tomahawk and laid him dead at his feet. La Lande met the same fate the next day. Their heads were then cut off and set up on the palisade and their bodies thrown into the river.

"Such was the end of a man whose virtues and courage the Iroquois themselves years after could not weary in admiring. His murderer fell into the hands of the French the next year, who delivered him to the Algonquins. The latter burned him, but, apparently, the holy martyr did not abandon him in his last moments, for he died a Christian."

Isaac Jogues was born at Orleans, France, January 10, 1607, of a highly respectable family. He was eminent in childhood for piety, and when he had completed his ordinary studies he entered the Society of Jesus at Rouen, in the month of October, 1624. Zealously inclined towards the missions, he urgently solicited that of Ethiopia, but in preference was entrusted with educational interests at home, for which he possessed unusual qualifications. At last, when he began his theological course, he again requested a foreign mission, and after ordination in 1636 was sent to Canada. After a brief period at Miscou Island he went to Quebec, and from there to the country of the Hurons. His subsequent career among the missions has been too fully dealt with otherwise to need further mention at the present time. It may be added, however, that during a journey from New York, then known as New Amsterdam, he was driven on the coast of New England and robbed of everything he had. Finally reaching France in a wretched plight, he was received with great honor on account of the great sufferings he had undergone as well as the stupendous work he had accomplished for the church.

Thus had passed from the history of the mission one of the noblest and most deserving characters connected therewith; a man of such singleness of heart, such devotion to principle, such zeal in the performance of his duties, that he saw no undertaking too dangerous nor found any demands made upon him unwelcome that were in the interests of Christianity and the salvation of the heathen. In causing the death of Father Jogues the Mohawks had violated the law of nations, and in so doing seemed thoroughly to appreciate the position they had assumed and the result which would follow as a natural consequence. In fact, they understood the situation so thoroughly that they prepared for the emergency of a combined alliance against them by at once forming their plans and taking the field before the news of their dastardly act could be borne throughout the colony.

A deep-rooted hatred for Christianity sprang up in the breasts of those people, which only caused them to redouble their vicious acts and savage atrocities to such an extent that neither age nor sex was regarded other than a welcome victim to their insatiate demand for gore. But so slight was the power of the French throughout the colony at this time, so weak were they numerically and so utterly unfit to cope with surrounding conditions that they but rarely, if ever, ventured far from home, and being thus deprived of all methods of communication, failed even to learn of these increasing depredations until hearing of them from the mouths of the few who had been fortunate enough to escape.

It will be remembered that at the time of which we are now speaking the Jesuit fathers maintained missions at Quebec, Sylleri, Three Rivers, the vicinity of Lake Huron, Miscou Island, which is on the Gulf of St. Lawrence near the entrance of the Bay of Chaleurs—a vast territory for so small a band of missionaries to attend, no matter how zealous or energetic they might be. Besides, the character of the people under their care was in itself sufficient cause for discouragement, while a portion of the territory involved (the island of Miscou in particular) was notably unhealthy, a number of priests who had been called upon to labor there yielding up their lives in consequence. The mission of Tadoussac, of course, offered a more eligible field in which to develop their energies, being a general gathering place for the Montagnez, hunters and French traders during the months of summer, although desolate and deserted in winter. But in spite of all this the missionaries were persistent, not infrequently reaching out to the north in pursuit of or accompanying some party of Indians who had gone that way. In fact, quite a number of the Mon-tagnez lived in that region, as De Quen discovered in 1646, when during an expedition up the Saguenay he found the nation of the Porcupine, some of whom had planted a cross upon the margin of the lake[1] upon which they dwelt.

While, however, the Hurons, Algonquins and numerous other tribes continued to heed with much appreciation the teachings of the fathers and in numerous instances struggled persistently to acquire a proper understanding of the faith, the Iroquois had, to all intents and purposes, cast aside their former allegiance to the Church and were not only hostile to almost all of the other nations, but evinced a personal dislike for the French and utter distrust of their religion. The loss was keenly felt by the missionaries, who ardently desired for the conversion of this nation, which at one time seemed almost possible of accomplishment. However, in spite of all the sufferings and heartburnings caused by the downfall of their fondest hopes through the actions of the Iroquois and their desire and premeditated purpose to violate all of those pledges to which even the most barbarous nations felt bound to conform, there were contingencies constantly arising which brought some comfort and consolation to the hearts of these devoted and long suffering men. For at about this time and when support was really most needed another nation, known for the great valor of its warriors as well as for the general mildness and docility of its people, came in a body and joined their interests to those of the Christian Indians. So earnest, in fact, were the people of this nation and so powerful its forces that they thenceforth proved a most desirable as well as valuable barrier against the further progress of the enemies of New France. This nation was known as the Abnaquis. They dwelt in the southern part of New France, which extends from the Penobscot to New England, that portion of the nation dwelling in the vicinity of the Kennebec being called the Cannibas.[2] A little later, owing to the frequent attacks made upon this nation by the English and their Indian allies, the Abnaquis associated themselves with the Etechiminis, who dwelt near the Penobscot, and the Micmacs or Souriquois, who were natives of Acadia, and in fact all of the eastern coast of Canada. Regarding this alliance, Charlevoix informs us that the close adherence which was maintained between these three tribes and the striking similarity of their dialects led many into the erroneous belief that they were already a part of the Abnaqui nation. Of these people, the Cannibas had quite often visited the mission at Sylleri, when not a few of them were baptized, the first instance of this kind recorded being the baptism of a chief of that nation in 1643.

These people became earnest Christians, and on returning to their settlement used every effort to impress their fellow tribesmen with the benefits to be derived from a Christian training and belief. The result of all this was that the nation finally sent emissaries to the Governor-General and the Superior of the Jesuits, requesting him to send a missionary among them. Thus, knowing the value of the allegiance of such a powerful nation, it was decided to acquiesce in their request, and as a result arrangements were completed for sending Father Gabriel Druillettes among them, and, on that mission bent, he took his departure from Sylleri on the 29th of August, 1646. He was accompanied by a party of Indians who followed, Parkman tells us, the route by which, one hundred and twenty-nine years later, the soldiers of Arnold made their way to Quebec, and finally arrived at the waters of the Kennebec, by means of which he descended to the Abnaqui villages. Charlevoix says that his journey was a long and painful one and that he apparently went up the Chaudiere and then made a portage of the Kennebec. Arriving among these people, he found them, like most of the tribes of that nation, well-meaning but excessively indolent, so that no effort was successful in the attempt to induce them to become more settled and to cultivate the soil. As a result of this disposition on their part, they were hungry and many times without the most common necessaries of life. Father Druillettes at once found an extensive field in which to exert his energies, which were called forth all the more, perhaps, owing to the extreme friendliness exhibited for him by the people. So he nursed the sick and baptized the dying, giving to all as much instruction in the Catholic faith as it was possible for him to do with his limited knowledge of the language. It was during his stay among the people of this tribe that Father Druillettes met with some Capuchin fathers, who had a hospice on the banks of the Kennebec. "They had also," says Charlevoix, "a house at Pentagoet and acted as chaplains, not only to the French settled on that coast and that of Acadia, but also to those whom trade allured thither. They received the Jesuit missionary with great joy and all possible cordiality; in fact, it had long been their desire to see missions established among the Indian tribes of that region, and had thought quite seriously of visiting Quebec themselves in order that they might induce the Jesuits to establish a mission in that locality." From other sources, however, we learn that, though the superior, Father Ignatius, welcomes the reverend missionary with much cordiality, he was at a later day compelled, owing to the wishes of the fishing companies that dominated that portion of the country, to write to Quebec and ask that the missionary should not return. The value and success of the undertaking, however, was beyond question, as upon returning to Quebec and making his report it was deemed advisable to at once take means towards the establishment of a permanent mission among the Abnaqui, who had shown such evident sincerity in expressing a desire to be received and recognized as converts to the Catholic faith.

FROM the foregoing chapter one may gain a tolerably good idea of the general condition of affairs in New France at the time mentioned, when also an increasing interest was created and not a little excitement prevailed on account of the change in governors at Quebec, de Montmagny having been ordered to relinquish his authority as such to Mr. d'Ailleboust, who had for some time past been occupying the position of Governor at Three Rivers.

The cause for these peremptory orders was undoubtedly to be discovered in the fact that Commander de Poinci, Governor-General of the West Indies, had mutinied against the King's command, refusing to yield up his post as ordered, and thus afforded an example of rebellion which, unless immediately checked, would undoubtedly prove a great detriment to the government of France. It was therefore quickly acted upon by the King's Council and a resolution was adopted at a meeting of the same to the effect that no colonial governor should maintain his position as such for a period exceeding three years. Referring to this important office, one writer remarks "that general laws have their objections and it is unfortunate to be placed in circumstances where it is impossible to remedy by necessary exceptions their action when prejudicial to the common good. A well-selected governor cannot be left too long at the head of a new colony. One devoid of the talents required for a post of this importance or with qualities detrimental to the services of his prince, cannot be removed too soon; and except in case of marked incapacity and well-grounded fears of misconduct, nothing more fatal can happen to the progress of a colony which is not well established than the frequent change of governors, inasmuch as solid foundations require a great uniformity of conduct and projects must be followed which cannot ripen or be executed except with time, and a new governor rarely approves the views of his predecessor or fails to consider that he has better. His successors will pass the same judgment on his, in their turn; and thus, by ever beginning anew, a colony will never leave its infancy, or will make but slow progress. But yet there are circumstances where prudence forbids a prince to follow a course which is really the most expedient; the sad extremes to which these gods of earth are sometimes reduced, where the inability to which they are brought—of remedying an evil except by an evil—is well fitted to impress them with a sense of their weakness."

This statement was not, however, in any way intended as a reflection upon the character and actions of de Montmagny, who had been remarkably free from any of the offenses or oversights indicated during the entire term of his administration. On the contrary, says Charlevoix, "he studiously modeled his conduct and that of his successor, and confined himself to following as far as in him lay the plan which Mr. de Champlain had traced in his memoirs. Hence it is certain that, had the Canadian Company seconded him, he would have put the colony on a very good footing, and he is greatly to be praised for having sustained it as he did with so little power. His life, moreover, was so exemplary; he displayed on all occasions so much wisdom, religion, piety and disinterestedness; he spared himself so little when the insolence of the Iroquois was to be repressed, and he knew so well how to maintain his dignity in the most delicate circumstances, that he endeared himself equally to French and Indians, and even the Court long proposed him to the governors of new colonies as a model that could not be too much studied."

Of his successor, we also learn that he was worthy of the high position in which he had been placed, and was noted for his piety and general good nature. Previously he had belonged to the Society of Montreal, which was altogether composed of pious persons whose principal efforts were directed towards the conversion of the heathen. In fact, during the enforced absence of Governor de Maisonneuve, he had assumed the authority and acted in his place. Upon his return Charlevoix stated that d'Ailleboust became governor of Three Rivers. This statement is contradicted, however, by Faillon in his Histoire de la Colonie Francaise, although he admits that he acted as Governor of Montreal as stated.

Of the Chevalier de Montmagny, it may be briefly stated that he left Canada on September 23, 1648, after which year, according to Mother Juchereau in her Histoire de l'Hotel Dieu, but little of him is known. "We find," says she, "nothing very authentic as to him after this." Mr. Aubert de la Chenaye says, nevertheless, that he died at St. Kitt's in the house of his kinsman, Mr. de Poinci; but this assertion is supported by no proof.

Louis d'Ailleboust, Seigneur de Coulonges, the next Governor of Quebec, was a gentleman of Champagne of a family already distinguished in medicine and the Church. He went to Canada in 1643 from purely religious motives, at which time he was also accompanied by a considerable number of colonists, whose general strength did much toward the upbuilding of the new town. On this occasion, however, d'Ailleboust remained in the neighborhood four years, at the expiration of which time he was compelled on account of business matters to return to France, for which country he sailed October 21, 1647. This business attended to, he at once set forth on his return journey, arriving at Quebec on August 20, 1648. On this occasion he brought with him a new Royal Regulation, dated March 5, 1648, which modified in some particulars that of March 27, 1647, which may be considered the first Canadian charter. Different from the more recent regulation, it was provided that the governor was to be chosen for a limited period of three years, although he might be reappointed if so desired. To assist him in governing the affairs of the colony it was provided that he was to have a Council, comprising the Bishop—or, until there was one, the Superior of the Jesuits—the last governor and two inhabitants chosen by the council and the syndics of Quebec, Montreal and Three Rivers. If, however, there should be no ex-governor in the colony, it was provided that another inhabitant should be chosen in his place. This regulation remained in force for many years, but in 1719 complaint was made that it was not being strictly adhered to. Under this same provision the General of the fleet and the syndics had a right to appear in council with a deliberate voice as to matters relating to the interests of their constituents. Other provisions were that the Council should appoint all officers and fix salaries; that such officers should be elected annually and report annually, and that settlers could buy furs of Indians with colonial goods but were compelled to take furs thus or otherwise obtained to the public stores. Madame d'Ailleboust, formerly Barbara de Boulogne, although at first somewhat undecided, accompanied her husband to the new colony, where she took an active part in many of the notable works of good begun and carried out at Montreal.

In spite of the request of the Capuchin prior, that a Jesuit missionary should not again be sent into the country of the Abnaquis, so interested did the people of Canada become in his undertaking and the remarkable success achieved that d'Ailleboust called a meeting of his council, at which it was decided to again dispatch Father Dreuillettes to New England and give him for a companion Jean Paul Godefroy, a member of the Governor's council. He again traversed over the weary road, until, arriving at New Haven, he immediately presented himself before the Commissioners of the Four Colonies, who were at that time in active session. But his efforts were fruitless, for the Commissioners flatly refused to declare war or permit the enlistment of volunteers in New England to fight against the Iroquois.

So, in spite of their long and tedious journey and desire for an alliance upon a firm footing with the people of New England, these envoys were compelled to return empty-handed and without any satisfaction whatsoever, save alone the courteous treatment received while among them.

Of the condition of affairs at Quebec at this time, a passing note should also be made from the fact that several vital changes had been effected in their general management. For instance, the Canadian Company of One Hundred Associates, whose expenses had been large while their receipts had been ridiculously small, transferred their right and title of the same to the colony, the purchasers, however, assuming all debts pertaining to the same or for which the Company was obligated at the time of transfer. At the same time the colonists also undertok their obligations to furnish arms, munitions and soldiers; to pay for all works of defense erected, as well as the salaries of the Governor and other officials; to do all in their power to introduce and bring immigrants to that territory, and to contribute as far as their means would allow toward the proper support of the missions. In addition to all of these promises they also pledged themselves to pay to the Company a bonus of one thousand pounds of beaver annually. In order to conduct this business in a satisfactory manner, the colonists formed a corporation, of which anyone might become a member, and it was decided that no individual could trade on his own account except by selling at a stipulated price to the Magazine of the Company.

This was in 1645, and two years later a council was established, consisting of the Governor-General, the Governor of Montreal and the Superior of the Jesuits—these three having supreme control of the legislative, judicial and governmental interests of the colony. For the maintenance of the government an appropriation of 25,000 livres was made, in addition to which the chief executive was permitted the use of the Company vessels with which to transport freight to the amount of seventy tons annually. With the money allowance already stated he was required to keep the forts in repair, purchase all necessary arms and munitions, and pay the soldiers. Almost identically the same condition prevailed with the Governor of Montreal, only that his allowance was limited to 10,000 livres and thirty tons of freight. Of course it will be readily imagined that neither of these amounts was adequate to the actual requirements, so that it is hardly to be wondered at that it became necessary for the mother country to send additional forces and supplies to the colony in order that it might not become entirely destroyed. Even then the arrangements came far short of being a practical success, so that in the following year another change was deemed advisable. Now the salaries of the governors were set at a certain specific figure, while a stipulated sum was apportioned and put aside for military purposes. Next the Council was reorganized, being now composed of the Governor-General, Superior of the Jesuits and three[1] citizens, and when present the Governors of Montreal and Three Rivers were also given privilege to take part at the deliberations of that body.

Under those different general changes and existing general arrangements, the fur trade was carried on in coöperative style, the entire colony having been merged as it were into a corporation or business organization, of which the Governor and Council were manager and directors respectively. Now Quebec as well as the rest of the settlements was enjoying a brief period of quiet, and as a result gained considerable increase in the peltry trade, which at all times formed the principal commercial industry of the colony. These changes for the better, which kept on occurring from time to time, were always sincerely welcomed by the colonists, for no matter how brief might be their period of existence, they always brought with them a condition of activity and progress. These times were also of special value to the missionaries, particularly at Tadoussac and Three Rivers, where the Indians came from all around—especially the North—and not only disposed of their wares, but remained a while to be instructed in the Christian religion. Sylleri was also experiencing a period of religious activity, so that matters looked more promising, and there really appeared to be some cause for the hope that the bitter feeling existing between the Hurons and Iroquois might, before long, be entirely overcome.

Much of this hopeful feeling was undoubtedly due to the fact that the Andastes, a warlike people occupying part of the country beyond that of the Neuter nation, announced their readiness to assist the Hurons in their war with the Iroquois. One cause of their desire to take an active part in this dispute was undoubtedly the fact of their mortal hatred for the Mohawks, in spite of which, however, they are said to have advised pacificatory methods in preference to the tomahawk if the use of the latter could possibly be avoided. So after much deliberation they as a first measure decided to send envoys to the Oneidas, Onondagas and Cayugas, who, as has been previously explained, occupied the central portion of the Iroquois' domain, the Mohawks and Senecas being located at its eastern and western extremities respectively. It was also deemed expedient to admit of a like understanding with the Senecas, so that after having neutralized all of these forces, the Andastes would be in a position, in conjunction with the Hurons, to subdue if not annihilate the Mohawks.[2]

Unfortunately for their own good, the Hurons were unable to see the benefits accruing from such an offer They were altogether too self-satisfied, too firm in the

(1) These three were generally selected from among the most prominent of the settlers by the council, in conjunction with the syndics of Quebec, Montreal and Three Rivers. The latter official was selected by the people of the community to which he belonged, his duties being to look after and manage the affairs of the settlement.

(2) It would appear from this that the Andastes were far from admitting the existence of an indissoluble bond of coöperation between the Iroquois confederation.

fallacious estimate of their own ability to cope with the foe, and as a consequence of all this not only failed to accept at their full value the overtures of the Andastes, but ignored the necessity of preparing vigorously and systematically for the inevitable conflict.[1] Thus through carelessness and an utter and surprising disregard for their proprieties, the Hurons not only forever lost the opportunity to regain their once acknowledged superiority, but thenceforth became the victims of a chain of circumstances which ended only in the absolute overthrow of their nation.

In the meantime, the Iroquois were playing a waiting game with this easily deluded people, the Onondagas holding them off with proposals for peace, while the Senecas and Mohawks raided them whenever the opportunity was offered. Thus numerous conflicts ensued, most of which were disastrous to the Hurons but still did not wholly convince them of the treachery and bad faith of which they were the victims. Then followed a lull in the proceedings which did much toward convincing them of their supposed security, so that they readily resumed the careless and apathetic mode of living which had on more than one occasion proved so disastrous to them. On the other hand, active, alert and keenly anxious to continue their depredations, the Mohawks prepared for fresh aggressions, and being thoroughly fortified and well equipped for almost any contingency, once more appeared upon the scene at a time and place least expected.

Returning for a brief period to the events of the previous year, we find that in the early spring of 1647 a party of Onondagas who had wandered far into the country of the Hurons in search of spoils had met with a number of that nation who had administered to them a severe punishment. The encounter was, in fact, a fierce one, a number of the invading party being slain, while many were taken prisoners. All of the latter were burned in the usual manner, with the exception of one Annenrias, a chief of high standing among his people, who in spite of the clamor of the tribesmen for his sacrifice was released by the chiefs of the Hurons, loaded with presents and started on his homeward journey. Not long after his departure and as soon as he had reached the farther shore of Lake Ontario, he fell in with a band of his own people, comprising nearly all of the able-bodied warriors of the nation, who believed him dead, and were hastening toward the Huron settlements with a view to wreaking a summary vengeance upon them for his murder. Explanations followed, the result being that Annenrias induced his people to renounce their war-like purpose and return with him to their home. Arriving there, a grand council was held, to which as a matter of course all of the chiefs and old men of the tribe were invited, and the matter of arranging peace with the Hurons was thoroughly discussed. It may also be stated for the further enlightenment of those who have but superficially gone into the matter, that beyond the fact of a desire to reciprocate in a fitting manner for the return of Annenrias to them, the Onondagas had a purpose of their own to subserve—an intense hatred for the Mohawks, which they were anxious to satisfy as soon as the proper moment arrived. These Mohawks, it would seem, were an arrogant, boastful lot of people, whose successes in obtaining many concessions from the Dutch in the way of arms and ammunition had aroused the ill will of their less fortunate contemporaries. Besides, not willing to wear their successes in a properly modest manner, they must needs boast about them, and thus doing, increase the obligation of dislike which they had already incurred.

Here, then, we have the Andastes, who hated the Mohawks as enemies; the Onondagas, who hated them as successful rivals; the Hurons, who hated them for their cruelty, treachery and oppression, and the Oneidas and Cayugas, who hated them because the Onondagas did, or at least for the same reason; a combination of hatreds which, if properly adjusted and applied, meant anything but a quiet and peaceful outlook for the Mohawks for some time to come. The result of this council was that an embassy[2] was sent to the Hurons.

At the head of the delegation sent by the Hurons to the country of the Onondagas was the Christian Chief Jean Baptiste Atironta, whose mission was so successful that upon his return he was accompanied by fifteen Huron prisoners and an embassy of the Onondagas, at the head of which was the celebrated Chief Scandawati.

(1) Another account states that despite their petty triumphs, the Hurons knew that they were on the verge of ruin, and that "pestilence and war had wasted them away, and left but a skeleton of their former strength." "In this distress," says Parkman, "they cast about them for succor, and remembering an ancient friendship with a kindred nation, the Andastes, they sent an embassy to ask of them aid in war or intervention to obtain peace. This powerful people dwelt on the Susquehanna. (The remnant of this tribe called the Conestogas were massacred by the Paxton Boys in 1763). The way was long, even in a direct line, but the Iroquois lay between them, and it was necessary to make a circuit so as to avoid them. A Christian chief, whom the Jesuits had named Charles, together with four Christian and four heathen Hurons, bearing wampum belts and gifts from the council, departed on his embassy on the 13th of April, 1647, and reached the great town of the Andastes early in June. This town contained thirteen hundred warriors. Immediately upon their arrival, the council of the nation was at once assembled, the chief ambassador of the Hurons addressing them: 'We come from the Land of Souls, where all is gloom, dismay and desolation. Our fields are covered with blood; our houses are filled only with the dead, and we ourselves have but life enough to beg our friends to take pity on a people who are drawing near their end.' He then presented the belts and other gifts, remarking at the same time that they were the voice of a dying country.

Having duly performed his mission, Charles at once set forth with some of his party on the homeward journey, on which occasion he was also compelled to make a wide detour owing to the fact that the Senecas were out in large numbers watching with much vigilance in hope that they might surprise and capture the embassy. So Charles and his party passed through the Alleghanies, Western Pennsylvania and Ohio, finally reaching their destination in the following October."

(2) The appointment was an unfortunate one, as the person selected was by birth a Huron, who having been captured when a child, adopted and naturalized, had become more of an Iroquois than the Iroquois themselves. Upon arriving at the Huron town, he was of course at once recognized, his presence causing an outbreak on the part of some, which came near overthrowing the entire arrangement. Fortunately, however, better judgment prevailed, so that affairs were brought to a successful termination.

This chief entered upon the mission with many misgivings, fearing that his dignity might suffer in consequence of the attitude of the Senecas, who were still actively aggressive, or that they or the Mohawks, or both, might so far forget the consideration due him as to attack the Hurons while he was among them. Parkman tells of the result of this undertaking in the following language: "With hunting, fishing, canoe-making and bad weather, the progress of the august travelers was so slow that they did not reach the Huron towns until the 23rd of October. Scandawati presented seven large belts of wampum, each composed of three or four thousand beads, which the Jesuits called the pearls and diamonds of the country. He also delivered the fifteen captives and promised a hundred more on the final conclusion of the treaty. The three Onondagas remained as surety for the good faith of those who sent them until the beginning of January, when the Hurons on their part sent six ambassadors to conclude the treaty, one of the Onondagas accompanying them. Soon there came dire tidings. The prophetic heart of the old chief had not deceived him. The Senecas and Mohawks, disregarding the negotiations in which they had no part and resolved to bring them to an end, were invading the country in force. It might be thought that the Hurons would take revenge on the Onondaga envoys now hostages among them; but such was not the case, for the character of an ambassador was for the most part held in respect. One morning, however, Scandawati had disappeared. They were full of excitement, for they thought he had escaped to the enemy. They ranged the woods in search of him and at length found him in a thicket near the town. He lay dead on a bed of spruce-boughs which he had made, his throat deeply gashed with a knife. He had died by his own hand, a victim of mortified pride."

Of the party of these Huron and Onondaga envoys who had started for the Iroquois country, we learn that they were met by one hundred Mohawks, who captured them and killed the Hurons but spared the Onondaga, compelling him to go with them. Finally they fell upon another body of Hurons, which, being largely composed of women, they also routed, taking forty prisoners. In this affair the Onondaga took part, capturing as his prisoner a Huron girl. On the day following he expressed a desire to return to the Huron town, saying: "Kill me if you will, but I cannot follow you; for then I should be ashamed to appear among my countrymen, who sent me on a message of peace to the Hurons, and I must die with them sooner than seem to act as their enemy." So he was permitted to depart, taking with him his prisoner, whom he safely returned to her people. This was practically the end of all negotiations between the nations, and thenceforth occurred a succession of events that marked an epoch of rapine and bloodshed which desolated the entire country and only ceased with the annihilation of the Huron people.

In the meantime the missions were in a continual state of uncertainty and disorder, not owing to the conduct of the Hurons, who with increasing troubles became more clamorous for religious instruction and emphatic in their expressions of devotion, but on account of the Iroquois, whose active hatred acted as a continual menace to their safety and well-being. Among the Hurons, however, the condition of affairs was even better than hoped for, the Christians outnumbering the heathens in several of the towns. Most successful among these were the missions of la Conception or Ossossane, St. Joseph, St. Ignace, St. Michael and St. Jean Baptiste. At one of these—St. Joseph—lived the Rev. Father Anthony Daniel, who ministered alone to the entire canton. The town of St. Joseph, it must be remembered, was not that of Carogouha or Ihonatiria, established in 1619, and the place where the mission first began, that town having been abandoned in 1638. All of these missions were prosperous, each one having its little church and each church its bell, although in a few instances where the edifice was not dignified by the addition of tower and steeple the bell was hung in some convenient tree near by. While dwelling on this point it may be interesting to note that a fragment of one of these bells was found on the site of a Huron town and is now preserved among a number of Huron relics at the Laval University, Quebec. Prior to the introduction of bells into these missions (it is generally understood that the first was brought in 1644), old kettles were used by the missionaries for the purpose of calling the worshipers together.

A somewhat more elaborate description of the town of St. Joseph, or Teauanstaye, as it is also called, locates it on the southeastern frontier of the Huron country, near the foot of a range of forest-covered hills, and about fifteen miles from Sainte Marie. The description goes on to state that it had been the chief town of the nation, and its population as compared with the Indian standard was still large, for it had four hundred families—at least two thousand inhabitants. It was well fortified with palisades, in accordance with the Huron methods of building, and was regarded as one of the strongest and most valuable fortifications as well as point of vantage belonging to the nation. It was on the 4th of July—a day made notable in the history of the missions from the fact that on it another valuable life was yielded up, another martyrdom accomplished in the general effort to carry out the teachings of the Saviour, to bear the Gospel to the uttermost ends of the earth.

The town itself had been vacated almost to a man by the warriors, most of whom were out in quest of game or had gone with a large trading party to the French settlement. Those left were the old men, the youth and the younger children, a majority of whom were attending divine services at the church, filling the building to its utmost capacity. Father Daniel had just finished the Mass and the congregation was still kneeling, when they were aroused by a terrible cry of "The Iroquois! the Iroquois!" Rushing as soon as possible from the church, Father Daniel saw a number of hostile warriors issuing from the forest near by and rushing with much vehemence toward the opening in the palisade. Everything was in uproar, even those who were able to do something in the way of defense being so overcome with fear and surprise that they became blinded as by a panic and were entirely unmanageable. The good priest, fearlessly rushing to the front, rallied the defenders and stimulated them not only by his presence and action, but also by the promise that those who died in the defense of their homes and faith would surely be rewarded in the life to come. He also busied himself with the unregenerate, warning them that the possibility of heavenly eternity depended on their dying in the sentiments he had so often preached to them. Thus many of them became eager, crying for baptism and holding out their children that they might receive it; while some begged for absolution and others were too distraught to appreciate the condition they were in. Then the sight became a terrible one, for with a fierce yell the enemy closed in upon them. The palisade was forced and carried on all sides, while blood streamed in every direction. And here amid this terrible din and carnage stood the devoted priest, surrounded by a horde of screaming, clinging women and children and not a few of the sterner sex who had lost all control of themselves and were even more of a burden upon him than those whom they should have endeavored to shelter and protect. Many of them whose age and strength enabled them to secure safety by flight prepared to do so, urging the Missionary to escape with them; but he, devoted man, realizing that there were still a number of sick and wounded to be ministered to, steadfastly refused, saying, "I will remain here; we shall meet again in heaven." He then returned to the chapel in order that he might secure the altar vessels and vestments and deposit them in a place of safety. Then while a few yet escaped to the rear of him in order that they might obtain all time possible, he calmly walked forth from the church and went towards the enemy. For a moment they remained inactive, being absolutely overcome with this show of heroic devotion; but then the spirit of the hour again came over them, and bending their bows they showered upon him a volley of arrows, by many of which he was wounded. Then, still maintaining an upright position, he reproached his murderers with their perfidy and threatened them with the wrath of Heaven, when one of them completed the sacrifice by shooting him through the heart. Then like a pack of wolves they fell upon his lifeless body, dipped their hands in his blood, stripped the clothing from him, and then cast the remains into the burning church.

Thus over seven hundred persons fell victims to the onslaught of the Iroquois, and the town of St. Joseph became a veritable relic of the past, for it was never rebuilt. The few who were fortunate enough to make their escape sought refuge in the town of St. Mary's, where they remained unmolested for some considerable time. In the meanwhile the Iroquois started forth in search of new fields to conquer, finally reaching another large and well-fortified town, which they also razed to the ground.

But now a new surprise came to the good people of the colony, and particularly Quebec, when they were called upon to receive with due consideration an emissary from the New England settlements, who had been sent there for the specific purpose of arranging a perpetual alliance between the colonies independent of any misunderstanding which might arise between the two home governments. These propositions, which were said to have emanated from the elder Winthrop, were received with general favor, and Mr. d'Aillebousť, after weighing with due consideration the opinions of the other members of the Council, appointed Father Dreuillettes as representative of the colony, instructing him to journey to Boston and there effect a treaty according to the propositions made, the only proviso being that the English consent to join with the French in making war upon the Iroquois. That there was some hitch in the proceedings is made evident from the fact that the matter languished in an incomplete condition for some time, in consequence of which negotiations were resumed in 1651. His first visit to Boston, however, had been made during the previous year, he having left Quebec on August 31, 1650. The journey proved a very unfavorable one, as he experienced considerable inconvenience and even suffering before arriving at Honidgwalk, from which place, after a brief stay, he proceeded to Conssinoc (Augusta), where he presented his credentials to John Winslow, the Plymouth agent, who went with him to Boston. Arriving there he was received by Governor Dudley of Massachusetts, who in turn referred him to Plymouth, as the Kennebec was in the jurisdiction of that colony. Arriving at Plymouth he was welcomed by Governor Bradford, who found that any aid against the Iroquois could only be decided upon by the commissioners of the united colonies; and as they were not then in session, he did his utmost to influence the delegates of that body in favor of the proposed alliance. Of the documentary evidence and the endeavor to effect these arrangements, we give the following, which is a correct copy of one of the very few still in existence relating to this affair. This, it will be seen, is a letter addressed by the Council of Quebec to the commissioners of New England, and is as follows: "Gentlemen—Some years since the gentlemen of Boston having proposed to us to establish trade between New France and New England, the Council established by His Majesty in this country unites its replies to the letters which our Governor had written to your parts, the tenor whereof was that we would willingly desire this trade and therewith the union of hearts and minds between our colonies and yours; but that we desired at the same time to enter into an offensive and defensive league with you against the Iroquois, our enemies, who would prevent this trade or at least render it less advantageous both for you and for us. The obligation which it seems to us you should feel to repress the insolence of these Iroquois savages—who massacred the Sokokinois and Abenaginois, your allies—and the ease with which you could carry on the war by our taking it up properly, are two reasons which have induced us to follow up this matter with you in your Court of Commissioners. We have requested our governor to write you efficaciously. This is to join our exertions to his, and to assure you of the disposition of our hearts and of those of all in New France for this trade with New England, and for the designs of this war against the Iroquois, who should be our common foe. Besides the Sieur Dreuillettes, who already this winter began to negotiate this matter, we have pleased that Father Godefroy, councillor of our body, be associated. The merit of these two deputies leads us to hope and pray a result for the design. They are invested with necessary powers to that end—that is to say, both to establish firmly trade between you and us, and to relieve you of the expenses necessary to be incurred in the war in question against the Iroquois. We beg you to give them a hearing and to act with them as you would do with us, with the frankness natural to Englishmen as much as to us Frenchmen. We cannot doubt but that God will bless your arms and ours, when they are employed in the defense of Christians, both your allies and ours against the heathen savages, who have neither faith, nor God, nor justice in their course, as you may learn more at length from the said Sieurs, our deputies, who will assure you of the sincere desire we entertain that Heaven may ever continue to bless your provinces and load you, gentlemen, with its favors."

This document was signed in the council chamber at Quebec on June 20, 1651. The only other document available pertaining to this subject is regarding the nomination of Sieur Godefroy to treat in conjunction with Father Dreuillettes, and is a faithful copy or extract from the registers of the Ancient Council under date of June 20, 1651: "The Council assembled at nine o'clock in the morning. Present, the Governor, the Rev. Father Superior, Messrs. de Maure, de Godefroy and Menoil. On the proposition made the council touching a certain rescription made by the Council in the year 1648 to the end that a union be made between the colonies of New France and New England to carry on commerce with each other; the Council, desiring to meet their wishes, has nominated and nominate Sieur Godefroy, one of the councillors of the Council established by His Majesty in this country to proceed with the Rev. Father Dreuillettes to the said New England to the said commissioners to trade and act with them according to the power given to them by the Council, a copy whereof is inserted in the liasse, as also a copy of the letter written to the said commissioners to New England by the Council. And as to merchandise brought by one Thomas Yost[1] on the assurance and good faith of Father Dreuillettes, the council has decided to send and meet him, to point out a place where he may deliver them and that in its time.

"Louis d'Ailleboust, Lieutenant-General for the King and Governor of New France, etc. Greeting: Having been solicited and entreated both by the Christian Indians depending on our government and by the Abenaquinors living on the river in Kinebequi and others, their allies, to protect them against the incursions of the Iroquois, their common enemies, as it had heretofore been practised by Sieur de Montmagny, our predecessor in this government; and having anew shown us that all their nations were on the point of being totally destroyed unless we speedily brought a remedy; we, for these causes and the good of this colony, and following the express orders given us in the name of the Queen Regent, mother of the King, to protect the Indians against their said enemies, have deputed and depute with advice of the Council established in this country, and some of the most notable inhabitants, the Sieur Gabriel Dreuillettes, preacher of the Gospel to the Indian nations, and John Godefroy, one of the councillors of the said Council, ambassadors for them to the gentlemen of New England, to treat either with the governors and magistrates of New England or with the general Court of Commissioners and deputies of the United Colonies, for assistance in men, munitions of war and supplies, to attack the said Iroquois in the most proper and convenient places; as also to agree upon articles which shall be deemed necessary to assure this treaty and to grant to the said people of New England the trade which they have desired from us by their letters in the year 1647, with the articles, clauses and conditions which they shall therein see necessary, awaiting the arrival of the ambassadors, whom we shall send on our behalf to ratify and establish finally what they may have agreed upon. We accordingly pray all governors, lieutenants-general, captains and others to let them pass freely."

The historian Shea informs us that before the date of these papers the colony of Plymouth had decided against the French request, it having been agreed that "the court declared themselves not to be willing either to aid them in their design or to grant them liberty to come through our jurisdiction for the aforesaid purpose." Soon after this decision had been arrived at, Dreuillettes and the governor reached Boston, and although both of them made the most strenuous efforts, they were unable to alter the decision as already adopted. It is thus readily seen that this was the point at issue which resulted in the breaking off of all further negotiations. It must be remembered, however, that the request was considerably out of the ordinary, and if allowed, would have been of much more benefit to the French than the English, inasmuch as the latter were far enough removed from the Iroquois to avoid all trouble or unpleasantness with them and were devoting their entire time and energies to the pursuit of trade and agriculture. In the meantime the Iroquois gave but little uneasiness to the other nations, there being a period of at least six months during which not a single raid is charged against them. So again the Hurons fell into supineness and a negligent method of living, which it was their sad fate in the near future to learn was one of the principal causes of their former frequent and overwhelming defeats. The 16th of March, 1649, is given as the date when a party of not less than one thousand Iroquois swept down upon the town of St. Ignatius. Of the four hundred Hurons dwelling there at that time, the majority fell victims to the knife and tomahawk of the foe. St. Ignatius was a well-fortified town, but no watch was kept, and consequently the foe were enabled to steal upon them before they became aware of their presence. A majority of the women and children managed to escape to the woods, while a body of the warriors—some eighty in number—remained and resolved to defend the town to the last. These men fought bravely, twice repulsing the enemy; but at last the Iroquois managed to gain an entrance through the palisade, and once having done so, a general massacre ensued. In this engagement the Iroquois are reported to have lost but ten men, while of the eighty Hurons who remained in defense of their town but three escaped to tell the story. The Iroquois next descended upon St. Louis, which place they treated in a similar manner, their total loss here, however, numbering some thirty warriors, while a large number were wounded. Among those taken prisoners at this time were the Rev. Fathers John de Brebeuf and Lalemant. The victors having set fire to the cabins at St. Louis, returned at once with their prisoners to St. Ignatius, where they had left most of their provisions as well as a number of warriors in order, if necessary, to guard their retreat. Some days later a body of two hundred Iroquois approached the town of St. Mary, but when but a short distance from there fell into an ambuscade in which many were killed. Here again the scales turned in their favor, for, while being closely pursued to St. Louis by the victorious Hurons, they came upon their entire force, some eight hundred in number, encamped there, who surrounded the Hurons in such a manner that it was impossible for them to escape. They fought desperately, however, but at last, overcome by the unwonted exertion and reduced in numbers, the entire band was captured. These were counted among the bravest men of the nation, so that the consternation was general when it became known that they had fallen into the hands of their vindictive foe. The people of St. Mary's were now naturally much disturbed over their own condition, which, however, was for the time averted by the withdrawal of the Iroquois. But their distress was by no means lessened when a few days later they learned of the horrible fate which had befallen the captive missionaries, Fathers de Brebeuf and Lalemant, who they learned had been treated with great atrocity and finally burned at the stake.

And now as a result of these many overwhelming defeats, the Hurons began to realize too late how much of their deplorable condition was owing to lack of action and a proper appreciation of the intense activity and determination of their foe. Long ago their reign of supremacy among the Indian tribes had ceased, and now they had arrived at a time when their very existence was but the matter of a few weeks or months at the most. Now bereft of a leader, without union in action or organization, and almost paralyzed with fear and the absolute misery of their condition, they awaited the end without exhibiting to the slightest extent any further desire of maintaining the unequal contest. In but very few days after the destruction of St. Ignatius and the burning of St. Louis, fifteen Huron towns which lay scattered about St. Mary's were not only deserted, but burned to the ground, in order that they might not afford shelter to the foe should he come that way. And so, without home or shelter of any sort, with scantiest supplies and an ever present and awful dread that the enemy was close at hand, they wandered away to the north and to the east through the wilderness, hiding themselves among the rocks or islands of Lake Huron, and in some instances seeking an asylum among the people of the Tobacco Nation, while a few joined the Neutrals, whose home it will be remembered was on the north of Lake Erie.

Of course there were still the people of St. Mary's who, however, looked pathetically forward to the inevitable, for owing to their fear of the prowling foe and consequent inability to acquire the necessary means for sustenance, it became evident to all that they could hold out but a little while longer. It was this most unhappy state of affairs which caused the missionaries to dwell anxiously upon the necessity of making some provision for their future welfare, and to that end they sought assiduously a suitable place where they could gather together the remnant of these people without fear of further depredation on part of the Iroquois. So they finally decided upon Manitouline Island, which lies north of Lake Huron.

"Heretofore," Parkman tells us, "Sainte Marie had been covered by large fortified towns which lay between it and the Iroquois; but these were all destroyed, some by the enemy and some by their own people, and the Jesuits were left alone to bear the brunt of the next attack; there were moreover no reasons for their remaining. St. Mary's had been built as a basis for the missions; but its occupation was gone; the flock had fled from the shepherd, and its existence had no longer an object. If the priests stayed to be butchered they would perish, not as martyrs, but as fools. The necessity was as clear as it was bitter. All their toils must come to naught. St. Mary's must be abandoned. They confessed the pang which the resolution cost them; 'but,' pursues the Father Superior, 'since the birth of Christianity faith has nowhere been planted except in the midst of suffering and crosses. Thus this desolation consoles us; and in the midst of persecution, in the extremity of the evils which assail us, and the greater evils which threaten us, we are all filled with joy, for our hearts tell us that God has never had more tender love for us than now.'

"Several of the priests set out to follow and console the scattered band of fugitive Hurons. One embarked in a canoe, and coasted the dreary shores of Lake Huron northward, among the wild labyrinth of rocks and islands where his sacred flock had fled for refuge; he betook himself to the forest with a band of half famished proselytes, and shared their miserable rovings through the thickets and among the mountains."

The Island of Manitouline, or as the Hurons called it, Ekaentoton, occupied an area some forty leagues from east to west, but narrow throughout in width. Its position seemed quite advantageous, giving ready access to the numerous Algonquin tribes who made their home along the borders of the inland seas. It also had the advantage of bringing those settled there in close proximity to the French settlements, which could be easily reached by means of the Ottawa river, which, however, for the time being, was regarded unsafe, owing to its frequent use by the Iroquois as a thoroughfare in their raids throughout that part of the country. The fishing in this locality was also good and the soil excellent, while, owing to the fact that it was untenanted, the territory abounded in deer. But here a difficulty arose, for when a number of Huron chiefs came for the purpose of talking over and providing for the proposed change, they made known the fact that a number of the tribe were loath to leave their country and remove to so distant a location, and had therefore decided to settle at St. Joseph's Island, which lay but a short distance from the mainland where they were. Their plea for concurrent action on the part of the missionaries in this undertaking was couched, says Ragueneau, in such elegant and pathetic language that they finally gained their point, the Fathers agreeing to follow them there. So on the 25th of May, 1649, the missionaries having first burned their building at St. Mary's, they embarked for their new home, where there soon arose a little town of one hundred cabins.

Another and more elaborate statement of this exodus is given by Parkman, who says: "Near the entrance to Matchedash Bay lie the three islands now known as Faith, Hope and Charity; of these Charity or Christian Island called Ahoendoé by the Hurons, and St. Joseph by the Jesuits, is by far the largest. It is six or eight miles wide, and when the Hurons sought refuge here it was densely covered with primeval forest. The priests landed with their men, some forty soldiers, laborers and others, and found about three hundred Huron families bivouacked in the woods. Here were wigwams and sheds of bark and smoky kettles slung over fires, each on its tripod of poles, while around lay groups of famished wretches with dark haggard visages and uncombed hair, in every posture of despair and woe. They had not been wholly idle; for they had made some rough clearings and planted a little corn. The arrival of the Jesuits gave them new hope; and weakened as they were with famine, they set themselves to the task of hewing and burning down the forest, making bark houses and planting palisades. The priests on their part chose a favorable spot, and began to clear the ground and mark out the lines of a fort. Their men—the greater number serving without pay—labored with admirable spirit, and before winter had built a square bastioned fort of solid masonry with a deep ditch and wall about twelve feet high. Within were a small chapel, houses for lodging and a well, which with the ruins of the walls may still be seen on the south-eastern shore of the island one hundred feet from the water. Detached redoubts were also built near at hand, where French musketeers could aid in defending the adjacent Huron villages. Though the island was called St. Joseph, the fort like that on the Wye, received the name of Ste. Marie. Jesuit devotion scattered these names broadcast over all the field of their labor.

"The island, thanks to the vigilance of the French, escaped attack throughout the summer; but Iroquois scalping parties ranged the neighboring shores, killing stragglers and keeping the Hurons in perpetual alarm. As winter drew near great numbers who trembling and by stealth had gathered a miserable subsistence among the Northern forests and islands rejoined their countrymen at St. Joseph until six or eight thousand expatriated wretches were gathered here under the protection of the French fort. They were housed in a hundred or more bark dwellings, each containing eight or ten families. Here were widows without children and children without parents, for famine and the Iroquois had proved more deadly enemies than the pestilence which a few years before had visited their towns. Of this multitude but few had strength enough to labor. Scarcely any had made provision for the winter, and numbers were already perishing for want, dragging themselves from house to house like living skeletons. The priests had spared no efforts to meet the demands upon their charity. They sent men during the autumn to buy smoked fish from the northern Algonquins, and employed Indians to gather acorns in the woods. Of this miserable food they succeeded in collecting five or six hundred bushels. To diminish its bitterness, the Indians boiled it with ashes or the priests served it out to them pounded and mixed with corn.

"As winter advanced the Huron houses became a frightful spectacle. Their inmates were dying by scores daily. The priests and their men buried the bodies, and the Indians dug them from the earth or the snow and fed on them, sometimes in secret and sometimes openly; although, notwithstanding their superstitious feasts on the bodies of their enemies, their repugnance and horror were extreme at the thought of devouring those of relatives and friends. An epidemic presently appeared to aid the work of the famine. Before spring about half of their number were dead.

"Meanwhile though the cold was intense and the snow several feet deep, yet not an hour was free from the danger of the Iroquois; and from sunset to daybreak, under the cold moon or in the driving snow-storm, the French sentries walked the rounds along the ramparts.

"The priests rose before dawn and spent the time till sunrise in their private devotions. Then the bell of their chapel rung, and the Indians came in crowds at the call; for misery had softened their hearts, and nearly all on the island were now Christians. There was a Mass, followed by a prayer and a few words of exhortation; then the hearers dispersed to make room for others. Thus the little chapel was filled ten or twelve times until all had their turn. Meanwhile other priests were hearing confessions, giving advice and encouragement in private, according to the needs of each applicant. This lasted till nine o'clock, when all the Indians returned to their village, and the priests presently followed to give what assistance they could.

"Their cassocks were worn out and they were dressed chiefly in skins. They visited the Indian houses, and gave to those whose necessities were most urgent small scraps of hide severally stamped with a particular mark, and entitling the recipients on presenting them at the fort to a few acorns and a small quantity of boiled maize or a fragment of smoked fish, according to the stamp on the leather ticket of each. Two hours before sun-set, the bell of the chapel again rang, and the religious exercises of the morning were repeated. Thus this miserable winter wore away, till the opening spring brought new fears and new necessities."

From other sources we learn the fact that the Indians had settled but a brief time in their new home when the fisheries became unproductive and the resources of the chase exhausted; so that as they had made but little preparation for such an event, and had planted hardly anything, by fall their stock of provisions began noticeably to fail. By early winter even they were reduced to extremities most horrible, disinterring and ravenously devouring the half-decayed bodies of their relatives and friends. This condition naturally brought about others more disastrous still. Maladies of a contagious character broke out among them, and spread with such rapidity that they soon became entirely beyond control, Yet we are told that in the midst of all this horror, not one of the neophytes wavered in the least, but rather they all waited with the most perfect resignation the "orders of Heaven."

A few months anterior to the time of which we have been speaking, it became known that a force of three hundred braves had gone upon the warpath, although no reliable information was obtainable as to the direction they had taken. Due precautions, however, were taken to prevent surprise, scouts being sent out in every direction to discover if possible signs of their whereabouts, and also to notify the different towns and settlements to be on their guard. Particularly was this done in the case of the Tionnontatez nation, who were the most exposed of any to depredations at the hands of the Iroquois. Their country lay in the mountains on the shores of Lake Huron, some thirty-five or forty miles distant from the former town of St. Mary's. The principal town was called St. John, where there were assembled in the neighborhood of six hundred families.

With their usual perversity,[1] however, the Hurons of St. John, instead of at once preparing to make a strong and deliberate defensive stand, scouted the idea of such an invasion, or at least credited it to bravado on the part of the Iroquois. So instead of strengthening their fortifications and keeping a more watchful eye upon the surrounding country, the warriors of this settlement armed themselves and went forth in search of the enemy. But the Iroquois were not asleep, and learning of this imprudent step on the part of the Hurons, they at once adopted a false route, and making a circuitous march passed the body of pursuers and were soon within sight of the town.

The mission[2] of St. John's at this time was in charge of Fathers Charles Garnier and Natalis Chabanel, although at the moment referred to the former was the only one present, Father Chabanel having some two days previously been called elsewhere.

It was in the early morning, and Father Garnier was actively engaged in visiting among the cabins of his people, when that dreaded sound, the warwhoop of the Iroquois, was heard. Recognizing at once their imperiled condition, and realizing that there was no possible chance for escape, the good missionary immediately turned his steps toward the chapel, which he found filled with panic-stricken people. To these at once he pointed out the necessity for immediate action, trying to prove to them in their half-dazed condition that there was safety in nothing but flight. So great was his desire for their well-being and escape, that he even volunteered to go forth to the enemy and retard them as much as possible in order that they might have time to place themselves in a position of safety, and he assured them on leaving that as long as he had a breath of life he would not abandon those who should need his ministry, begging them in return not to forget the lessons which he had given them. So he went forth to his doom, hastening from house to house, running from one to another, and giving absolution and Baptism. It was while engaged in these pious offices that one of the Iroquois shot him, and after tearing off his cassock left him for dead. Recovering somewhat and noticing a short distance from him a Huron who had been mortally wounded, he endeavored to reach him, but in so doing was noticed by an Iroquois, who rushed forward and immediately despatched him.

Having slaughtered the greater part of the inhabitants of St. John's, the Iroquois immediately set fire to the town, after which, fearing the quick return of the war party, they made a hasty retreat through the forest, from time to time killing any who showed signs of lagging or were detrimental to their rapid flight. Towards evening of the same day a number of Hurons who had managed to escape the horrible slaughter arrived at St. Matthias, where they made known the terrible facts. The people at once became frantic with alarm, fearing that the Iroquois would attack them also; but on the following day, when from reliable sources it was learned that they had already retreated far towards their own country, a party attended by Fathers Garreau and Grelon at once set forth to the scene of the butchery with a view to making a proper disposition of the remains of Father Garnier as well as of the others who might be found. Arriving there after a long and futile search, they were at last rewarded by discovering the missionary's remains, which however were so scorched and disfigured that they were hardly recognizable. The two priests wrapped his mutilated body in a part of their own clothing, while the Indians dug a grave on the spot where the church had stood and there they buried him.

When on the second morning the warriors returned to St. John's, they found nothing but ghastly relics of their former homes and murdered families, a condition brought about by their rashness, stupidity, and utter want of appreciation of the remarkable tenacity of the Iroquois to a purpose or undertaking when once they had pledged themselves to its fulfillment. But this was not the only horror which the missionaries were called upon to endure, or sufferings and martyrdom which some of them were known to have experienced at that time. Only a day or so previous to the massacre of St. John's, on the 5th or 6th of the month of December, 1649, Father Chabanel, under instructions from the Father Superior of the Missions, who deemed it needless to expose the life of more than one priest in a position of such danger, left St. John's in company with a few Christian Indians. On his way he stopped at St. Matthias, and on the morning of the 7th—which is designated as the one on which the Iroquois' attack was made upon St. John's—left there to pursue his journey.

(1) Owing to the information generally carried throughout the country the village of St. John's became somewhat augmented by bands of fugitive Hurons, who, fearing the coming of the foe, had taken refuge there. "When, therefore," Parkman tells us, "the warriors were warned by Ragueneau of a probable attack from the Iroquois, they were far from being daunted, but, confiding in their numbers, awaited the enemy in one of those fits of valor which characterized the unstable courage of the savage. At St. John's all was paint, feathers and uproar—singing, dancing, howling and stamping. Quivers were filled, knives whetted, and tomahawks sharpened; and when after two days of eager expectancy the enemy did not appear, the warriors lost patience. Thinking, and probably with reason, that the Iroquois were afraid of them, they resolved to sally forth and take the offensive. With yelps and whoops they defiled into the forest where the branches were gray and bare and the ground covered with snow. They pushed on rapidly till the following day, but could not discover their wary enemy, who had made a wide circuit and were approaching the town from another quarter. By ill luck the Iroquois captured a Tobacco Indian and his squaw straggling in the forest not far from St. John, and the two prisoners, to propitiate them, told them the defenseless condition of the place, where none remained but women, children and old men."

(2) At this time there were two missions in the Tionnontatez or Tobacco Nation, St. John's, St. Jean's or as the Indians called it, Etarita, which was in charge of Fathers Garnier and Chabanel, and St. Matthias, where Fathers Garreau and Grelon resided.

Proceeding a distance of some eighteen miles through the forest, they encamped, and the entire party with the exception of the missionary soon fell asleep. He, however, was anxious and nervous and consequently remained awake during the entire time. Towards midnight he heard an unusual sound, which he finally recognized as a confusion of voices, mingled with songs and outcries. It proved indeed to be the Iroquois war party on its retreat from St. John's, coming dangerously near to the encampment of Father Chabanel and his sleeping Indians. He at once quietly and carefully aroused his companions and warned them of the danger. Immediately on becoming aware of the situation they fled. Father Chabanel followed in their wake, but being less sure of foot and slower of motion, was soon distanced by his companions, who thus left him alone in the wilderness. The Indians returned to St. Matthias, and for a time at least quieted the anxiety of the missionaries there by stating that Father Chabanel had taken another route in order that he might as quickly as possible reach the island of St. Joseph. The untruthfulness of this statement, however, was later made known by a Huron Indian, who had been converted but later apostatized. This Indian declared that he met him alone in the forest and had aided him across the river near the banks of which he had found him. Then it became a question among his friends as to whether he had died of exposure or famine, for it was thoroughly realized by this time that he would never again be seen alive. At last, however, all doubts were set at rest when this same renegade Huron came forward and confessed that he had killed the Missionary and thrown his body into the river, after having robbed him of everything of value he had about him.

But what of the two remaining Missionaries, Fathers Garreau and Grelon, who were left alone at the mission of St. Matthias (Matthew) to stem the torrent of abuse which was being poured upon them, and withstand the treacherous treatment of a majority of these misguided savages who had become inspired by a fanatical belief that all their troubles and afflictions were to be traced to the presence of the missionaries among them? In spite of the disrepute into which they had fallen and the danger that constantly menaced them, they stood valiantly at their post, pleading the cause of Christ with insistent urgency; teaching, praying and exhorting in fearless and energetic language, and by self-abnegation, most complete and unexcelled diligence availing themselves of every means in their power to maintain the prestige of the Church. But in spite of all of this self-sacrifice and devotion, abuse was added to abuse and cruelty to cruelty until amidst the howls and screeches of the frantic horde they were told that they were to die. Strange as it may seem, however, and though the hatchets of these demons were brandished in dangerous proximity to their persons, they passed through this most terrific ordeal[1] unscathed.

And thus the weary months dragged along until the spring at last appeared, though bringing but little hope or comfort to the miserable, misguided and famished people who dwelt on St. Joseph's Island. As if to add to the discomfort of their condition, there within sight and almost reach along the winding shores of the mainland were the only available fishing grounds; while here and there—further inland, to be sure, yet still within plain view—lay numerous spots of verdure, drawn, as it were, through their winter's snowy coating by lingering and genial caresses of the warming sun. But alas! there too lurked danger, for the deadly foe went prowling about the vicinity, ever vigilant and on the alert for those whom hunger tempted to these inviting lures in search of food. The choice, in fact, lay between certain danger and almost assured death by slow starvation; and they naturally selected the former as their alternative. So finally they ventured forth, making over the weak and treacherous ice towards the mainland, where those who escaped the perils of the journey—a number drowned in the attempt—divided themselves into fishing parties of from five or six to one hundred in number. It was here while engaged in this peaceful pursuit that the Iroquois—a large band of whom had come through snow and ice from their far-away homes in Central New York for that purpose—found and slaughtered them. Of this episode Father Superior Ragueneau writes: "My pen has no ink black enough to describe the fury of the Iroquois," and again, "It is said that hunger will drive wolves from the forest; so, too, our starving Hurons were driven out of a town which had become an abode of horror. It was the end of Lent. Alas, if these poor Christians could have had but acorns and water to keep their fast upon! On Easter day we caused them to make a general confession. On the following morning they went away, leaving us all their little possessions; and most of them declared publicly that they made us their heirs, knowing well that they were near their end. And, in fact, only a few days passed before we heard of the disaster which we had foreseen. These poor people fell into ambuscades of our Iroquois enemies. Some were killed on the spot; some were dragged into captivity; women and children were burned; a few made their escape and spread dismay and panic everywhere. A week after another band was overtaken by the same fate. Go where they would, they met with slaughter on all sides. Famine pursued them, or they encountered an enemy more cruel than cruelty itself; and, to crown their misery, they heard that two great armies of Iroquois were on the way to exterminate them. Despair was universal."

(1) It was indeed an awful test, for, not satisfied with the result brought about by the example of their own unbridled passions, they sought to draw the Christians of the tribe into this vortex of shamelessness by giving them to believe that the French had betrayed their confidence by yielding them over bodily to the Iroquois, to which arrangement they insisted the missionaries were willing accomplices.

The result of this raid and consequent trouble was that those of the Hurons who still remained on St. Joseph's Island—some three hundred in all—held a number of councils at which it was finally decided to abandon the island. Still, they were not unanimous as to the proper means to adopt for their future care and safety; some expressed a desire to withdraw themselves from all of their former associations and remove to the remotest and most desolate timber part of the country; while others, remembering the previous offers made to them by the missionaries, and the description given by them of that territory, were in favor of emigrating to Manitouline Island. Others still favored going to the Andastes and identifying themselves with that people, while there were a few who favored the unseemly project of requesting adoption at the hands of the Iroquois. However, before coming to any final decision, a number of the most prominent members of the tribe went in a body to Father Ragueneau, and referring in pathetic language to the deplorable condition into which the tribe had fallen, stated as their unqualified opinion that the only means of saving the remnant would be for the Missionary Fathers to gather together the dispersed members, and placing themselves at their head, take them to Quebec or to some other point of safety, where under the protection of the French they could lead a peaceful and pastoral existence on whatever territory the Governor-General might see fit to apportion to them. In making this plea, the leading orator of the tribe said: "Take courage, brother; you can save us if you will but resolve on one bold step. Choose a place where you can gather us together and prevent this dispersion of our people; turn your eyes towards Quebec and transfer thither what is left of this ruined country; do not wait until war and famine have destroyed us unto the last man; we are in your hands. Death has taken from you more than ten thousand of us. If you wait longer, not one will remain alive; and then you will be sorry that you did not save those whom you might have snatched from danger, and who showed you the means of doing so. If you do as we wish, we will form a church under the protection of the Fort at Quebec. Our faith will not be extinguished. The examples of the French and the Algonquins will encourage us in our duty and their charity will relieve some of our misery; at least we shall sometimes find a morsel of bread for our children, who so long have had nothing but bitter roots and acorns to keep them alive."

Before making a definite answer to the proposition of the Hurons, the Reverend Missionary naturally referred the matter to his associates, or at least to as many of them as could be reached, all of whom heartily agreed with the proposition and engaged themselves to assist, as far as lay within their power, in furthering and carrying out the undertaking; and it was certainly time that some heroic means were adopted, that is, if anything was done, for now, turn their eye in whichever direction they might, they found nothing but desolation and destruction, since throughout the entire territory previously occupied by the Hurons, and where in their numerous and extended journeyings the missionaries had been wont to see their thriving towns and settlements, there was now absolutely nothing but the charred and scattered remnants of their dwellings, while of the large and active population of naturally healthful people there remained but a handful of emaciated and dispirited wretches whose fear and terror at the fate which had befallen their fellows led them to shrink even from their own shadows.

The undertaking, once resolved upon, very soon became interestingly active around the camp of the Hurons, and preparations were pushed forward with the utmost expedition; canoes were gone over and refitted and others built. Whatever supplies could be gathered were brought together and packed so that, all being ready, they began their still perilous voyage towards the settlement on June 10, 1650, the party at that time consisting of the missionaries, their French followers and about three hundred Hurons.

Speaking of the abandonment of this mission, Father Ragueneau afterwards said: "It was not without tears that we left the country of our hopes and hearts, where our brethren had gloriously shed their blood." Carefully and fearfully, then, they wended their way along the desolate shores which but a short time ago had been the seat of unwonted activity and the heart of many Indian settlements. But the caution observed in their journeyings was of the utmost necessity, for it was generally conceded that it would have taken but a small band of active and vigorous warriors to overcome and destroy them. As they advanced their precautions were doubled, for steering northward along the eastern coast of the Georgian Bay, they every little while came across traces of the Iroquois and undeniable evidences of their recent presence there. When they had accomplished about half of the journey, the party met with Father Bressani, who having spent a considerable portion of the winter in Quebec, was returning with an escort to the mission, not having had the slightest intimation of its terrible fate and the almost utter annihilation of the people. For some distance from Quebec he had been escorted on his way by a body of Frenchmen, some forty in number, who, however, as prearranged, had left him to return to the fort, so that for a few days immediately preceding his meeting with the party he had been journeying alone in company with some twenty Huron converts who had attended him on his visit to Quebec. But shortly after the departure of the French, however, he met with a terrible experience. It would seem that a little party of Iroquois warriors had dwelt for a considerable part of the winter in a little log fort on the border of the Ottawa, where they divided their time between hunting and awaiting the approach of some unsuspecting enemy whom they might take and destroy.

These warriors noted the passage of Father Bressani's party, and far into the night when the good priest and his followers lay sleeping about their fires they stole into the middle of the camp, passed the drowsy and negligent guards, and, giving vent to a blood-curdling warwhoop, began with lightning-like rapidity to tomahawk the recumbent foe. Of those, seven were immediately killed, while the Missionary, who had leaped to his feet at the first alarm, received three arrow wounds in the head. The fight now became general, resulting in the death of six of the Iroquois and capture of two. The remaining two succeeded in breaking from their pursuers and escaping into the forest. Of the particular locality in which this incident occurred, the historian Parkman says: "When they reached Lake Nipissing, they found it deserted, nothing remaining of the Algonquins who dwelt on the shore, except the ashes of their burned wigwams. A little farther on there was a fort[1] built of trees, where the Iroquois who made this desolation had spent the winter, and a league or two below there was another similar fort. The River Ottawa was a solitude; the Algonquins of Allumette Island and the shores adjacent had all been killed or driven away, never again to return. "When I came upon this great river, only thirteen years ago," says Ragueneau, "I found it bordered with Algonquin tribes who knew no God, and in their infidelity thought themselves gods on earth; for they had all that they desired—an abundance of fish and game and a prosperous trade with allied nations; besides, they were the terror of their enemies. But since they have embraced the faith and adored the Cross of Christ, He has given them a heavy share in this cross and made them prey to misery, torture and a cruel death. In a word, they are a people swept from the face of the earth. Our only consolation is that as they died Christians they have a part in the inheritance of the true children of God, who scourgeth everyone whom He receiveth."

It took Father Bressani and his people but a short time to arrive at the conclusion that it would be wise for them to return. So they united with the others and together descended the St. Lawrence, finally arriving at Montreal, where they were most cordially welcomed and invited to remain. But this they were not satisfied to do, fearing that the knowledge of their presence there would draw upon them large forces of the Iroquois; to withstand the onslaught, they deemed they had not sufficient strength; so after resting for a day or two they reëmbarked and continued their journey, arriving without further incident in Quebec on July 28, 1650. Here the Governor received them with every demonstration of kindness and satisfaction; while, although a number of people in good or fairly easy circumstances were but limited, everything possible was done for their comfort, the Ursuline hospital nuns and entire population, in fact, taxing their resources to the utmost in order that they might provide sufficient food and shelter for the sufferers. Some of the principal residents even went so far as to pledge themselves to the support of a certain number of families, in spite of which, however, there were at least two hundred wretched creatures who had absolutely nowhere to go to for support and who, as Charlevoix puts it, "subsisted for a long time without its being possible to conceive what enabled them to subsist." Of the fate that followed the misguided few among the Hurons who flatly refused to accompany their fellows with the missionaries to Quebec, the story is soon told. Some joined themselves with other nations, who in accepting them thus drew upon themselves the active and vindictive hatred of the Iroquois; some, we learn, went farther abroad and journeyed towards the English settlements, taking up their residence among the tribes which lived in the territory contiguous to, or at the present time constituting the State of Pennsylvania; others, a larger party, to whom the Iroquois had made overtures of peace, discovering in time the intended perfidy of those people, outgeneraled them at their own game, fell upon them when unexpected, slaughtered a large number of warriors, and then made their way in safety to Manitouline,[2] and having remained there for a brief period, finally descended to Quebec. Those who remained of the settlements of St. Michael and St. John took the dangerous expedient of presenting themselves to the Iroquois, with whom they proposed thereafter to identify themselves, and by whom, strange to say, they were well received. Yet so vindictive and aggressive did the Iroquois continue to be, that not only the Huron country, but also the entire territory tributary to the Ottawa, which had previously been so thickly settled, was entirely deserted. It was in fact not one particular section, but the entire country, that suffered more from the depredation of these irrepressible savages than the trials inflicted upon them by famine and disease, for while the more westerly of the five nations were devoting their time and energies to the annihilation of the Hurons, the Mohawks were equally aggressive and untiring in their depredations upon the Algonquins and the French. And in addition to this, although well-intentioned as a whole and desirous of reciprocating in a suitable manner the generosity and kindness shown to them by the French, there was a lurking treachery in the ranks of the more civilized tribes which occasionally brought disaster to the work of the missionaries, as well as settlers besides, on almost every occasion reacting with marked emphasis upon the people themselves. An instance is given of this in the following incident furnished by Parkham: "It would seem that a party of Christian Indians, chiefly from Sylleri, planned a stroke of retaliation, and set out for the Mohawk country, marching cautiously and sending forward scouts to scour the forest. One of these, a Huron, suddenly fell in with a large Iroquois war party, and seeing that he could not escape, formed on the instant a villainous plan to save himself. He ran towards the enemy, crying out that he had long been looking for them and was delighted to see them; that his nation, the Hurons, had come to an end; and that henceforth his country was the country of the Iroquois, where so many of his kinsmen and friends had been adopted. He had come, he declared, with no other thought than that of joining them and turning Iroquois as they had done. The Iroquois demanded if he had come alone. He answered, 'No,' and said that in order to accomplish his purpose he had joined an Algonquin war party, who were in the woods not far off. The Iroquois, in great delight, demanded to be shown where they were. This Judas, as the Jesuits called him, at once complied, and the Algonquins were surprised by a sudden onset and routed with severe loss. The treacherous Huron[1] was well treated by the Iroquois, who adopted him into their nation. Not long after he came to Canada and with a view, as it is thought, to some further treachery, rejoined the French. A cross questioning put him to conviction and he presently confessed his guilt. He was sentenced to death, and the sentence was executed by one of his own countrymen, who split his head with a hatchet."

In spite of the many difficulties which prevailed and seemed to surround each newly proposed undertaking of the missionaries in behalf of their Indian allies, it was hoped at least that those who had consorted together and taken refuge at Quebec had to a certain extent overcome misery and destitution, which had for so long a period oppressed their people; at least so thought the Missionary Fathers, who after giving the matter careful and deliberate consideration had come to the conclusion that there was no reason whatever why they should not be made a self-supporting contingent of the forces of the settlement, which condition they believed could be brought about so as to but slightly burden the settlers, or the French Company, with any extra or unnecessary expenses. With this object in view, Father Lalemant, Superior-General of the Missions, made a journey to France for the purpose of consulting the members or Directors of the Canada Company, being desirous of obtaining their aid and consent to furthering the undertaking. Arriving in his native country, and in due time presenting himself before that body, he laid before them in eloquent and pathetic language the actual condition of affairs, interspersing vivid word pictures of the scenes and circumstances surrounding them which had brought a Christianized people from a happy and prosperous state down to its present reduced and miserable condition. He also noted for their consideration the very small expense to which they would be put in furthering the proposed arrangement, by the carrying out of which the colony, both in the matter of trade and defense, would be greatly benefited. But for all the good that it did, he might, it appears, as well have spoken to a lot of wooden men, as the management of the Company, unanimously engrossed in the single purpose of personal aggrandizement, favored no course but such which if diligently pursued would lead to the ultimate accomplishment of their purpose. Religion, comfort, the ordinary respect that one is supposed to show for the feelings and well-being of another, were all neglected with the utmost indifference by this body of men whose avarice and want of consideration had carried them almost beyond the pale of decency.

During the summer of 1651 the settlers at Three Rivers became informed that a band of Iroquois were hiding in the neighborhood, and in order to make certain of the truthfulness of the statement and to gain, if possible, a further knowledge of their location and importance, a body of sixty men was sent out to investigate. The Iroquois party numbered twenty-five men only, but upon seeing the approach of the French, although they at once recognized the superiority of the forces, they exhibited no intention to withdraw, but on the contrary prepared in a deliberate manner for the encounter. Leaving their canoes, they posted themselves waist deep in the mud and water among the rushes with which the river bank was heavily fringed, and awaited the nearer approach of the enemy. Here for a considerable time they fought stubbornly, holding the Frenchmen at bay, but at length, finding themselves outweighed by numbers, they regained their canoes and proceeded to make a deliberate retreat. The French followed, but becoming separated, the Iroquois, who had kept carefully together, took the opportunity of returning and inflicting chastisement to the leading boats. Then again, as the others approached, they hurried forward, repeating this mode of warfare as long as pursuit was continued, and in the engagement killing a number of the most reliable and best among the French soldiers[1].

(1) Another account of this instance states that it was a number of Indians at Quebec who planned this war party and who induced a number of the inhabitants of Sylleri to join them. The force is also said to have been swelled by a number of Algonquins of Three Rivers and some Hurons who happened to be at the same place. Upon approaching the village where they had resolved to make their first attack, a Huron and an Algonquin were sent forward as scouts. Soon after they separated and the Huron, falling into the hands of the Iroquois party, without hesitation betrayed his faith, his nation and his allies to save his life. "Brethren," said he on approaching the enemy, "I have long sought some of you. I set out for my country, where I know the Hurons and Iroquois are now only one people and have only one land. After traveling some securely, I joined an Algonquin party which I met on the war path against you. I left it two days ago to warn you to be on your guard." He then acted as guide to the Mohawks, who, advancing on the Christians, found them asleep. They awoke indeed only at a volley of musketry; and as the enemy had time and opportunity to choose where to strike, the bravest of the allies lay dead on the spot before any of the party had time to fly to arms. Yet many fought bravely, and under cover of their resistance a considerable number escaped to the woods. All the rest were killed or taken and burned at the stake, except two who brought in all the details of this sad adventure. The name of the renegade Huron is given as Louis Skandarhietse.

Many strange and curious stories are told of the fortitude and heroism exhibited by the Christian Indians when brought to the torture by their merciless captors; and it is surprising to note the fortitude with which they were enabled to undergo the terrible ordeal put upon them. Every cruelty which human ingenuity could devise was applied in nearly all of these cases, the prisoners being subjected to even severer tests than had heretofore been used, their tormentors being urged on by the medicine men and fetich worshipers, who saw in the growth and spread of the Christian religion the downfall and overthrow of their own mimic and despicable powers. To extract a groan from a heathen prisoner was not so pleasant and satisfactory a task as to obtain an expression or even a sign of pain from one who had foresworn his allegiance to the deities of his nation for the calmer and more ennobling beliefs of the Christian faith. A particular instance in illustration is told by Charlevoix of an Indian Algonquin named Joseph Onohare, or Onahare, which is as follows: "He had been brought up almost from childhood at Sylleri, and although naturally of a hard and haughty disposition, grace and education had entirely corrected the defect, and he attained a degree of perfection uncommon in the very heart of Christendom. A year before his death an event befell him which deeply impressed those who witnessed it. He had joined a war party under a renowned chief, an idolater, however, and very superstitious, who would not take the field without consulting his manitou. Onohare in vain employed every effort to divert him. The chief called a medicine man, who put up his sweating-cabin, and had no sooner entered it than it began to shake in the most surprising manner.

The man—to whom even the thing appeared most extraordinary—proceeded notwithstanding to utter his usual cries and howls; but some time after he suddenly changed his tone, and calling to Onohare, who was not far off, assailed him with furious threats. The noble Christian at once approached, and convinced that it was the devil who spoke by the mouth of his minister, exclaimed: "I adore Him who out of nothing created heaven and earth. He is my sovereign Lord and yours; and in spite of yourself you are compelled to acknowledge Him as such even as I do." While still speaking, although there was no one near him, he felt himself struck so violently on the side that he almost lost his breath and movement. Three days after, still feeling great pain, he fervently prayed to God to restore him. His prayer was heard and he set out on the war path with the rest.

During the march, another Indian, who had apparently had a bad dream, came to him one morning in great excitement and told him that he was very sorry that he had started on that expedition with him—that his obstinate refusal to consult the spirits would inevitably draw down some reverse on the party. The fervent Christian took pity on the blindness of this man and endeavored to disabuse him of his errors. While they were speaking they perceived two Iroquois, and rushed upon them. Onohare overtook one and killed him at a single blow. The other escaped. The young Christian then returned to his comrade, who had not made any very earnest endeavor to reach the enemy, and told him that his manitou had doubtless warned him against any undue exposure of his person. "Know, then, once for all, he added, "that a Christian who is faithful to his God fears nothing and that your demons can render no assistance to those who invoke them."

It was in the closing act of this neophyte's life that he appeared the greatest. He had prepared for it by a general confession and frequent Communions. From the outset of the expedition in which he was taken he had a presentiment that he would never return; and as it was a battle against the enemies of God, he consoled himself with the hope of martyrdom. Filled with this idea, his joy increased at the thought of the sufferings he might have to undergo; nor was he wanting to himself in the midst of his tortures. He constantly exhorted his companion to patience, and his executioners wishing to silence him, he boldly told them that it was not in their power to prevent his publishing the praises of his God, and laboring for his glory. This reply roused them to fury, but in vain did they devise the most unheard of tortures to force him to silence. He ceased to bless the Almighty only when he ceased to live.

(1) The leader of this party was a noted half-breed known throughout the colony as the Flemish Bastard, whom Father Ragueneau has been wont to style "An abomination of sin and monster produced between a heretic Dutch father and a pagan mother."

What a pathetic history was this of the once proud nation of the Hurons, and what a wonderful story of self-devotion and tireless labor on the part of the missionaries; the former divided in their beliefs, yet with a general tendency towards that half human, half brute existence to which they had been educated for generations. The latter determined, in spite of circumstances, conditions and surroundings, to manfully maintain until successful in their efforts to evangelize them.

We of to-day, hearing of some depredations on the part of their descendants, are wont all too readily to class them as a useless incumbrance, and to express a fervent desire for their summary extinction; yet who are we in face of all those horrors which comprise the greater portion of their history, that we should judge them thus hastily? True, much of the brutality exposed in the relation of such incidents pertain to wars among themselves, where the old tradition of "an eye for an eye" were fully and faithfully carried out. Yet like the gladiator of later days, they were faithfully trained to the calling, and by many cruel yet ingenious devices prepared to present that stoical front for which they were ever noted in moments of extraordinary pain or peril. And be it in all fairness said, they only meted out such tortures as they anticipated would be dealt to them under like conditions. Theirs was, in fact, a life of reprisal where animal ferocity and cunning contended for the mastery, and mental or moral restraint was unknown. Their oratory, too, betook of the nature of their surroundings, being clothed in a verbiage of radiant colorings. With them to express even the commonest kind of welcome was to tell of the songs of brooks and the smooth and placid surface of the streams which loved to bear the welcome burden of their hastening friends; the sunlight that kissed the footsteps of their tardy visitor or the rugged pathways made pleasant to his passing feet. It was ever a sublime picture of unmeasured delight, delivered with a dignity and earnestness which forbade all question of its honest intent. Was this solely diplomacy, or was there after all within their inner nature a something of the human which could not, even amidst these depressing and degrading surroundings be entirely eradicated? Undoubtedly the missionaries believed such to be the case; else why such suffering and labor, such devotion and martyrdom to the cause? They of all who spent the greater portion of their lives among these people were best able to judge. They watched the growth and progress of their work with an ever jealous eye, noticed with joy too fervid for utterance the kindling of the tiny flame of intelligence, the growing desire for knowledge, the yielding to conviction, the acceptance of the Cross, and honest and consistent devotion, which afterwards denoted their mode of life through every phase of tribulation and disaster which followed. And you, reader, did you ever note the difference between the awakening intellect of childhood and the awful struggle of ignorant maturer minds to acquire the simplest understanding? Well, so it was with the Indians, or even worse when the missionaries ventured a reconstruction in their method of living and beliefs in which they had been grounded since time immemorial.

Every phase of degradation it had been possible for them to endure had been experienced by these people, and beneath them finally their stolidity had given way. An outer coating of reserve, as it were, had fallen apart, and exposed to human view what human feelings are when wrought to such a stage of desolation. Children of Nature, these savages had been wont to rove at large over a vast, almost limitless, territory, and had lived that free nomadic existence which was to them as second nature. They had enjoyed untrammeled the pleasures of the chase, and should one hunting-ground become sterile and unprofitable, had quickly left it for more favorable fields, where their desire for success found full and immediate satiation. Later they had gathered together the products of these excursions and preserved them, and as the cold and bitter months of winter came apace, they retired to their settlements or towns, and together enjoyed the results of their former labors. But now all of this was gone from them forever; a vicious foe had been amongst them and depleted their ranks, murdering their wives and children and desolating their homes past all recovery; and in addition to these evils they had been scourged by famine and disease, until at last, with not one particle of their former prestige, they cowered out a miserable existence of which even they were no longer entirely the masters. A few, we have seen, took the wiser course, and under the kindly guidance of the missionaries departed for Quebec, where they had met with a generous reception and found a safe abiding-place. But there were others, the larger portion, in fact, who refused all such proffers, and with these the conditions of life were as uncertain and impotent as heretofore.

Thus traversing throughout the region formerly occupied by this once great nation, we find little bands of Hurons scattered here and there, suffering the same awful dread of the encroaching foe, and the pangs of unsatisfied hunger, as they did within the safer, if not more inviting limits of St. Joseph's Island. Theirs, in fact, had become the life of the meaner animals, whom either fear or necessity drove from place to place, without having any particular spot on earth which they could denote or claim as their home. Nor was there any sign of change for the better, as the Iroquois, feeling their strength increase as day by day new victories were added to the large number already acquired, spread out in search of other fields in which to renew the story of their former triumphs.

As an instance of this we may state that amidst the heavy timber which covered a large portion of the country lying far north of Three Rivers, there lived a tribe called the Atticamegues or nation of the Whitefish. How long these people had dwelt in this vicinity, we are unable at the present moment to state, but at any rate we are informed that the place was selected by them on account of its remoteness from the settlements of other tribes, and the extremely difficult nature of the country intervening, which necessarily added greatly to their safety. Be that as it may, they were not too far distant, neither was the journey too arduous or dangerous for the Iroquois, who, making a journey of twenty days north on the St. Lawrence, fell upon one of their encampments, and butchered the entire party. These people, however, were brave, and so remained in that locality in spite of the fact of this unlooked for and most undesirable invasion. Having concluded to remain, the Atticamegues at once sent an urgent message to their pastor, Father Buteux, desiring his presence among them, a request hardly to be wondered at, seeing they were all consistent members of the Catholic faith. Father Buteux was at this time located at Three Rivers, but upon receiving their message, and, although suffering from serious bodily ailment, he at once set forth, covering the entire distance across the frozen wilderness on snow shoes. This journey he repeated in the following year, taking with him a number of the tribe as well as several Frenchmen.

On this occasion, however, they were less fortunate. Finding game extremely scarce, they were compelled to divide the party, a Frenchman named Fontarabie and a Huron convert accompanying the Missionary. At the time they set forth the season was quite well advanced, and the streams which the melting sun had enlarged to a considerable extent were all open, so that the three travelers at once embarked in a small canoe, and began to work their way up one of the turbulent streams which intersect that portion of the country. Here they met with many difficulties, being forced oftimes to draw their bark upon the land and carry it together with their baggage through the forests and over the uneven country for long distances before the stream again became available for their use. Thus they toiled onward until on one occasion, while making a portage, they were set upon by a band of Iroquois, who evidently had been for some time awaiting their coming. The Indian who was in advance carrying the canoe was at once captured, but as Father Buteux and the Frenchman endeavored to make their escape, they were ruthlessly shot down, and their bodies, having been stripped of all their clothing, were thrown into the torrent near by.

Of the numerous assaults upon the Hurons, and defeats sustained by them after the one which noted the glorious martyrdom of the convert Joseph Onohare, we learn that while causing much trouble to those who were anxious for the spiritual progress of the country, there still remained some consolation in the fact that the friends and relatives of those who were slain not only expressed regret at their material loss and suffering, but also for their spiritual condition. Their trust in God was sublime, and never once in all of these experiences were they known to question the wisdom of His ways. This, of course, had a salutary effect upon the unconverted, many of whom exhibited a sudden and astonishing change. The condition and action of the Christian prisoners also had its effect upon the Iroquois, who were unconsciously influenced to a certain extent by them. This is illustrated in the account given by Charlevoix, of a blind Algonquin squaw who was their prisoner and utterly incapable of rendering them any service, but whom they still allowed to live:

"A Christian well instructed in her religion, she had the courage to assume among her conquerors the office of catechist; and God wrought many conversions by her ministry. Some of these excited great attention and exasperated the Sachems of the village against her. She was not insensible to the danger to which her zeal exposed her, but nothing could diminish its fervor. She was seriously warned to be cautious in her proceedings; threats were made against her, and she had every reason to fear their being carried into effect. Nothing, however, deterred her; and God, whom she served with so much courage, continued to protect her in a manner incomprehensible to those who, able to crush her by a word, never dared to attempt her life or cause her the least uneasiness."

But here a new and most alarming difficulty arose, which may be said to have originated among a number of the Christians who frequented Tadoussac; its cause, however, and the shame and misery which it involved, rested solely upon the shoulders of Europeans, whose sordid avarice knew no bounds even when the soul of a fellow-creature lay in the balance. This refers particularly to the brandy trade, which liquor was introduced into the colony at this time. Of its effects upon the Indians it is needless to speak, their tendency to the excessive use of liquor being too well known even at the present time. Naturally the wiser and better disposed among the leaders in the colony zealously opposed the triffic in liquor; but, unfortunately, they were powerless in their effort to suppress the evil. At last, so apparent and great did the evil become, that a number of chiefs besought the Governor-General of Quebec to build a prison in which to confine those under the influence of liquor, expressing the belief that their example would have a lasting effect upon the other members of the settlement. Fortunately all of the settlements were not afflicted to a similar extent, or the result might have been still more disastrous. Such was the case noticeably at Three Rivers, where under the administration of its zealous Governor, Mr. Duplessis Bochart, matters were conducted in an admirable manner. While affairs were in this condition, a change was made in the governmental affairs at Quebec, which it was hoped would have some beneficial effect upon the colony. It was toward the close of the year 1650 that the Governor, Mr. d'Ailleboust, having completed his three years of service, was succeeded in that position by Mr. de Lauson, a man who had perhaps not only exhibited more interest than any other member in the affairs of the Company, but who, it will be remembered, was chiefly instrumental in effecting the restoration of Quebec to the French by the English. Of him, his administration and the general condition and progress of the colony, we shall endeavor to treat in a more extended manner in the chapter which follows.

DE LAUSON, who had now become Governor of Quebec, was, as noted in the previous chapter, one of the leading men in the Canadian Company, and, besides, a member of the Council of State. Years prior to his elevation to gubernatorial honors, he had been made Intendant of New France (1627), and a little later sent by Louis XIII. to England, to make arrangements for the restitution of Quebec, after its capture by Kertk. Of his subsequent life it may be said that he received his appointment as Governor of Quebec on January 17, 1651, arriving at his destination and assuming the duties as such on October 13 of the same year. This position he maintained, owing to his reappointment at the expiration of his first term, until 1656, when he returned to France and became sub-dean of the King's Council and resided in the Cloister of Notre Dame with one of his sons, a canon there. Here, we believe, he remained until the time of his death, which occurred at Paris, February 16, 1666.

As previously intimated, he had taken an unusual amount of interest in the affairs of New France from his very earliest connections with that country, so that he felt both shocked and mortified at the condition of affairs which he found upon his arrival there. The country was even in a more deplorable condition than had been represented to him, not owing to any exaggeration on the part of Father Lalemant, but from natural retrogression, which like an overpowering epidemic seemed to sweep all before it with remorseless fury. The condition of Indian affairs had grown, if possible, more pronounced, for emboldened by their continued victories over the other tribes, the Iroquois began to doubt the potency of French valor and defenses when pitted against their own formidable legions. So they covered the land with bands of predatory rovers, whose restless maneuvers and bloodthirsty designs made comfort impossible, and living a dread uncertainty. And they lost none of their boastful ardor by an event which, occurring about this time, threw the entire colony into a state of gloomy despair. It seems that one of these parties of roving warriors came to the vicinity of Three Rivers, where they made such an insolent and offensive front that the Governor, Du Plessis Bochart, decided to march out against them. So valiantly he set forth at the head of a number of men, scorning the possibility of danger, or at least the idea that he should remain a passive spectator while others ventured so much. Vainly, therefore, did his friends and associates urge upon him the undesirability and culpable foolishness of risking his life—so valuable to the settlement—against a foe whose greatest strength lay in their ability to surprise and a natural knowledge of woodcraft, which enabled them to follow up a daring rush or onslaught with a sure and safe retreat. He would none of it, but insisted in taking the field actively, and so went forth to his death. In this engagement the opposing forces were composed largely of Oneidas, there being only a few Mohawks in the party. Besides the Governor, one soldier was killed while twelve were taken prisoners. Bochart, whose loss was keenly felt and sincerely mourned, had been in the employ of the Government of France for over twenty years, during which period he had held a number of important offices. His wife was Etiennette des Pres.

Thus the imperiled country continued in a state of embarrassment and turmoil, the Iroquois with persistent activity pursuing their course of uncompromising vengeance against the French as well as their Indian allies. In this awful predicament the few remaining of that section of the Hurons who had refused to avail themselves of the refuge offered them at Quebec, were in their extremity driven from place to place, seeking uncertain safety in the wilds and fastnesses of the far North, or obtaining momentary relief among friendly nations, who in affording the sanctuary requested brought down the vengeance of the Iroquois upon themselves. Naturally enough in keeping up such an active and extended warfare, the ranks of the Iroquois were considerably reduced, but that difficulty was easily remedied, the places of those slain in battle or lost in other ways being more than refilled by the large number of prisoners who, recognizing the utter hopelessness of their cause, swore allegiance to the Five Nations, to the forces of one of which they became attached.

Thus the depredations continued with unabated vigor until at last the settlement at Sylleri became unsafe. So the palisades, formerly deemed all-sufficient as a means of defense, were abandoned, and walls were built around the place along which at every point of vantage pieces of ordnance were mounted. Still, in spite of the utmost precaution and use of every available artifice to delay and impede their advances, the Iroquois kept up their march of devastation, even penetrating into the region of Lake Kisakami, which the Relation of 1651 informs us was difficult of discovery and almost impossible to reach. In fact, the only country which these venturesome and ferocious people had thus far failed to invade was that occupied by the Abenaqui nations, the people of which had as a whole shown much interest in religious affairs since the advent of Father Dreuillettes among them in the early autumn of 1650.

Another of the settlements which at this time suffered severely at the hands of the Iroquois was that of Montreal, whose necessities became so palpably urgent that the Governor, Mr. de Maisonneuve, was compelled to make a journey to France in order that he might by personal application secure that relief which his numerous and urgent communications had failed to bring. In this, fortunately, he was in a measure successful, returning to the Colony in 1653 with an additional force of one hundred settlers. Among the number accompanying him was one Margaret Bourgeois, a native of Langres, whose eminent virtue and piety worked great good among the colonists. In his brief mention of this lady, Charlevoix states that she came in the first instance as housekeeper to the Governor. This, however, Faillon denies, for while admitting that she did act in that capacity for a period of four years, he insists that her original motive in coming was to teach. She was born, we are told, at Troyes, in Champagne, on April 17, 1620, her father being Abraham Bourgeois, a shopkeeper, while her mother's maiden name was Gernier. From earliest youth her inclinations had been towards the life of a religious, one of her first efforts (unfortunately it failed of accomplishment) being to organize a congregation of Sisters in the house of Madame de Chuly, sister of Madame de Chomedey, to whose home she retired after the death of her father. It was while there, and still in an uncertain mind as to the future course she had better pursue, that de Maisonneuve arrived in France, and hearing of her many virtues and the peculiar position in which she was placed, proffered the opportunity for the use and exertion of her accomplishments in the New World. So she decided to take up this life of usefulness thus providentially brought to her notice, and, together with the Governor and others of the party, left her native land on June 20, 1653, embarking on the sailing vessel St. Nicholas, of Nantes, which was in command of Captain Peter de Besson. After an eventful voyage, they finally arrived at Quebec on September 22. After a brief visit there, she proceeded to Montreal, where for four years following she acted in the capacity of housekeeper to the Governor. On November 25, 1657, however, she engaged in her actual vocation as a teacher, opening up a school in a stable building at Montreal on that date. Two years later, with other ladies whom she had induced to join her in France, she founded the Congregation of Our Lady, which was recognized in 1669, and properly and officially established in 1676. From this time on the good work continued, yielding a generous return under her able and judicious management until the time of her death, which occurred on January 12, 1700.

It was not long after the return of de Maisonneuve to Montreal, in 1653, that one of those remarkable incidents[2] occurred which was regarded by the entire Col-

(1) Another account of this most extraordinary occurrence refers to it as the action of October 14, 1652, on which occasion M. de Musseaux, governor of Montreal, sent out Major Lambert Closse, with a scouting ony as an evidence of the unquestionable protection of the Mother of God. This is told by Charlevoix as follows: "Twenty-six men were surprised and surrounded by two hundred Iroquois, who fired several volleys at them without wounding a man, while not one of the shots from those attacked failed to tell. The astonishment of the Indians was extreme. They did not think it wise to give the French time to load again, but fled in all haste."

As an additional caution against surprises during these troublesome and dangerous times, the Governor took active measures to prevent the recurrence of such a surprise as that just experienced, by strengthening the outworks and keeping an extra and vigilant guard. While accomplishing some of these preparatory measures, a numerous body of Onondagas came in sight of the fort, where the main party halted, while a small detachment advanced towards the outworks, signaling as if it were their desire to hold a conference. The number of this party being limited to very few, they were admitted into the fort and to the presence of the Governor, to whom they made known the desire of their canton to arrange for a peaceful understanding, if the French were so disposed. The proposition as usual in such cases was accompanied by a number of handsome presents, which were accepted by Governor de Maisonneuve, who was anxious to advance any understanding of a pacificatory nature; at the same time he announced to the emissaries the desire of the French nation at all times for peaceful relations with the tribes, who, had they been anxious to do so, must have noticed the endeavor to carry out all proposed alliances of this country to the letter, and the entire freedom of any action on the part of the French from that perfidy and condition of unreliableness which had so often led the Indians to abuse the confidence placed in their words. He further called their attention to the fact that he would be considered justified by all civilized governments were he even now to treat them as enemies in retaliation for the many breaches of confidence on their part and evils which they had wrought upon the French and their allies under the guise of friendship. This, however, he told them he scorned to do from the fact that he was a Christian, and as such was guided in his actions by principles entirely different from those upon which the Indians were wont to act. To this and much else that he said upon the subject, they listened with much earnestness, and in reply assured him that the French would soon be given additional proof of their sincerity in requesting a final settlement of their difficulties and friendly understanding.

They then returned to the main body of the party, who were awaiting them, with whom they departed for their canton to lay the matter before the Sachems and principal advisers of the tribe. On the way thither they passed through the settlement of the Oneidas, remaining with them long enough to induce the chiefs of that nation to join with them in the proposed understanding with the French; in this movement they were also joined by the Cayugas, who not only heartily agreed with the proposition, but sent a delegation in the name of the tribe to Montreal with suitable presents and also to warn the Governor that a body of five hundred Mohawks were then on the warpath, their purpose being the destruction of the settlement at Three Rivers, for which point they were headed. Of this news de Maisonneuve took immediate advantage, sending a messenger at once to warn de Lauson of the approaching danger.

Upon learning of the proposed attack Mr. de Lauson immediately proceeded to arrange for a vigorous defense, arming all of the available Hurons in and about the settlement and assembling them in a body so as to be ready at a moment's notice to repel the advances of the foe. This proved to be a most wise and judicious act on his part, for had there been any hesitancy or delay in making these arrangements, the Mohawks, who were rapidly approaching the settlements, would have undoubtedly caught them, as often previously, entirely unprepared, and consequently easy to overcome. As it was, however, a body of well-armed Hurons who were making a preliminary scout came upon a considerable party of Mohawks and immediately attacked them in such a resolute and determined manner that they not only killed a large number, but succeeded in capturing the chief and several of the principal warriors of the detachment, and put the rest to flight[1].

In the meantime, however, a body of Iroquois had marched upon Quebec, about which place they hovered during a greater portion of the summer, committing many depredations and keeping the settlers in a constant state of alarm. During this period many of the unwary who were foolhardy enough to venture without the immediate protection of the fort, fell victims to their own temerity, and were either murdered in cold blood or made prisoners and preserved for a still more terrible fate. Among the number thus falling into the hands of the enemy was Father Poncet, uncle of the former party of twenty-four. Three in the van were suddenly fired upon, and one killed. Another escaped to a wretched house, in which the rest of the party also took refuge with a colonist. Here they held out, doing terrible execution on the enemy until their ammunition was nearly exhausted. Then Baston, a brave soldier, made his way to the fort, and brought up a reinforcement of ten men, with two small cannon loaded with grape. By the help of these, he reached Closse safely. When the Iroquois had sustained a few more deadly volleys, they fled, having out of two hundred lost twenty killed and fifty wounded.

In the Histoire du Canada, Mother Juchereau also gives an account of a gallant action of Major Closse, who at the head of twenty rescued four who were besieged in a redoubt, and in the action killed thirty-two Iroquois, losing only four.

(1) In his notes concerning this particular incident, the historian Shea expresses as his belief that this victory of the Hurons was one which occurred at Montreal on August 15, 1653.

Bishop of Usez, who was a native of Paris and had acquired his education for the priesthood at Rome. Father Poncet was a zealous worker in behalf of the Church, and it was owing entirely to his endeavors that Mother Mary of the Incarnation came to Canada. He arrived in that country on August 1, 1639, and for a considerable period subsequently labored in the country of the Hurons at Montreal, and particularly at Quebec. He was captured by the Iroquois on August 20, 1653, at a point above Sylleri, where he was endeavoring to assist a poor widow in gathering her little harvest. He was a man whose great zealousness and many virtues endeared him to the people of the Colony, and no sooner was it noised around that he had fallen into the hands of the enemy, than a considerable body of the French and a large number of Indians started out with the determination of rescuing him or falling in the attempt.

The journey was one of extreme danger, the enemies being in large force and strongly fortified all along the route which they were compelled to follow; knowing this, they were also hindered in their pursuit owing to the fact that it was deemed necessary for them to stop over at Three Rivers for a while in order to reinforce the insufficient garrison of that place. In the meantime the Missionary was being hurried forward towards the Mohawk settlement, being treated in a manner much similar to that observed towards many of his predecessors. But in spite of the numerous tortures to which he was subjected, his life was spared, and he still lived in hope that his friends had not forsaken him and would arrive in time to secure his release. In the meantime his companion in tribulation, a young Frenchman, was executed; but while Poncet's life still hung in the balance, an Iroquois brave arrived from Three Rivers and notified the party that their nation was on the point of concluding peace arrangements with the French, and that one of the stipulations made by Ononthio in considering the matter, was that the Reverend Missionary should be immediately liberated. No sooner did this become known than the attitude of the Indians towards him became entirely changed; they immediately took him to Fort Orange, treated him with the utmost respect, provided him with suitable and necessary clothing, and when homeward bound led him through several towns of the nation, at each one of which he met with the utmost kindness and respect.

The last of these settlements he left on October 15, 1653, starting from that point with a delegation of the Iroquois, who bore with them a large number of valuable presents for the Governor-General and Superior of the missions. But even now their troubles were far from over, for they had proceeded but a short distance on their journey when they received intelligence that some of the hostages who had been placed in the hands of the French had been put in irons, while others had been slain. Fortunately the chief of the embassy in whose charge Father Poncet had been placed was somewhat doubtful as to the truth of these rumors, and believing in the Missionary and accepting his word, proceeded without hesitation with him towards the settlement, where they arrived without further interference. Upon investigation it proved, as anticipated, that the charges made were without the slightest foundation, the truth of the matter being that an Algonquin under the influence of liquor had been imprisoned for an offense, but that the Iroquois, far from having been molested, had received the kindest attention.

Of the further life and experience of this enterprising and zealous priest we learn that he again became pastor at Quebec, remaining as such until 1657, when the Abbe de Ingéylus, assuming jurisdiction, deprived him. He next went to Onondaga, but was soon after recalled and returned to France on September 18 of the same year. Arriving in his native country, he continued his labors in Brittany and was French plenipotentiary at Loretto, and after several subsequent years of active and useful mission life in the West Indies died at Martinique on June 18, 1675, at the age of sixty-five years.

Once again under the all-sufficing benison of peace, and in spite of many lessons learned through the treachery and unreliability of the Iroquois, the people of Canada took on a condition of hopefulness, seeming without hesitancy to accept the protestations of this treacherous nation as truthful and sincere, and believing that the time had at last arrived when their dangers and difficulties were all at an end. That there was some reason for this attitude on their part must be acknowledged, for the five cantons of that nation had come forward individually for the purpose of effecting this change of condition and relations, which to the French at least was most necessary. It was some time during the first half of the following year that Father le Moyne went to Onondaga to ratify this treaty in the name of the Governor-General of Quebec; this purpose he accomplished with much success, and to the general satisfaction of all parties concerned. He even went further, and as still stronger evidence of his faith and confidence in their good intentions, then and there stated that it was his desire to come and locate among them, which offer so pleased them that a spot for the site of his dwelling was immediately picked out and set aside for that purpose. He was then escorted through the several towns or cantons, at each of which he was received with the utmost favor, the people absolutely loading him down with presents which were sent in behalf of the chiefs and Sachems of the tribes to the Governor at Quebec. He also took advantage of this occasion to talk of the spiritual condition to the Indians, and even succeeded in gaining the confidence of a number to such an extent that they sought for and obtained baptism at his hands.

Strange as it may seem, with all of these friendly understandings now existing there was still an ordeal for him to pass through on his way homeward which came near costing him his life; and but for the almost extraordinary faith he had in a majority of these people, his evident desire to say or do nothing which would mar or injure the friendly compact already made, and consequently his absolute silence regarding what occurred, the peace negotiations might then and there been summarily broken. It seems that while on his passage downward, being in a canoe with two Onondagas, and followed by a number of Hurons and Algonquins, he was suddenly surrounded by a number of canoes full of Mohawks, who without word or seeming reason poured a volley into their midst. So deadly in fact was their aim that all of the Hurons and Algonquins as well as one of the Onondagas were killed at the first fire, while Father le Moyne again found himself a prisoner, helpless and bound. His surviving companion, the remaining Onondaga, was notified by this party that he could return home, but true to his mission, he refused to go, stating that the Missionary had been confided to his care by the elders of his Church, and that he would under no circumstances leave him to their mercy. Futhermore, he chided them with their brutality and want of probity, and threatened them with fearful retaliation on the part of the Iroquois if they should learn of their perfidy. This assertion of his they were at first given to receiving with derision, but when they found that he was steadfast in his position, and undeterred by their numbers or fear of the manner in which he might be treated, they compromised by releasing the Missionary, and turning him over to the Onondaga, who immediately, faithful to his compact, took him onward to Montreal[1].

Treachery has never been regarded as an admirable trait by Christian nations, yet it must be admitted that in a war of reprisal such as that which was being carried on with such brief periods of cessation among the Indians of Canada for a number of years, it as a matter of fact became an almost absolute necessity. Deploring this and perchance wondering that Christianized nations should still adhere to such means, it is safe to say that it afforded to them the only possible chance of retaliating to a certain extent in this contest, which, beginning as a fight for supremacy, ended in a war of extermination. Illustrative of this sad necessity in which instance the Hurons were the aggressors, may be given the following incident, which we take from among a number of similar circumstances given in his interesting account of those times by the historian Parkman:

"When Raguenеau and his party left Isle St. Joseph for Quebec, the greater number of the Hurons chose to remain. They took possession of the stone fort which the French had abandoned, and where, with reasonable vigilance, they could maintain themselves against attack. In the succeeding autumn a small Iroquois war party had the audacity to cross over to the island and build a fort of felled trees in the woods. The Hurons attacked them; but the invaders made so fierce a defense that they kept their assailants at bay and at length retreated with little or no loss. Soon after a much larger band of Onondaga Iroquois, approaching undiscovered, built a fort on the mainland, opposite the island, but concealed from sight in the forest. Here they waited to waylay any party of Hurons who might venture ashore. A Huron war chief named Etienne Annaotaha, whose life is described as a succession of conflicts and adventures, and who is said to have been always in luck, landed with a few companions and fell into an ambuscade of the Iroquois. He prepared to defend himself when they called out to him that they came, not as enemies, but as friends, and that they brought wampum belts and presents to persuade the Hurons to forget the past, go back with them to their country, become their adopted countrymen, and live with them as one nation. Etienne suspected treachery, but concealed his distrust and advanced towards the Iroquois with an air of the utmost confidence. They received him with open arms, and pressed him to accept their invitation; but he replied that there were older and wiser men among the Hurons, whose counsel all the people followed, and that they ought to lay the proposal before them. He proceeded to advise them to keep him as a hostage, and send over his companions with some of their chiefs to open a negotiation. His apparent frankness completely deceived them; and they insisted that he himself should go to the Huron village while his companions remained as hostages. He set out accordingly with three of the principal Iroquois.

"When he reached the village he gave the whoop of one who brings good tidings and proclaimed with a loud voice that the hearts of their enemies had changed, that the Iroquois would become their countrymen and brothers, and that they should exchange their miseries for a life of peace and plenty in a fertile and prosperous land. The whole Huron population, full of joyful excitement, crowded around him and the three envoys, who were conducted to the principal lodge and feasted on the best that the village could supply. Etienne seized the opportunity to take aside four or five of the principal chiefs and secretly tell them his suspicions, that the Iroquois were plotting to compass their destruction under cover of overtures of peace, and he proposed that they should meet treachery with treachery. He then explained his plan, which was highly approved by his auditors, who begged him to charge himself with the execution of it. Etienne now caused criers to proclaim through the village that every one should get ready to emigrate in a few days to the country of their new friends. The squaws began their preparations at once, and all was bustle and alacrity; for the Hurons themselves were no less deceived than were the Iroquois envoys.

(1) There seems to be a disposition on the part of some writers to doubt the correctness of this statement, it rather being believed that the incident as given occurred at a subsequent period while the Missionary was journeying from Quebec to Montreal, and not, as stated, during his return from his conference with the Onondagas. However, this must undoubtedly remain a matter of conjecture for all time, as the journal of le Mercier which covered that particular period is lost, while the Relation of 1655 has also disappeared.

Another statement concerning this incident made by Mother Marv of the Incarnation says that the conduct of the Mohawks was disavowed by their canton, who threw the blame on a Hollander born of a Mohawk mother, to whom we have referred in a former chapter as the Flemish Bastard.

"During one or two succeeding days many messages and visits passed between the Hurons and the Iroquois, whose confidence was such that thirty-seven of the best warriors at length came over in a body to the Huron village. Etienne's time had come. He and the chiefs who were in the secret gave the word to the Huron warriors, who at a signal raised the war-whoop, rushed upon their visitors and cut them to pieces. One of them who lingered for a time owned before he died that Etienne's suspicions were just, and that they had designed nothing else than the massacre or capture of all the Hurons. Three of the Iroquois immediately before the slaughter began had received from Etienne a warning of their danger in time to make their escape. A year before, he had been captured, with Brebeuf and Lalemant, at the town of St. Louis, and had owed his life to these three warriors, to whom he now paid back the debt of gratitude. They carried tidings of what had befallen to their countrymen on the mainland, who, aghast at the catastrophe, fled homeward in a panic."

From time to time the Huron contingent which had passed down with the missionaries from St. Joseph's Island to Quebec, had been strengthened by parties of varying numbers, who, having tested to their satisfaction the impracticability of any effort on their part to sustain the unequal conflict between their nation and the Iroquois, had at length concluded to accept the proffered protection of the French and place themselves under their direction. At the time, therefore, when Father Poncet returned from his mission among the Onondagas, there were in the neighborhood of six hundred Hurons dwelling in the settlement prepared for them, which was on land belonging to the Jesuit Fathers near to the southwestern extremity of the island of Orleans, which lay immediately below Quebec. At this particular town the missionaries had built a fort similar in most respects to that which had been erected on St. Joseph's Island, in connection with which was a chapel, a small residence for the missionaries, and a number of rude bark dwellings which were clustered around the protecting ramparts of the fort[1].

Here, then, in this protected spot the Indians were encouraged in the art of self-support, for which purpose the necessary implements and seeds were furnished to them, so that they might till the soil and raise at least a portion of the food necessary for their sustenance, and in so doing relieved the settlers of the necessity to provide entirely for them. As far as their religious duties were concerned, they remained fervent and consistent as ever; and under the more refining influences of their present location, the direct and more frequent intercourse with a civilized community, and removed from the constant fear and dread of a lurking and ferocious foe, they imbibed some of those mental qualifications which had become necessary factors in a work of mental and moral progress. They in fact became resigned to these new conditions, and in so doing were more tractable and subservient to the influences of the missionary Fathers.

Nor, as may be supposed, were these happy evidences of increasing enlightenment allowed to pass without many warm encomiums on the part of the missionaries, who in every way possible demonstrated to these people their pleasure and gratification at the course they were pursuing. And it should cause but little wonder, for they were regarded as the flower of the flock, and representatives of the most advanced Christian ideas among the aborigines, for whose benefit, education and introduction to more spiritual things the missionaries had given so much in ardent labor and martyred lives.

The Indians then became more active in their demonstrations of piety, and some of them, the more energetic and fervent, went so far as to form two sodalities, one each for the men and women, which resulted in much good to the cause of religion. Thus for nearly two long and happy years the work of civilization and moral progress went forward, and even to these people, who had lost and suffered so much, the horrors of their past lives began to appear as a long passed memory from which much of the bitterness had been taken away. But unfortunately for both the desires and designs of the Jesuit Fathers, the spirit of unleaven and disquiet existed among the savages as heretofore; the fire had been momentarily subdued, but not quenched, and while not visible to the naked eye, the embers of a deadly and undying hatred still slumbered in the breasts of the nations for one another.

(1) From Bowen's historical sketch of the Isle of Orleans, we learn that the site of the fort was the estate now known as "La Terre du Fort," near the landing of the steam ferry. In 1856 Mr. N. H. Bowen, a resident near the spot, in making some excavations found a solid stone wall five feet thick, which there can be little doubt was that of the work in question. This wall was originally crowned with palisades.

Suddenly[1], then, without cause or warning, while following the peaceful pursuits which they had learned even to enjoy, a party of the Iroquois swooped down upon the Hurons and carried off a large number of captives. It was a daring effort successfully carried out under the very guns of the fort at Quebec, the safe retreat of the invaders being assured from the fact that the French were unable to fire, knowing that by so doing they would jeopardize the life of every missionary then located throughout the cantons of the Iroquois nation.

But the peace relations between the French and Upper Iroquois remained unchanged, and therefore resulted disastrously to Mohawk interests, trade being opened up almost immediately between the French posts and the Upper Cantons. Here, then, was a cause of continual vexation and displeasure to the Mohawks, who not only recognized the loss incurred by them and the benefits accruing to the other branches of the confederation, but in addition realized the great value which it was proving to the French allies, whose material progress and advancement, at least, they had not bargained for in their numerous conferences and arrangements with the French.

Being creatures of impulse and almost entirely without those powers of deliberate reasoning which ever betokened the actions of civilized nations whose sense of justice and the proprieties have caused them to formulate a code of laws and method of arbitration for mutual protection, they acted upon the strength of momentary impressions, which consequently made any pledges on their part of but little value. It is hardly to be regarded as surprising, then, that, realizing the loss in traffic to them and benefits accruing to those whom they least desired to serve, the Mohawks with their customary impetuosity and utter disregard for probity should without warning seek to regain their power of commercial supremacy by once more throwing the country into a state of rapine, bloodshed and disaster.

Their descent upon Quebec was quickly followed by numerous depredations and atrocities, among which was the murder of a Jesuit lay brother[2], whose body, pierced by two musket balls, was found near Sylleri, with the scalpless and severed head lying near by. These continued assaults and the great unsafety and danger experienced by the Christian settlement below Quebec necessitated immediate action on the part of the missionaries and the government of the colony for their protection. Their numbers being somewhat increased by others who in fear of their lives had come down to join them, they were removed to Quebec and lodged in an inclosure of palisades close under the protecting guns of the fort. "For ten years following this removal," Parkman tells us, "they remained located at this point, but at the end of that period and after the danger of the times had again somewhat diminished they once more removed to a place called Notre Dame de Foy[3], now Ste. Foi, which is three or four miles west of Quebec." Here they remained for six years, at the end of which time, the soil having become greatly impoverished and the wood supplies within a considerable radius entirely exhausted, they made another change, taking up their abode this time some nine miles from Quebec, at a place called Old Lorette[4], upon land which was owned by the Jesuit Community. While touching upon this subject, it may be interesting to note that Chaumonot, who at the time of this last removal was the missionary in attendance, had years before professed special devotion to our Lady of Loretto, who in his boyhood had cured him, as he believed, of a distressing, if not incurable, malady. The story of this incident is given to us by Parkman as follows: "Joseph Marie Chaumonot was of humble origin, his father being a vine-dresser and his mother the daughter of a poor village schoolmaster. At an early age, they sent him to Châtillon on the Seine, where he lived with his uncle, a priest, who taught him to speak Latin and awakened his religious susceptibilities, which were naturally strong. This did not prevent him from yielding to the persuasions of one of his companions to run off to Beaune, a town of Burgundy, where the fugitives proposed to study music under the Fathers of the Oratory. To provide funds for the journey, he stole a sum of money of about the value of one dollar from his uncle, the priest. This act, which seems to have been a mere peccadillo of boyish levity, determined his future career. Finding himself in total destitution at Beaune, he wrote to his mother for money, and received in reply an order from his father to come home. Stung with the thought of being posted as a thief in his native village, he resolved not to do so, but to set out forthwith on a pilgrimage to Rome; and, accordingly, tattered and penniless, he took the road for the sacred city. Soon a conflict began within him, between his misery and the pride which forbade him to beg. The pride was forced to succumb; he begged from door to door; slept under sheds by the wayside or in haystacks; and now and then found lodging and a meal at a convent. Thus, sometimes alone, sometimes with vagabonds whom he met on the road, he made his way through Savoy and Lombardy in a pitiable condition of destitution, filth and disease. At length he reached Ancona, when the thought occurred to him of visiting the Holy House of Loretto and imploring the succor of the Virgin Mary. Nor were his hopes disappointed. He had reached that renowned shrine, knelt, paid his devotions, and offered prayer, when, as he issued from the door of the chapel, he was accosted by a young man whom he conjectured to have been an angel descended to his relief, and who was probably some penitent or devotee bent on works of charity or self-mortification. With the voice of the greatest kindness, he proffered his aid to the wretched boy, whose appearance was alike fitted to awaken pity and disgust. The conquering of the natural repugnance to filth in the interest of charity and humility, is a conspicuous virtue in most of the Saints; and whatever merit may attach to it was acquired in an extraordinary degree by the young man in question. Apparently, he was a physician; for he not only restored the miserable wanderer to a condition of comparative decency, but cured him of a grievous malady, the result of neglect. Chaumonot went on his way, thankful to his benefactor, and overflowing with an enthusiasm of gratitude to Our Lady of Loretto." Of his subsequent experience, we are told that he resumed his journey towards Rome, during which he was for a period employed by an old burger as a servant. While performing these menial duties, he became known to a Jesuit, to whom he had confessed, and his acquirements even at that time being considerable, through the influence of this religious he was employed as a teacher in one of the schools of that Order. Thus there grew up within him a desire to become a Jesuit, as a result of which, at the age of twenty-one, he was admitted to a novitiate. It was at about this time that he first learned of the Canadian mission, and thereafter became inspired with a desire to devote the remainder of his life to work among the Canadian Indians. So in company with Father Poncet, who was also destined for that field of labor, he soon afterward embarked for his future home, arriving in the Huron country some time during the early autumn of 1639. Before leaving their native country, however, they together visited Loretto, and it was at that time, the historian tells us, that Chaumonot, overflowing with devotion to this celestial mistress of his heart, conceived the idea of building in Canada a chapel to her honor after the exact model of the Holy House of Loretto.

(1) While stating that there was no cause for this breach of confidence on the part of the Iroquois, it is believed that the interested motive which urged them to so treacherous an act had really been inspired by European commerce and example. This particularly pertains to the Mohawks, whom, it is stated, while the war lasted had traded exclusively with the Dutch, and they were greatly displeased with the friendly arrangements now existing between the Upper Iroquois and the French, and sought by every available means in their power to break the intimacy. On the other hand, the French were equally anxious for a continuance of an arrangement which they felt confident would sooner or later bring the Mohawks to a proper state of subserviency.

(2) John Liegeois. According to one authority, this brother was killed on May 29, 1655, at which time he had been a resident of the Colony for nearly twenty-one years. During his residence in Canada, he had rendered a number of important services, and had in fact but just completed the erection of a fort or blockhouse at Sylleri when he was surprised by the enemy and killed.

(4) This change was made, the Relations inform us, towards the end of the year 1673, and during the following year a chapel was erected at Lorette.

At about the time of leaving with his Indians for their new home, the Missionary spoke of his desire and talked over his plans for the erection of this building with his brother priests, all of whom were much pleased with the suggestion. Work on the building was immediately begun, the same being constructed of brick and as an exact counterpart of the original. It stood in the center of a quadrangle, the four sides of which were formed of bark dwellings occupied by the Hurons. Of the subsequent history of this Missionary, it may be said that towards the end of the century the Indians again removed to a point called New Lorette, or Indian Lorette, which is four miles distant from the original site. This location, according to Parkman, was a wild spot covered with the primitive forest and seamed by a deep and tortuous ravine, where the St. Charles foams white as a snowdrift over the black ledges, and where the sunlight struggles through matted boughs of the pine and fir, to bask for brief moments on the mossy rocks, or flash on the hurrying waters. On a plateau close to the margin of the torrent another Huron town was established, and a new edifice erected in honor of Our Lady. And here, at this present day, the dwindling remnants of a once fierce and mighty nation transformed into a meager settlement of weavers of baskets and makers of moccasins are slowly fulfilling the inscrutable edicts of fate in the final summing up of a long-suffering and checkered career.

But to return to this fresh outbreak on the part of the Mohawks. Once more the colonists found themselves confronted by the problem which had since their first advent into the country caused them the greatest disquiet. Again had the feeble thread which bound their temporary understandings been severed, and a breach opened through which they all too readily comprehended was to be viewed the same unwelcome vista of carnage and disquiet. But one hope, a very feeble one at that, remained to them, it being an immediate subjection to this belligerent foe before the other cantons concluded to join in the uprising. In accordance with this view of the condition of affairs, a number of armed parties were immediately sent forth, and their active presence in the field, being not only unexpected but unprecedented, had undoubtedly an altogether wholesome effect, inspiring the savages with sufficient consideration for their activity and alertness, which augured well for something in the way of a compromise.

At this particular moment an Algonquin squaw who with her family had resided at Sylleri acted a part in this drama of blood which undoubtedly had considerable to do with the trend of affairs which followed. She, Charlevoix tells us, was in the field with her husband and children, when five Mohawks suddenly started up and seized and bound the brave; to the woman, however, they paid but little attention, owing to the fact that her children were all of tender age and consequently needed her attention. Here, however, is where they made a fatal mistake, for at a moment when least expected she seized a hatchet, brained the chief who was at the head of the party, and meted out the same fate to another who was rushing to his assistance. The remaining warriors were so thoroughly overcome with the boldness of this act upon her part, that, without attempting the least reprisal, they flew precipitately into the woods, leaving the squaw to release her husband and depart with him and her family for the settlements. A few successes on the part of the French in slight engagements between them and roving bands of the Mohawks, and the particular event just cited, had such an effect upon the tribe that they at once came forward with the request that the terms of peace formerly established might be renewed. They also on this occasion emphasized this desire by requesting that a priest be sent among them to instruct them in the Christian religion. The latter request was acquiesced in, Father le Moyne being selected by the Superior-General for that purpose; and so well and kindly was he received by the tribe that in spite of their former treachery he at least became thoroughly convinced that the desire for peace on their part was honestly and sincerely made. He even would not allow himself to be diverted from this belief, although he might well have been led to do so by the actions of a warrior who on one occasion in a fit of extreme deviltry employed an entire night rushing frantically from cabin to cabin, tomahawk in hand, declaring that he meant to take the life of Ondesson, which was the name by which the Missionary was designated among the Iroquois. Moreover, it is believed that he would have carried out his foul intent had there been others of a similar mind or inclined to show even a passive approval of his contemplated brutality. Other incidents of a questionable nature also transpired in his experience with these people; yet he still valiantly held his post, believing in their sincerity, and persuading himself that he could by gaining their confidence bring them to a proper sense of their duties as men and Christians.

The moral condition of the Onondagas at this time was such as to assure the best and most satisfactory results, when they were approached upon the subject of religion, for which purpose the Missionary Fathers Chaumonot and Dablon were sent among them. Of the two Father Chaumonot has already received somewhat extended mention, and as it will be necessary to refer to his labors at a later period, for the present we will leave him. Of the other, Father Dablon, it may be said that he had but just arrived from France, although he was already on the highway to success, having during the short period of his residence in Canada acquired an enviable reputation for both wisdom and virtue. These Missionaries left Quebec for the country of the Onondagas on September 19, 1655, being attended by a large body of that nation who had come to act as an escort for them.

Reaching the canton of the tribe on November 5, they were received with much distinction by the entire population, while the presents which they bore to the chiefs on behalf of Mr. de Lauson were accepted with much respect and consideration. A location was at once assigned to the Missionaries as a residence, where by the aid of many willing hands they were soon comfortably housed. For some time following their arrival, the work of the Missionaries progressed with much satisfaction, and in fact they had been there but a little while when they were enabled to erect a church in the town, and thenceforth it became possible for them to conduct religious services in a manner equally impressing and satisfactory as though they had been with their own people and in the midst of civilization.

Thus in a few localities the seed of a new life had apparently germinated, and bid fair with consistent and generous cultivation to yield returns, if not commensurate with the labors and sufferings undergone, yet accepted in joy and thankfulness by the Missionaries themselves. And taking everything into consideration—the limited number of settlers, their meager and unsatisfactory equipment, and the chilling indifference of the Canadian Company for their safety and comfort—it is really a wonder that matters could be in so satisfactory a condition as they were. But strange as it may appear and often difficult of comprehension, it is nevertheless the fact that, whatever firmness of footing was theirs, it was entirely owing to the Indians, who, while fully supplied as far as the matter of sagacity was concerned, had not the slightest appreciable idea of their own condition, or the seriousness of the question in which the interests of the entire race were at that time involved.

For the benefit of posterity and those who enjoy the advantages derived from the condition of that country to-day, it may in all fairness be regarded as a most fortunate occurrence that these people then thought and acted as they did; otherwise, it is a question if the French could even have momentarily maintained a position among them. Had they paused to consider, and curbing the unnatural desire for dictatorial ascendancy among themselves, consorted together, acting as a unit in their own defense, the encroachments of civilization could have been retarded to such an extent that the settlement of the country would have in all probability been given up as impracticable.

Instead of such a union, however, they allowed themselves to be overcome by personal hatreds, the result of which was an internal warfare which decimated their ranks, and in fact only ceased when some of the largest and strongest nations had been to all intents and purposes swept from the face of the earth.

Of this peculiar condition Parkman has spoken as follows: "Of the four kindred communities, two at least, the Hurons and the Neutrals, were probably superior in numbers to the Iroquois. Either one of these with union and leadership could have held its ground against them, and the two united could easily have crippled them beyond the power of doing mischief. But these so-called nations were mere aggregations of villages and families, with nothing that deserved to be called a government to hold them together. They were very liable to panics because the part on section or town attacked by an enemy could never rely with confidence on prompt succor from the rest; and when once broken they could not be rallied, because they had no center around which to gather, no place of rendezvous at which to meet and arrange for future action. The Iroquois, on the other hand, had organizations with which the ideas and habits of several generations were interwoven, and they had also sagacious leaders for peace and war. They discussed all questions of policy with the coolest deliberation, and knew how to turn to profit even imperfections in their plan of government which seemed to promise only weakness and discord. Thus any nation or any large town of their confederacy could make a separate war or a separate peace with a foreign nation or any part of it. Some member of the league, as for example the Cayugas, would make a covenant of friendship with the enemy, and while the infatuated victims were thus lulled into a delusive security the war parties of the other nations, often joined by the Cayuga warriors, would overwhelm them by sudden onset. But it was not by their craft nor by their organization—which for military purposes was wretchedly feeble—that this handful of savages gained a bloody supremacy. They carried all before them because they were animated throughout as one man by the same audacious pride and insatiable rage for conquest. Like other Indians, they waged war on a plan altogether democratic—that is, each man fought or not, as he saw fit; and they owed their unity and vigor of action to the homicidal frenzy that urged them all alike."

It will be remembered as alluded to in a former chapter that the Neutral nation, which occupied a stretch of territory southeast of the Petun Hurons and west of the Iroquois, had taken no part whatever in the hostilities between these two nations. On the contrary, their towns and villages were regarded as sanctuaries to which parties or individuals of either people could go for safety. But this condition of indifference by no means pertained to their relations with other tribes and peoples, against a number of which they conducted a fierce and persistent war. Particularly did they maintain an aggressive attitude toward the Mascoutins, or nation of fire[1], who at that time were dwelling some distance inland from the western shore of Lake Michigan.

Of the aggressiveness of the Neutral nation, Lalemant speaks in his Relation of 1643, in which he cites the following incident, which occurred during the preceding summer: "Two thousand warriors of the Neutral nation took a town of the Mascoutins which was well fortified with a palisade and defended by nine hundred warriors. They took it after a siege of ten days, killed many on the spot, and made eight hundred prisoners—men, women and children. After burning seventy of the best warriors, they put out the eyes of the old men and cut away their lips, and then left them to drag out a miserable existence."

But at last the time had arrived for the Neutrals to suffer, for the Iroquois, having conquered all else within reach of their war parties, now gave their undivided attention to their extermination. Their first aggressive movement against this people was made in the fall of 1650, when they fell upon one of the principal towns of the nation, which at the time had a population of sixteen hundred men, exclusive of women and children. The year following, a similar attack was made upon another town of equal pretensions, which resulted in the slaughter of the most of their warriors, and the capture of a large number of prisoners. This virtually terminated the existence of the nation, the few remaining at liberty becoming so terrified that they abandoned their homes and fields, and took to the wilderness, where amidst unusual hardships and privations they rapidly perished until the nation to all intents and purposes became extinct.

We now arrive at one of the final pages in this chapter of blood, which records the destruction of another prominent and populous nation, the Eries, whose territory was bounded on the north and east by the lake bearing their name and the country of the Iroquois; on the east and southeast by the Appalachian Mountains,

(1) So called by the French; also known as the Assistaeronnons and Ateistaehonnons, a tribe of Hurons. This was a very numerous Algonquin tribe, speaking the language of the Sacs and Foxes, who occupied territory in Southern Michigan, Northern Indiana and Illinois, and Central and Southeastern Wisconsin. The historian Shea expresses the belief that these people were probably confounded with the Kickapoos of Western and Southwestern Wisconsin. The Relation of 1658 states that they had thirty towns, and that they were a stationary, and to a certain extent an agricultural people. Forced by the aggressiveness of their enemies, they fled to the neighborhood of the Fox River, Wisconsin, in which locality they remained for a long time. The tribe is now extinct.

and directly south by the Ohio River, on the farther banks of which were located the Shawnees[1]. The Eries, designated by the French as the Nation of the Cat, owing to the large number of wildcats which roamed the territory occupied by them, and who spoke a Huron dialect, had many towns and were noted for their peaceful disposition and general tendency toward more pastoral pursuits. In 1654 they were believed to have in the neighborhood of two thousand warriors, all of whom were excellent bowmen. The cause of the uprising against them by the Iroquois was brought about by an incident which occurred during the year 1653, the occasion being noted from the fact that at the time there were present in the principal towns of the Senecas a deputation of thirty of the principal men of the Erie nation who were there to confirm a treaty of peace which had a short time previously been concluded.

During this visit it happened that a personal quarrel arose between a couple of Seneca and Erie braves in which the former was killed, whereupon the thirty deputies were at once put to death. Then followed a war of reprisals in which the entire Iroquois nation took an active part. On one occasion a band of Erie warriors succeeded in capturing a noted Onondaga chief, whom they were about to sacrifice when he suggested that it would be a wise and prudent course for them to pursue, and one which would undoubtedly prove a means of conciliation to his countrymen, were his life spared and a disposition made of him in accordance with other customs prevailing among the natives, which were often averted to in preference to taking a captive's life. So the chiefs of the nation, after mature deliberation, concluded to give him to the sister of one of their murdered people, whose place he was henceforth supposed to take. She was absent at the time, but upon her return, being informed of the disposition made of the Onondaga, indignantly repudiated the proposition, and vehemently declared that nothing would satisfy her for the loss sustained but the immediate execution of the prisoner. So, according to the customs of the tribe, he was put to death; but before entirely succumbing to the effects of the terrible tortures inflicted, he made the prophetic statement that they were burning, not only him, but the entire Erie nation, as his countrymen would take a fiery vengeance for his murder. And so it came about; for as soon as the knowledge of his death became known among his people, the entire confederacy arose to a man, and under the command of two of their most noted chieftains took the field with the avowed purpose of exterminating the Erie nation.

Down the coast of the great lake they proceeded in a large flotilla of canoes towards the country of the enemy, who upon hearing of their approach withdrew into the forest towards the west, where, having concentrated their entire force, they fortified themselves with palisades and awaited the coming of the enemy[2].

The fight which followed was a long and bloody one, the advancing forces of the Iroquois being time and again repelled by the terrible rain of arrows which were poured upon them. Each succeeding attempt saw many a warrior prone upon the ground struggling in the last agonies of death, or so severely wounded as to be unable to withdraw from the field. At last, however, determined at any cost to secure the victory, they again advanced, this time bearing their canoes in front of them, and thus protecting themselves from the terrible storm of arrows with which their advance was ever greeted. Thus they reached the palisades, which, being scaled, they at once entered upon an impetuous and ferocious hand to hand conflict with the enemy. The onslaught became so terrible that, panic-stricken and overawed by the ferocity of the foe, the Eries at last lost all power of resistance, and becoming easy victims to the knives of the Iroquois braves, were slaughtered almost to a man. But the price of victory was great, and owing to their own severe losses the Iroquois were compelled to remain in that vicinity for several weeks in order that they might properly dispose of their dead, and care for the wounded.

These events were naturally watched with the greatest interest by the colonists, who, not without cause, feared that these last great and overwhelming successes of the Iroquois might lead them to a renewal of a pronounced and aggressive hostility toward the French. But if such were the intentions of that nation, the Onondagas at least showed no disposition towards becoming active factors in the estrangement, as by every means in their power they endeavored in everything to strengthen their friendly relations with the colonists. With this in view, they sent a delegation to Quebec, accompanied by their

(1) Also called Shawanese and Shawane. This nation did not belong to the Iroquois Confederacy, although they were called brothers by them. Formerly they dwelt in the far South, from which country they removed to that of the Iroquois, who assigned them lands on the west branch of the Susquehanna; but they always regarded them as inferiors. When Father Gravier descended the Mississippi River in 1700, he found the Shawnees, or Chaouanou as they were called by the French, living on a tributary of the Ohio which comes from the southwest and is now known as the Tennessee.

Of these people, Drake in his well-known work on the Aboriginal Races of North America, published about the year 1857, says: "This tribe own a tract of country twenty-five miles north and south and one hundred east and west, bounded on the east by the State of Missouri and on the north by the Kansas river, which in point of soil, timber and water is equalled by but few tracts of the same size in any country; though there is somehow hardly a sufficient proportion of timber for the prairie. The Shawnees have become an agricultural people, their buildings and farms being similar to those of the whites in a newly settled country; inclosed by rail fences and most of them in good form, each string of fence being straight and sufficiently high to secure their crops, and many of them staked and ridered. They all live in comfortable cabins, perhaps half or more being built of good hewn logs and neatly raised, with out-houses, stables and barns." According to the same authority, the Shawnee nation was subdued by the Iroquois in 1672.

(2) Of the relative strength of the two parties, we learn from different reliable sources that of the Eries there were supposed to be some two thousand warriors, all of whom were gathered together within the fortification, besides women and children, while of the Iroquois there were some twelve hundred. In this conflict we are told a number of the invaders carried firearms, while the Eries depended entirely upon poisoned arrows, which they discharged at the foe with great accuracy and rapidity.

resident pastor, Father Dablon, who added his entreaties to theirs for the establishment of a number of the French among them. With this party the good priest arrived at the seat of government on March 30, 1656, where the delegation was well received by Mr. de Lauson, who, in spite of other portentous influences brought to bear, expressed his unqualified willingness to accede to their request.

To further this purpose, a body of Frenchmen, fifty in number, were selected and placed under the immediate command of Sieur Dupuys, an officer of the garrison, whom the governor appointed as commandant of the new settlement. The party was accompanied, also, by Father Francis le Mercier, who had in the meantime succeeded Father Jerome Lalemant as Superior-General of the missions, and Fathers Fremin, Menard and Dablon, whom he had chosen to establish the first Iroquois church. The entire party left Quebec on the 7th day of May, being, in spite of a far from bountiful harvest, supplied with an abundance of provisions for their support, if necessary, for an entire year, in addition to which they carried implements and seeds of a character and quantity requisite for the cultivation and planting of a considerable area of land.

This proposed undertaking becoming known to the Mohawks, who also learned that the party had already advanced a considerable distance on its way, they became aroused and embittered, their naturally vindictive and suspicious natures leading them to believe that the establishment of such a colony in the country of the Iroquois would be certain to result unfavorably to their interests. So they held a general council at which it was decided to thwart the undertaking and prevent the carrying out of the plans as arranged between the French and Onondagas. In order that they might carry this determination into positive and immediate effect, a large body of warriors, some four hundred in number, were sent out by the nations with orders to destroy the entire party. This, fortunately, they were prevented from doing, as they failed to overtake or come in contact with the main body, although they partially carried out their instructions by falling upon a few stragglers, to whom they afterwards excused themselves by saying: "We did not know that you were Frenchmen; we took you for Hurons or Algonquins."

It was not long after this occurrence that the French were informed of the attitude of the Mohawks towards them, which naturally caused much uneasiness for the welfare and safety of the party. However, the condition of affairs was such that it would have been, not only impolitic, but absolutely suicidal for them to have taken any active measures to resent this insult. They even, it would seem, lived in hope that the Mohawks, having overcome their first passionate resistance, would become reconciled to the undertaking, and could be prevailed upon to acquiesce in the arrangements. Not long after, however, they became thoroughly convinced of the futility of expecting any such concession on the part of these people, whose aggressiveness became more pronounced than ever. It was at this time, in fact, that a party of warriors approached Isle Orleans, where in the early morning they fell upon a band of ninety Hurons of all ages and sexes, killing these and carrying the rest away into captivity. They even accentuated the insult by taking these bound and helpless people in their canoes before and close under the guns of the fort, where, we are told, they made them sing, as if in defiance of the authorities there. They then took them to their country, where, after having burned the chief among them, they distributed the rest through their numerous towns and villages.

Of de Lauson's action in this matter, the historian Charlevoix says: "He has been severely censured for having put up with such insolence; and his inaction, it must be confessed, while they were carrying off, so to say, from between his arms allies whose preservation equally concerned the honor of the French name and that of religion, casts a stain on his memory which all his virtue cannot efface, but it is because there are misfortunes which men do not forgive, and which, to their way of thinking, dishonor a man as much as the greatest cowardice." It must be said in his defense, however, that to rescue these people, whose troubles were largely owing to a presumptuous confidence on their part, would have required the calling-out of five or six hundred men; and even had the Governor taken that immediate and arbitrary stand, they could not have been made ready for service until the Mohawks had obtained such a start that pursuit would have been unavailing.

As to the miserable people who, largely owing to their own foolishness, had thus fallen victims to the wiles and machinations of a watchful enemy, it is stated on the authority of one of the number, who more fortunate than his fellows succeeded in making his escape and returned to the Colony, that they passed through the trying ordeal with the greatest fortitude, and that while many of them were subjected to almost unparalleled inhumanity, they never ceased in proclaiming the greatness and goodness of God, although they knew that in so doing they irritated their torturers, and thereby increased their own sufferings.

It will be noticed that the Iroquois had conducted their numerous hostilities in a manner that not only proved the correctness of their judgment, but also exhibited an amount of astuteness and diplomatic cunning which placed them far ahead of other nations in that respect. This will become still more noticeable in making even a cursory review of prior events, by means of which we learn that after having, to all intents and purposes, destroyed the Hurons, they made systematic attacks upon the allies of that nation. Among this number were the Ottawas, who, however, gaining wisdom from the experience of others, removed themselves and their belongings, as far as possible, from the presence of the foe, against whose power and all-conquering forces it would have been impossible for them to contend. So, some of them took possession of territory immediately contiguous to Saginaw Bay, or Saguinaw, as some call it, which lies directly west of the country of the Hurons and north of the Pottawattomies, while others located on Thunder Bay and at Manitouline Island and Michillimackinac. According to Charlevoix, the majority of this tribe or nation remained upon the banks of the River Ottawa, which he had always claimed was their particular place of abode. To this statement, however, the historian Shea demurs, quoting a long line of authorities in substantiation of the position taken by him. Of the division and dispersion of the Hurons, we have already treated in part, tracing them through their wanderings from St. Joseph to Manitouline, while others went to Michillimackinac. Of their further history, we are informed that in 1652 they were at Teaontorarai—the Noquet Islands—and in the following year were about to retreat into Lake Superior, to Aotonatendie, near the great lake of the "Puants" (probably the Pointe du Ste. Esprit). In 1658 they were among the Pottawattomies and in the year following were on the Mississippi. Here they came into contact with the Sioux, and, falling out with them, ascended the Black River, although the Ottawas, who had till then kept them company, marched on to Chequamegon. It is here that Menard evidently found the Ottawas and was coming from their village to that of the Hurons of the Black River when he lost his life. A remnant of the Neutral nation were also with these Hurons. Of the subsequent history of the Neuters, it is known that after the two tremendous defeats which they sustained at the hands of the Iroquois—of which an account has been given—a number of those who managed to escape formed an alliance with the Andastes, in conjunction with whom they committed many depredations in the Iroquois country, in one instance driving the women and children of the Senecas from their towns and villages. Perrot locates the last of the Neuter towns at a point opposite Detroit. At a later date, that is towards the latter part of 1653, a large body of these people—some eight hundred in number—fled to Askauchioe at a point three leagues beyond Sault Ste. Marie, at that time a general resort of the Ottawas, Chippewas and Nipissings. From that time on no further trace is obtainable of them, so that it cannot be actually told whether they united with the Hurons or became subjects of the Iroquois. Shea believes they did both, as at a later period they formed a considerable part of the Senecas.

A few weeks after the descent of the Mohawks upon Isle Orleans and their capture of a large number of Hurons, a party of some thirty Ottawas, accompanied by two Frenchmen, came with a large consignment of furs to Quebec. In setting out upon their return journey, these Ottawas were accompanied by thirty young Frenchmen, while Father John Dequen[1], who had charge of the mission during the absence of the Superior-General, Father le Mercier, appointed Fathers Dreuillettes and Garreau and a lay brother, Louis le Boesme[2], to attend them.

Of the hazard of the venture and extreme risks which the party ran, there can be no question whatever, as they had been on the road even less than a day[3] when they were met by an envoy sent to them by the Governor of Three Rivers, who warned them that there was a large party of Mohawks in the neighborhood.

This news undoubtedly saved the lives of many of them, as it was afterwards learned that the Mohawks, having heard of their departure from Quebec, designed to attack them between that point and Three Rivers, for which purpose they had arranged an ambuscade. Being warned, however, the Ottawas had used extra precautions, and in doing so avoided a collision with the enemy. Arriving at Three Rivers, a council was immediately convened, which resulted in a decision by a majority of the French to proceed no farther, but await a favorable opportunity for returning to Quebec. This determination was certainly a wise one, as the Ottawas were poorly armed and in any event ill-prepared to meet such a vigorous and well-equipped foe. So but three of the Frenchmen followed the fortunes of the Ottawas, and even they were persuaded to do so from the fact that they could not bring themselves to allow the missionaries to go forward thus unattended.

Thus far firearms had not been counted among the implements of war pertaining to an Ottawa warrior's outfit, but now, realizing the necessity and gravity of the occasion, a majority of them were armed with guns, of the use of which they had but little if any knowledge. It has since remained a question in the minds of many if this was an act of wisdom on the part of the missionaries and their friends, as like children with a new toy, once having them in their possession, the Ottawas were always on their lookout for an excuse to use them. This incautiousness on their part made pursuit an easy matter for the Mohawks, who had dogged their steps since the moment of their leaving Three Rivers, and but awaited the fitted place and opportunity to fall upon and destroy them. Thus, with an easy certainty, they followed upon the Ottawa trail until reaching the banks of a lake formed by the discharge of the Ottawa River into the St. Lawrence, which is at a point some little distance above the Island of Montreal. Here they awaited the arrival of the party, the advance guard of whom had no sooner come within range than they poured in a deadly volley upon them, killing several outright and severely wounding a great many others. Among the latter was Father Garreau, whose spine had been broken by a musket[1] ball.

The main body of the Ottawas, on hearing the firing and scenting danger, immediately hastened forward to the relief of their friends, landing at a point where a number of corpses and unmanned canoes denoted the ambuscade had taken place, and with much bravery charged repeatedly upon the defenses of the enemy. The battle was a stubborn one, many being killed and wounded on both sides, but the Ottawas were at length compelled to desist, retiring without having secured the release of the Jesuits and a number of their fellow-tribesmen, who thus remained in the hands of the foe.

After attacking the Ottawa flotilla and having retreated to safer quarters behind a number of prepared defenses, the chief in command of the Mohawk party, who was none other than the Flemish Bastard previously referred to, came to the Missionaries expressing the great sorrow he felt at the injuries inflicted upon Father Garreau, and assuring them that it was altogether unintentional and that they had not been recognized as Frenchmen and Jesuits until after the damage had been done. Of course, this was merely a subterfuge on his part, and as such received by the Missionaries, who, however, fully realizing the precariousness of their condition, and anxious to return to the settlement as quickly as possible, were unwilling to do anything that might anger this ferocious leader, or otherwise delay their arrangements for immediate departure. That their alternative was a wise one became a certainty, when, on the following day, September 2, a party of Mohawks escorted them to Montreal, where they also presented two belts of wampum to the Governor as an expression of their regret at having fired upon Father Garreau and to wipe away the tears of his fellow-priests.

Thus was the good priest, Father Leonard Garreau, brought back to die, and thus was sanctified a life of earnest usefulness and self-denial, most fittingly brought to a glorious climax of martyrdom amidst the scenes of his activity and devotion. Already had the hand of death been placed heavily upon him, so that when the party arrived at Montreal he was beyond earthly hope. Fortunately, however, Father Claude Pijart was there at the time, and it was in his arms the good priest expired while still calling upon the Almighty God for forgiveness for those who had slain him.

The attitude of the Mohawks had now become too pronounced to admit of question, so, having suitably cared for the remains of their deeply deplored brother and friend, Father Dreuillettes and Brother le Boesme set forth on their return journey to Quebec, where they arrived safely without further incident.

Contrary to all precedent, and in spite of the unreliability and treachery of that particular tribe, the French continued to flatter themselves with the belief that, if the other nations of the confederacy but remained loyal, the Mohawks would be compelled to friendliness, or at least remain passive. Adding to this their firm conviction that the newly established settlement at Onondaga was also to be a notable factor in the establishment of French authority and supremacy throughout the country, they remained steadfast in their support of views which had hitherto proved untrustworthy and chimerical.

In the meantime, the body of men who had started under the command of Dupuys for the country of the Onondagas proceeded on their way, and in due time arrived at Three Rivers and Montreal, at both of which places they made a brief stay. Finally they left the latter place on June the 8th, which had become memorable in the annals of their venture, for that upon it they fell in with a party of Mohawks whom they routed and relieved of their belongings in return for some similar treatment received at the hands of people of that tribe but a short time before.

On the 29th of the same month there arrived in their camp the young Huron previously mentioned who alone of the party captured at Isle Orleans had succeeded in making his escape. He was in a most pitiable condition, being barely able to walk, while the skin on many parts of his body had been burnt, almost to a crisp, thus causing the most exquisite pain with every motion. He had then been seventeen days on the road, during which entire period he had tasted of no food but berries, while fear of pursuit and recapture had added to his bodily sufferings by a condition of mental anxiety and suspense which had made such a boon as rest an impossibility. This poor fellow was treated with the greatest kindness and solicitude by the French and Indians alike, and when sufficiently recovered to bear the exertion was sent under protection to Quebec.

At last, after a number of days' journeying, uneventful in every respect save that they suffered considerable inconvenience from want of provisions[1], they arrived at the country of the Onondagas.

Here they were met by emissaries who informed them that a large representation from all the Iroquois cantons had come out to bid them welcome and for that purpose awaited them on the banks of Lake Onondaga[2], and Dupuys immediately made suitable arrangements to march into the presence of the nations with all of the impressiveness at his command.

In order to carry out this plan, and before approaching the awaited delegation, he unloaded several small cannon and fired a volley, after which he reëmbarked and proceeded amidst an almost continuous salvo of musketry to make a landing.

Upon landing, the entire party was received by the savages with every expression of satisfaction and rejoicing, while speeches, banquets, dances and songs were indulged in to an unlimited extent. On July 12, which was the day following, Mass was celebrated, and at its conclusion the Te Deum was chanted. The services over, there was an exchange of presents, a form always observed when alliances or treaties were about to be made. So affairs continued to run along in a most satisfactory manner, the French, having already become somewhat accustomed to their new surroundings, building and arranging quarters suitable for their occupancy. While this work was being carried along, Father le Mercier proceeded to make a visit to Onondaga, at which place he was well and ceremoniously received. This town lay about five leagues from St. Mary's, and was called by the Onondagas, Achiendase.

By the end of the month the missionaries had begun to labor, and quite successfully, too, among the people of the tribe, while they received further evidence of the interest taken in their work in a request from the Cayugas that a missionary be also sent to them, and to that important duty Father Menard was appointed. Here the reverend Missionary met with the most encouraging conditions, the entire adult population of the canton seemingly being very desirous of embracing the Christian religion. So constant in fact did they become in their attendance at divine service, that it was soon necessary to enlarge by one-half the capacity of the little mission chapel which had already been erected there. Another evidence of their genuinely friendly intentions toward the French was made manifest at about this time, when the former became the victims of a painful complaint which almost threatened their extermination. It was during this trying period that the Onondagas cared for them with the greatest devotion, and it was undoubtedly due to these unremitting attentions that they finally recovered. Still the fact remained that on former occasions a similar amount of kindness and solicitude had been followed by the basest treachery, therefore, while anxious to believe them sincere in their attentions, the French were still of the opinion that it would be wisest to observe the utmost precaution, and hence sought assiduously for means with which to erect a fort. But here again arose the same difficulty which had menaced them—indifference on part of the Canadian Company for their safety and absolute refusal by that organization to advance the necessary means for their protection. And as to credit, well as a matter of fact, those best qualified to judge as to the necessities and requirements of the colony, had but little of that commodity to fall back upon.

In the meantime, the Hurons who had been established on Isle Orleans, being in momentary fear of their lives and therefore deeming that location altogether too much exposed, removed to Quebec. Here once more the Indian character asserted itself, for no sooner had they been placed in safety than, assuming or believing that some affront had been put upon them by the French, they sent a secret messenger to the Mohawks, praying that they henceforth be received and recognized as people of that nation. No sooner had they done this, however, than they most heartily repented the pettish action which was liable to renew and increase, rather than lessen, their difficulties. But the Mohawks, realizing their advantage, pressed the matter with much earnestness, and finding that argument was unavailing, resorted to force[3], sending out several parties of warriors, who fell upon and slaughtered or made prisoners of all who were unfortunate enough to come within their reach. They believed that such summary treatment would bring about the most satisfactory results, and when in their opinion sufficient chastisement had been administered, they boldly sent a deputation of thirty of their nation to Quebec, to arrange for the removal of the Hurons to their country.

Of the arrival of these emissaries and the exceeding haughtiness with which they presented their demands, Charlevoix tells us in the following language:

(1) From all accounts, it would seem that in spite of the provisions made for their absolute security in this respect, matters were so badly managed that an actual famine was upon them before they became aware of it or had been able to prepare themselves to a certain extent for such an unlooked-for contingency. Their difficulties were also augmented at this time considerably owing to the fact that the fishing and hunting, upon which, as a matter of resource, they had confidently relied, also failed them, so that the French, who were entirely unaccustomed to long and forced fasts, stood an excellent chance of dying of starvation, and, in fact, many of them might have succumbed had not the Sachems of the Onondagas had the forethought to send forward a number of canoes laden with provisions to meet them.

(3) Accounts differ in regard to this particular incident, as the Relation of 1657 fails to refer in any manner to this aggressive action on the part of the Mohawks. It does, however, state that a party of one hundred Iroquois encamped at a point within three or four days' march of Quebec, and from there sent forward a delegation of thirty to the Hurons to demand their fulfillment of the agreement as proposed by them.

"They first applied to Mr. de Lauson and asked to be heard in the general assembly of the Hurons and French; and the Governor-General having consented, the chief of the deputation first addressed the Hurons, saying: 'Brother, it is now some time since you stretched your hands to beg me to lead you to my country; but as often as I get ready to do so you draw back, and it is to punish you for inconstancy that I have struck you with my hatchet. Believe me. Give me no more ground to treat you thus. Arise and follow me.' With these words he presented two belts—one, he said, to help the Hurons rise; the other, to assure them that henceforth the Mohawks would live with them as with their brethren. He then turned towards the General and spoke to him in these words: 'Ononthio, lift up your arms and let your children go, whom you hold clasped to your bosom; for, should they commit any folly, it is to be feared that while intending to chastise them, my blows may reach you. This is to open your arms.' And he presented a belt. 'I know,' he continued, 'that the Huron loves the prayer; that he acknowledges and adores the Author of all things; that in all his necessities he has recourse to Him. I wish to do the same. Consent that Ondesson[1]—who has left me, I know not why—return with the Huron to instruct me; and as I have not canoes enough to take so many, do me the favor to lend me yours.'"

The forbearance shown by de Lauson at this exhibition of uncalled-for and extreme insolence was simply remarkable, and only to be accounted for from the fact that these were the only ones of all the Confederacy who persisted in remaining inaccessible to the friendly advances of the French and their repeated efforts to act generously and conscientiously toward them. In the position thus assumed by him he was non-committal, although leaning to the art of persuasion rather than exhibiting that tendency towards aggressiveness which might most naturally have been expected. This fact was not lost upon the Hurons, who perhaps by their methods of discrimination concluded it was fear that impelled him to act in this manner. Thus they were led to compare the uncertainty of their present condition under French protection with their assured safety among the Iroquois, and as a result became divided among themselves, some[2] remaining steadfast in their allegiance to the French; others decided to associate themselves with and become part of the Onondaga nation, while the Bear family alone remained steadfast to the original pledge and decided to join issues with the Mohawks.

The de Lauson acting as governor on this occasion was a son—Charles—of the actual official, who was absent at that time. He had come to Canada on June 23, 1652, and in the following August married Mary Louise Giffard, who died in 1656. After his father's departure from Quebec in the summer of the latter year, he administered the affairs of the government until September 18, 1657, when he also went to France. Having been ordained, he returned in 1659 with Bishop Laval. He again returned to France in 1672, accompanied by his daughter.

To the speech of the Mohawk deputy, as already given, Father le Moyne, who was present and acted as interpreter, replied, saying: "Ononthio loves the Hurons; they are his children. But he does not keep them in leading strings. They are old enough to act for themselves. He opens his arms and leaves them at liberty to go whither they will. For my part, I will follow them wherever they go. If they go to you, Mohawk, I will instruct you also in what manner it is necessary to pray and adore the Maker of all things; but I dare not hope that you will listen to me. I know you and know how far your indocility goes. But I will console myself with the Hurons. As to the canoes you ask, you see well enough that we have scarcely what we need. If you have not enough, make some." This speech, which concluded the discussion, was preceded by one by the chief of the Bear family, who, representing the Mohawk deputation, said: "Brothers, I am yours. I throw myself with closed eyes into your canoes, prepared for everything, even to die. But I wish to go at first alone with my own cabin (family). I will not permit others to embark with me. If hereafter the rest of my nation wishes to come and join me, I will not oppose it; but I am glad to be able to let them see first in what manner you treat me." This substantially ended the conference, after which the Mohawk deputation, thoroughly satisfied with the outcome, set to work to make a number of canoes, in which when completed, together with those they had arrived in, they embarked with the Hurons for their country, on August 21, 1656. Five days later Father le Moyne also left Quebec on his way to the Mohawk country.

But the troubles of the Hurons were not to end here, as they had fondly hoped, for hardly had the Mohawks and accompanying party departed from Quebec when a delegation from the Onondagas arrived and demanded that the Hurons also fulfill their pledges to them. This placed them in an unenviable and most embarrassing position.[3]

(1) Father le Moyne.

(2) To be more explicit, the Attignenonhac or Cord remained with the French, while the Arendarrhonon or Rocks were those who decided to join the Onondagas.

(3) Charlevoix tells us that, while in a quandary as to what to do or say to these demands, the Hurons were relieved of their embarrassment by the Governor, who came forward and told the deputies that they were wanting in respect to their Father; that a part of the Hurons were disposed to follow them, but that their wives and children were afraid of their weapons, and that it was not in the guise of warriors

The Hurons, Neutrals and Eries having been disposed of, the Iroquois now turned their attention towards the Andastes. This nation, although by far smaller in numbers than were the other nations, cost their destroyers more dearly than all the others put together. Particularly was this the case with the Mohawks, who for ten years—from 1650 to 1660—were the most aggressive and persistent of the attacking party. It was in fact a summary lesson for these people, whose reverses were such as to greatly humble and humiliate them and reduce them to a position from which they never fully recovered.

When it became evident that the Mohawks were no longer able to maintain against this valorous enemy, the other nations of the Confederacy came to the rescue, although, be it said to the credit and glory of the Andastes, with but little, if any more satisfactory results. And so the war continued until the earlier part of 1662, when a body of Iroquois warriors, eight hundred strong, marched down into the country of the Andastes and determined to annihilate them then and there. But here again they were doomed to disappointment, finding that the foe had taken every precaution to avoid being surprised. By the advice of a number of Swedish colonists living in their vicinity, they had fortified their town by a double palisade, flanked by bastions, on which were mounted a number of small cannon. Quickly appreciating that force would not avail against such careful and systematic arrangements, the Iroquois sought by treachery to secure the desired end. They sent forward a delegation of twenty-five warriors for the ostensible purpose of arranging for a general settlement of grievances. But the Andastes were not to be hoodwinked so readily. Thoroughly appreciating the true inwardness of the act, they admitted the envoys, seized them, and then, mounting with them upon high scaffolds, tortured them to death before the very eyes of their fellows.

Realizing their impotency to act, the forces of the Confederacy withdrew, evidently for the purpose of consultation and the final adoption of some method by means of which they could once more acquire that supremacy among the nations which had been theirs for so long a time. Before they had arrived at any satisfactory or definite conclusion they were compelled to take the field; for the Andastes, determined to bring affairs to a speedy conclusion, invaded their country and started upon a war of active aggression. This, too, happened at a most inopportune time for the Senecas—first of the confederated nations to be attacked— owing to the fact that they were at that time suffering from the ravages of a dread disease. Thus the war became resolved into one of skirmishes and predatory rovings, which, in spite of their bravery and success, gradually told upon the limited number of the Andastes. They finally were badly defeated by the Senecas in 1675. Those remaining—it was a pitiable remnant—were thereafter known as the Conestogas, as which nearly one hundred years later they met extermination at the hands of the "Paxton Boys," as elsewhere related.

But what of the victors, and what was the result of their insatiable desire for conquest? They had vanquished every nation and people of their own race; had followed some even to the verge of extermination, while others were permitted to exist, but only on payment of tribute to this inexorable nation of Caesars; and had made of a populous and prosperous country a barren and lifeless waste. They were the conquerors, but at a cost which had merged their greatness into nothingness. For, as says le Jeune: "Their victories have so depopulated the towns that there are more foreigners[1] in them than natives. These were either prisoners who had been adopted or who had voluntarily joined the Iroquois to save themselves from further annoyance and hostility.[2]

Situated, then, in a location between the spreading settlements of France and England, this once great nation was reduced to a pitiful few,[3] who vaunted their greatness on the strength of a useless triumph. But even then they were not satisfied to rest. The thirst for blood was still upon them; hands steeped in the blood of thousands of their unoffending fellows had lost their cunning for more peaceful employment; hearts bad to the core exulted in the thought of renewed atrocities. And so they went their way, incorrigible, unreconcilable, pursuing their murderous designs to Hudson's Bay, around the shores of Lake Superior, thence down along the Mississippi, reaching far out to inland and towards Lake Michigan in search of those who, driven by their brutality, had at last sought refuge on the islands at the mouth of Green Bay, along the shores of Lake Michigan, and at Sault Ste. Marie, Michillimackinac, and other points which have since become historical as centers of missionary enterprise and zeal.

Here, then, we feel impelled to discontinue a narrative so fraught with human suffering and human sacrifice, so void of the graciousness of happy results. Broad-that they should come to seek friends and brethren: that if they wished to do things regularly, they should return home; that the Hurons would keep their word with them when they were able to regard them no longer as enemies; and to show them that what he said was not a pretext, the Hurons would go to Montreal to await them, and would give hostages. This reply satisfied them, and after they had been shown every consideration and courtesy, they returned home. To this alleged action on part of the Governor, and subsequent results, however, the Relation of 1657 does not in any way refer.

(1) At this time at Onondaga there were seven different nations permanently established, while among the Senecas there were eleven.

(2) These aliens were not permitted to have any voice in the tribe's deliberations at the council fire, but were expected to join the nation's war parties although they were generally excused from taking active participation in the field against their former countrymen. The condition of the female prisoners was little better than that of slaves, and those to whom they were assigned often killed them on the slightest pique.

(3) Twenty-two hundred warriors in all, of which but twelve hundred were purely Iroquois.

minded and masterful as the original plan had been, there was lacking to a marked extent that unity without which such undertakings are certain to meet with failure. In this instance, in spite of the general good intent on the part of its originators and the sympathies of the religious who subsequently joined in the work, there was a senseless cupidity surrounding the actions of the Canadian Company, the individual members of which had unfortunately obtained control of the enterprise by reason of their great wealth and consequent ability to obtain the favor of those higher powers whose exalted positions enabled them to rule the nation's destinies both at home and abroad. This was preëminently the most serious cause, to which the blood-thirsty depredations of the Iroquois proved a fitting sequel.

In the beginning the interests of religion and commerce had been almost identical, and it was but a little while before it became plainly demonstrated to all unprejudiced minds that either one of these enterprises could not fail without the other experiencing a commensurate loss. First, then, the hardy voyageur and explorer gained foothold in this land, the people of which, fierce, fearless and unapproachable, were more quickly aroused to the benefits to be derived from closer association with the whites through the self-sacrificing and unobtrusive devotion of the religious, who quickly followed.

That the work of the missionaries was deterred by the apathy of the Company, there can be no reasonable doubt; and in leaving the colonists to their own devices and without the necessary means with which to protect themselves and the dignity of the country they represented, added to a growing belief among the more obstreperous of the Indian nations that the vaunted grandeur and power of France were but myths, hence increased their arrogance towards them.

In the meanwhile, devoted to the work they had so unselfishly undertaken, and loath to see so fair a prospect stripped of its possibilities, the missionaries stepped boldly into the breach, guarding devotedly with their own lives the interests of religion and the colonists alike. But even such exquisite examples of generous self-sacrifice were insufficient to uphold a cause so burdened by narrow-minded avarice, and hence after experiencing countless sufferings and indignities, those of them who still remained realized that the end was near.

Towards the end of the seventeenth century we find the country's commercial interests in the last throes of dissolution; while with the expulsion of the Hurons the Canadian mission became a thing of the past, a majority of the Jesuits returning to their native land, there to await the dawn of an era when, freed from the dross of an all-material existence, the world would experience a spiritual awakening.

THE original purpose of this book, as elsewhere stated, was to set before the people of Wisconsin and the country in general a correct accounting of the work accomplished by the Catholic Church in the territory at the present time comprising the commonwealth of Wisconsin. In the accomplishment of such an undertaking, it has been necessary to return to that period when, through the pious zeal and intrepid courage of a few determined spirits, the first faint rays of an encroaching civilization were cast athwart the fruitful and untrodden area of the New World. It is necessary, as far as it is within our means, to trace the progress of the Church in its long and victorious march; from the advent of the first missionary fathers, who alone, and almost unaided, penetrated the awe-inspiring depths of an unknown region, to that triumphant culmination which marks the present day. And it is only in doing so that the enormity of the undertaking, as well as the grandeur of the work achieved, can be made appreciable to the average mind. We can hardly wonder at this. It is difficult for the people of to-day, to whom all of the blessings of religion are afforded in comfort and security, to appreciate the moral as well as the physical fortitude, the absolute self-denial, the awful sufferings, anguish and even death, which mark the way of the Cross and the establishment of the Church on this continent.

But how conditions have changed! Now a man can walk abroad in a state of almost absolute security, while, if otherwise deserving, a variance in creed does not debar him from the consideration and respect of his fellows. To the many thus happily situated at the present time, it is hard to convey the remotest idea of the terrible ordeal through which the pioneer missionaries passed, and to which so many succumbed, that we might enjoy the benefits and blessings to follow. Such, however, was the devotion shown and the sacrifice made that posterity might benefit thereby.

That the efforts of these early inspired workers may be still more fully appreciated, we have devoted considerable space to the consideration of those who first peopled the country—among whom the missionary fathers were called upon to labor. Here was a virgin field indeed, peopled with "men without knowledge of God or use of reason"; unchristianized, brutish creatures, of treacherous and ferocious nature, whose inclinations were low and bestial, and whose minds were clogged with superstition. But of these more will be said at the proper time.

The name Indian, or rather the use of that name, as applied to the aborigines of this continent, is believed by some writers to have been given through an error on the part of Columbus, who on his first voyage to America mistook that country for the Indies. It was, in fact, doubtless that in carrying out a pre-conceived plan he stumbled upon this new discovery; for his belief had always been that by sailing in a westerly course upon the Atlantic he would eventually arrive at the eastern coast of India. Thus through an error which obtained even to his fourth and last voyage, the name was given and acquired.

Of the standard of excellence of these people as compared with those of other nationalities, at the time when they were first seen by Europeans, a well-known writer says: "In the light of our best means of knowledge of the past, with what we infer from fact, and our observations of the present as regards the aborigines of our continent, probably we should not widely err in resting in this conclusion—that the North American Indian, when first seen and known, stood mid-way upon the scale of humanity as then divided and filled over our globe by gradations of beings belonging to our race." Of the character of the Indians, the same writer says: "They have a fine physique, vigor of body, acuteness of senses, few demoralizing habits, good natural understanding; and living under a stimulating and healthful, not enervating climate, on good soil, they were, nevertheless, torpid, unaroused, unambitious, idle, listless, indifferent to everything but hunting and fighting. No step of progress, no sign of betterment showed itself among them. For all the evidence within our reach attests to us that there was among the savages no token of that discontent or yearning which is the incentive to change for the better." Of latter-day impressions we have those of George Catlin, the enthusiast who lived among the Indians for a number of years. He says: "The North American Indian in his native state is a hospitable, honest, faithful, brave, warlike, cruel, revengeful, relentless, yet honorable contemplative and religious being." General Custer has said—and none knew them better: "The Indian in his native village, on the warpath and when raiding upon our frontier settlements, forfeits his claim to the appellation of the 'noble red man.' We see him as he is, and, as far as all knowledge goes, as he ever has been—a savage in every sense of the word; not worse, perhaps, than his white brother would be similarly born and bred, but one whose cruel and ferocious nature far exceeds that of any wild beast of the desert."

As to character,[1] naturally enough, that also

(1) Of their social status Parkman speaks as follows: "In Indian social organizations a problem at once suggests itself. In these communities, comparatively populous, how can spirits so fierce, and in many respects ungoverned, live together in peace without law and without enforced authority? Yet there were towns where savages lived together in thousands, with a harmony which civilization might envy. This was in good measure due to peculiarities of Indian character and habits. This intractable race were in certain external respects the most pliant and compliant of mankind. The early missionaries were charmed by the docile acquiescence with which their dogmas were received; but they soon discovered that their facile auditors neither believed nor understood that to which they had so readily assented. They seemed from a kind of courtesy, which, while it vexed the priests, tended greatly to keep the Indians in mutual accord. That well-known self-control which, originating in a form of pride, covered the savage nature of the man with a veil, opaque though thin, contributed not a little to the same end. Though vain, arrogant, boastful and vindictive, the Indian bore always with sarcasm with astonishing patience. Though greedy and grasping, he was lavish without stint, and would give away his all to soothe the manes of a departed relative, gain influence and applause, or ingratiate himself with his neighbors. In his dread of public opinion he rivaled some of his civilized successors.

"All Indians, and especially those populous and stationary tribes, had their code of courtesy whose requirements were rigid and exact; nor might any infringe it without the ban of public censure. Indian nature, inflexible and unmalleable, was peculiarly under the control of custom. Established usage took the place of law, was in fact a sort of common law with no tribunal to expound or enforce it. In these wild democracies —democracies in spirit, though not in form—a respect for native superiority, and a willingness to yield to it, were always conspicuous. All were prompt to aid each other in distress, and a neighborly spirit was often exhibited among them. When a young woman was permanently married, the other women of the village supplied her with fire-wood for the year, each contributing an armful. When one or more families were without shelter, the men of the village joined in building them a house. In return the recipients of the favor gave a feast to the builders, if not, thanks were sufficient." (Note—Of this particular characteristic special notice is taken in the Relation of 1650, which offers as evidence of the fact the following statement: "As often as we have seen tribes broken up, towns destroyed and their people driven to flight, we have seen them to the number of seven or eight hundred persons received with open arms by charitable hosts who gladly gave them aid and often distributed among them a part of the lands already planted, that they might have the means of living.")

"Among the Iroquois and Hurons, and doubtless among the kindred tribes, there were marked distinctions of noble and base, prosperous and poor; yet while there was food in the village, the meanest and the poorest need not suffer want. He had but to enter the nearest house and seat himself by the fire, when, without a word on either side, food was placed before him by the women. (Note—Father Brebeuf also adds his personal testimony to this statement, being in fact very emphatic in praise of their hospitality and social spirit.")

Contrary to the received opinion, these Indians, like others of their race when living in communities, were of a very social disposition. Besides their incessant dances and feasts, great and small, they were continually visiting, spending most of their time in their neighbors' houses, chatting, talking, loitering one another with witticisms sharp, broad and in no sense delicate, yet always taken in good part. Every village had its adepts in these wordy tournaments, while the shrill laugh of young squaws, untaught to blush, echoed each hearty jest or rough sarcasm. In the organization of the savage communities in the continent, one feature more or less conspicuous continually appears. Each nation or tribe—to adopt the names by which these communities are usually known—is sub-divided into several clans. These clans are not locally separated, but are mingled throughout the nation. All the members of each clan are, or are assumed to be, intimately joined in consanguinity. Hence it is held an abomination for two members of the same clan to intermarry, and hence again it follows that every family must contain members of at least two clans. Each clan has its name, as the clan of the Hawk, of the Wolf or of the Tortoise; and each has for its emblem the figure of the beast, bird, reptile, plant or other object from which its name is derived. This emblem, called "totem" by the Algonquins, is often tatooed on the clansman's body, or rudely painted over the entrance of the lodge. The child belongs in most cases to the clan, not of the father, but of the mother. In other words, descent, not of the totem alone, but of all rank, titles and possession, is through the female. The son of a chief can never be a chief by hereditary title, though he may become so by force of personal influence or achievement. Neither can he inherit from his father so much as a tobacco pipe. All possessions alike pass by right to the brothers of the chief or to the sons of his sisters, since they are all sprung from a common mother. This rule of descent was noticed by Champlain among the Hurons in 1615. That excellent observer refers it to an origin which is doubtless its true one. The child may not be the son of his reputed father, but must be the son of his mother"—a consideration of more than ordinary force in an Indian community.

This system of clanship, with the rule of descent usually belonging to it, was of very wide prevalence. Indeed it is more than probable that close observation would have detected it in every tribe east of the Mississippi; while there is positive evidence of its existence in by far the greater number. It is found also among the Dakotas and other tribes west of the Mississippi, and there is reason to believe it universally prevalent as far as the Rocky Mountains and even beyond them. The fact that with most of these hords there is little property worth transmission, and that the most influential becomes chief with little regard to inheritance, has blinded casual observance to the existence of this curious system.

It was found in full development among the Creeks, Choctaws, Cherokees and other Northern tribes, including that remarkable people, the Nachez, who, judged by their religious and political institutions, seemed a detached offshoot from the Toltecs of Mexico. It is conspicuous among the roving Algonquins of the extreme North, where the number of totems is almost countless. Everywhere it formed the foundation of the policy of all the tribes, where a policy could be said to exist.

The Franciscans and Jesuits, close students of the nature and superstitions of the Indians, were by no means so zealous to analyze their organizations and government. In the middle of the seventeenth century, the Hurons as a nation had ceased to exist, and their political portraiture as handed down to us is careless and unfinished; yet some decisive features are plainly shown. The Huron nation was a confederacy of four distinct contiguous nations, afterwards increased to five by the addition of the Tionontates; it was divided into clans; it was governed by chiefs, whose office was hereditary through the female; the power of these chiefs, though great, was wholly of a persuasive or advisory character; there were two principal chiefs—one for peace, the other for war, there were chiefs assigned to special national functions, as the charge of the public Feast of the Dead, the direction of trading voyages to other nations, etc.; there were numerous other chiefs equal in rank, but very unequal in influence, since the measure of their influence depended on the measure of their personal ability. Each nation of the confederacy had a separate organization; but at certain periods grand councils of the united nations were held, at which were present, not chiefs only, but also a great concourse of the people; and at these and other councils the chiefs and principal men voted and proposed measures by means of small sticks or reeds, the opinion of the plurality ruling."

The foregoing facts, as quoted from the historian, were gathered from the writings of Champlain, Sagard, Bressani and the Relations prior to 1659. The names of the four confederate nations referred to were the Ataronchronons, Attigneonghac, Attignaouentans and Ahrendarrhonons.

gives evidence of some diversity, for which the general conditions and surroundings were, of course, responsible. There was noticeable, for instance, a different state of affairs prevailing among those living in localities where game and provisions were more plentiful than there was with those not so satisfactorily established; thus superabundance, lack of sufficiency, relations with neighboring tribes, nearness to rivers or large bodies of water, all had their influence in forming the character and directing the energies—that is, so far as necessity compelled, but no further. The Indian in fact, as such, was eminently a child of Nature, and as such subject to frequent and ungovernable moods. To him, therefore, things looked entirely different than to the cultivated eye. Nature had no artistic merit; its manifold beauties failed in excessive charm; its strange and wonderful gifts

The subordinate nation just previously referred to of the Tionnontates had but one town. Each nation bore the name of some animal or object, the Attignaouentans being known as the Nation of the Bear. The clans were also usually named after animals, which fact caused considerable confusion and many errors. However, it is known that the Bear nation was the principal one of this league.

Of Indian character, the well-known writer and authority, Jonathan Carver, writes as follows: "The character of the Indians, like that of other uncivilized nations, is composed of a mixture of ferocity and gentleness. They are at once guided by passions and appetites which they hold in common with the fiercest beasts which inhabit their woods, and are possessed of virtues which do honor to human nature. That Indians are of a cruel, revengeful, and inveterate disposition; that they will watch whole days and make their ways through pathless and almost unbounded woods, subsisting only on the scanty produce of them, to pursue and revenge themselves on a single enemy; that they bear unmoved the most tormenting cries of such as unhappily fall into their hands, and receive diabolical pleasures from the torture they inflict on their captives, I readily grant; but let us look on the reverse side of this terrifying picture, and we shall find them temperate both in their diet and notations (it must be remembered that I speak of them in their primitive state, unassimilated with Europeans); that they withstand with unexampled patience the pangs of hunger or the inclemency of the seasons, and esteem the gratification of their appetites as a secondary consideration.

"We likewise see them honorable and humane to those whom they consider as their friends, and even to their adopted enemies, and ready to partake with them the last morsel or to risk their lives in their defense.

"In contradiction to the report of many other travelers, all of which have been tinctured with prejudice, I can assert that the affection and the apparent indifference with which the Indian meets his wife and children after a long absence, an indifference proceeding rather from custom than insensibility, he is not ashamed to confess of either conjugal or parental tenderness."

In illustration of this characteristic, we here introduce the story of a Naudowessee woman which Carver gives in a preceding chapter: "A couple whose tent was adjacent to mine lost a son of about four years of age. The parents were so much affected at the death of their favorite child that they pursued the usual testimonies of grief with such uncommon rigour as through the weight and sorrow and loss of blood to occasion the death of the father. The woman, on the other hand, suffered no such misfortune, no sooner saw her husband expire than she dried up her tears and appeared cheerful and resigned. As I knew not how to account for so extraordinary a transition, I took leave to ask her the reason of it, telling her at the same time that I should have imagined the loss of her husband would rather have occasioned an increase of grief than such a diminution of it.

"She informed me that as the child was so young when it died and unable to support itself in the world, the spirits both of the husband and wife had been apprehensive that its situation would be far from happy; but no sooner did she behold its father depart for the same place, who not only loved the child with the tenderness of a father, but was a good hunter and would be able to provide plentifully for its support, than she ceased to mourn. She added that she now saw no reason to continue her tears, as the child on whom she doted was happy under the care and protection of a fond father; and she had only one wish that remained ungratified, which was that of being buried with them. Her countenance confirming the favorable opinion I had just imbibed, convinced me that, notwithstanding the appearance of suspension of her grief, some particles of that vengeance to be separated from a beloved object, which is implanted either by nature or custom in every human heart, still lingered in hers. I observed that she went almost every evening to the foot of the tree on a branch of which the body of her husband and child were laid, and after cutting off a lock of her hair and throwing it on the ground, in a plaintive melancholy song bemoaned its fate. A recapitulation of the actions he might have performed, had his life been spared, appeared to be her favorite theme; and whilst she foretold the fame that would have attended such imitation of the brave deeds, her pride, her grief, and her suspended: 'If thou hadst continued with us, my dear son,' would she cry, 'how well would the bow become thy hand, and how fatal would thy arrows have proved to the enemies of our bands. Thou wouldst often have drunk their blood ere cadden their flesh, and numerous slaves would have required thy toils. With a nervous arm wouldst thou have seized the wounded buffalo or have combated the fury of the ravaged bear. Thou wouldst have overtaken the flying elk, and have kept pace on the mountain's brow with the fleeter deer. But tears manliest thou not unperformed hadst thou stayed among us till age had given thee strength and thy father had instructed thee in every Indian accomplishment.

"Accustomed from infancy to hardships, these people become superior to a sense of danger and the dread of death, and their fortitude implanted by nature and nurtured by example, by precept and accident, never suffers a moment's relaxation. Though slothful and inactive while their store of provisions remains unexhausted, and their fees are at a distance, they are indefatigable and persevering in pursuit of their enemy or in circumventing their enemies.

"Though they are artful and designing and ready to take every advantage, if they are cold and deliberate in their counsels, and cautious in the extreme either of discovering their sentiments or of revealing a secret, they might at the same time boast of possessing the qualifications of a more animated nature, of the sagacity of a horse, the hereditary sight of a lynx, the cunning of a fox, the agility of a bounding roe, and the unconquering fierceness of the tiger.

"In their public course in forming part of the community, they possess an attachment to that band to which they belong unknown to the inhabitants of any other country. They combine as if they were animated only by one soul against enemies of their nation, and banish from their mind every consideration opposed to this.

"They consult without unnecessary opposition, or without giving way to the customs of envy or ambition, on the matters necessary to be pursued for the destruction of those who have drawn on themselves their displeasure. No selfish views, however, influence their advice or obstruct their resolutions. Nor is it in the power of bribes or threats to diminish the love they bear for their country.

"The honor of their tribe and the welfare of their nation is the first and most predominant emotion of their hearts; and from hence proceed in a great measure all their virtues and their vices. Actuated by these, they brave every danger, endure the most exquisite torments, and expire triumphing in their fortitude, not as a personal qualification, but as a national characteristic.

"From the same source also flow that insatiable revenge towards those with whom they are at war, and all the consequent horrors that disgrace their name, their unvaried demand being implacable hatred, and the extinction of an action in opposition to their passions, which are totally insensible to the control of reason or humanity. They know not how to keep their parties within any bounds, consequently that courage and exultation which would otherwise do them honor, degenerates into savage ferocity."

Of their manners and customs the same writer states in part: "The women place their children soon after they are born on boards stuffed with soft moss such as is found in morasses or meadows. The child is laid on its back in one of these kind of cradles, and being wrapped in skins or cloth to keep it warm, is secured in it by small bent pieces of timber. To these machines they fasten strings by which they hang them to trees if they find no trees at hand, fasten them to a stump or stone while they transact any needful business. In this position are the children kept for some months. When they are taken out the boys are suffered to run naked, and the girls have only a small cloth from neck to knees with a shift and a short petticoat.

"The Indians are extremely circumspect and deliberate in every word and action. There is nothing that deprives them into any intemperate warmth, their inveteracy to their enemies, which is rooted in every Indian heart, and never can be eradicated by any other cause, they are very cautiously cautious, taking care not to betrays on any ground whatever their emotions. If an Indian has discovered that a friend or enemy has injured or interested him, he never will by outward behavior have rendered himself obnoxious, he does not inform him in plain and explicit terms of the danger he runs by pursuing the track near which his enemy lies in wait for him, but will only ask him why he does what he is going that day, and after receiving his answer, with the same indifference tells him that he has been informed that a dog lies near the spot which he probably do him harm. This hint proves sufficient; and his friend avoids the danger with as much caution as if every design of his enemy had been pointed out.

"The Indians are mostly dumb meats, either in a way of hunting party, when his wife and children meet him some distance from the habitations, instead of affectionate sensations which would naturally arise in the breasts of polished beings, and by acceptable outward tokens of mutual congratulations, he but continues his course without paying the least attention to those around him till he arrives at his home. Here he sits down, and with the same indifference as if he had not been absent a day, smokes his pipe. Those of his acquaintances who have followed him do the same, and perhaps it is several days before he relates to them the incidents which may befallen him during his absence, though perhaps he has left a father, brother or son on the field whose loss he ought to have lamented, or has been instrumental in the murdering that calls for his revenge.

"Has an Indian been engaged for several days in the chase or in any other laborious expedition, and by accident continued thus long without food, which he arrives at the hut or tent of a friend where he knows his wants may be immediately supplied, he takes care not to show the least symptoms of impatience or betray the hunger by which he is tortured; but on being invited in, sits down and smokes his pipe with as much composure as if every appetite was allayed and he was perfectly at ease; he does the same as if among strangers. This custom is strongly ordered to by every tribe, as they deem it a proof of fortitude, and think the reverse would entitle them to the appellation of old women.

"If you tell an Indian that his children have greatly signalized themselves against an enemy, having taken many scalps and brought home many prisoners, he does not appear to feel any extraordinary pleasure on the occasion; his answer generally is, 'it is well,' and he makes very little further inquiry about it. On the contrary, if you inform him that his children and wife have been murdered or taken by the enemy, but only one scalp, 'it does not signify', and perhaps for some time at least asks not how it happened. This seeming indifference, however, does not proceed from an insensibility or impression of the mind, for with the understanding they are esteemed savage, I never saw among any other people greater proofs of parental or filial tenderness; and although they meet their wives after a long absence with the stoical indifference just mentioned, they are not in general void of conjugal affection.

"Another peculiarity is observable in their manner of paying their visits. If an Indian goes to visit a particular person in a family, he mentions to whom his visit is intended, and the rest of the family immediately retire to the other end of the hut or tent, and are careful not to come near enough to interrupt them during the whole of the conversation. The Indians discover with amazing sagacity and acquire with the greatest readiness anything that depends on the attention of the mind. By experience and an acute observation, they attain many perfections lay unheeded save when crudely applied in cases of absolute necessity. There was in fact no sign of appreciation in that higher sense which marvels at and glories in the strange and mystic revelations, which as a rule appall into veneration the most sceptical and indifferent. Where among enlightened peoples such apathy pertains—when Nature's charms, the foliage, the flowers and a hundred similar wonders which give forth in lasting cadence the melody of life, go unappreciated—you will invariably find a gross and sodden intellect, from which condition, unhappily, poor human nature is not yet entirely exempt.

But the Indian, though failing in many of those essentials so requisite in a cultured and artistically appreciative sense, had his own views of the character and purpose of Nature's manifold and wonderful gifts. To him it was as the page of an open book in which he read and learned. He gazed into the arching brow of Heaven and read his way unerringly over the trackless waste; his every sense was trained to an infinite nicety, enabling him to forestall the coming storm; his ear drank in each sound—the moaning wind, the snap of twig, the purr of animate life, the self-complaisant twitter of birds at rest, or the short, sharp cry of the brooding mother driven from her young. For him each blade of grass, each leaf had its story, guiding him along his way through the treacherous wilderness, or leading him safely from the presence of a fierce and vengeful foe. He was in verity Nature's child, but in whom was embodied a sad admixture of good and evil. He was strong, patient and self-reliant, but not progressive. No distance seemed too great, no undertaking too arduous for accomplishment, had he an empty larder to replenish or vengeance to mete out. But when it came to progress he knew not the meaning of the word. He believed, or at least took it for granted, that the world owed him a living, and that, having been put here, it was bound to furnish him with one. He noticed the beasts; they toiled not, neither did they spin, yet lived and lived well. Was he not as good as the beasts? Should it cost him more exertion to live than they? Thus from his standpoint, it was not a matter of degradation to place himself upon a footing with the lower animals in order that he might prove his right to a life of ease and indolence. Herein arose the belief, undoubtedly, that it was incompatible with the dignity of his station to labor, and hence the fallacious deduction that squaws were made for that purpose. Before the white man as a warrior he stood in awe, though his opinion of him when engaged in more peaceful and domestic pursuits was one of unmeasured contempt. The Indian lived as he believed. Sufficient for the day was his motto; and as a result, when he ate he would do so with repletion, but failing in food would starve with resignation. Cleanliness was another word which to him revealed no meaning; while dirt, being part and parcel of his very existence, was regarded as one of his personal belongings.

In their first relations with the whites, the things most craved by the savages were hatchets and metal kettles. The latter were particularly in demand, being used in lieu of those unglazed pottery, wicker or wood, which had heretofore served that purpose.[1] A part of the food used was cooked upon coals or roasted upon a stake, although the greater portion, perhaps, was boiled in cauldrons. This, owing to the destructive character of the vessels, was accomplished by throwing heated stones into them, the act being repeated until the food had been brought to a satisfactory condition for consumption. Of the character of the food itself it is needless to treat, although perhaps well enough to say that the Indian's dietary code consisted in eating all he could get, even though failing in getting all he could eat. As a rule, the Indian family subsisted on one meal a day, although no restraint was placed upon a member whose natural cravings for food demanded more frequent relief. In their idea of dress,[2] the aborigines also assumed which Europeans are strangers. For instance, they will cross a forest or a plain which is two hundred miles in breadth, and reach with great exactness the point at which they intended to arrive, keeping during the whole of that space in a direct line, without any material deviation, and this they will do with the same ease, whether the weather be fair or cloudy. With equal acuteness will they point to that part of the heavens the sun is in, though it be intercepted by clouds or fogs. Besides this, they are able to pursue with incredible facility the traces of man or beast, either on leaves or grass; and on this account it is with great difficulty a flying enemy escapes discovery. They are indebted for these talents, not only to nature, but to an extraordinary command of the intellectual faculties, which can only be acquired by an unremitted attention and by long experience. They are in general very happy in a retentive memory; they can recapitulate every particular that has been treated of in councils, and remember exact time that has been held. Their belts of wampum preserved the substance of the treaties they have concluded with the neighboring tribes for ages back, to which they will appeal and refer with as much perspicuity and readiness as Europeans can in their written records. Every nation pays great respect to old age; the advice of a father will seldom meet with any extraordinary attention from the young Indians, and sometimes they receive it with only bare assent; but they will tremble before a grandfather and submit to his injunctions with the utmost alacrity. The words of the ancient part of their community are esteemed by the young as oracles. If they take during their hunting parties any game that is reckoned by them uncommonly delicious, it is immediately presented to the oldest of their relations. They never suffer themselves to be overburdened with care, but live in a state of perfect tranquility and contentment. Being naturally indolent and if provision just sufficient for their subsistence can be procured with little trouble and near at hand, they will not go far or take any extraordinary pains for it though by so doing they might acquire a great plenty of a more estimable character. Having much leisure time, they indulge this indolence to which they are so prone by eating, drinking, or sleeping and rambling about in their towns or camps; but when necessity obliges them to take the field, either to oppose an enemy or to procure themselves food, they are alert and indefatigable."

(1) In his work upon the Indian tribes, published in 1822, Morse, in speaking of the Assineboins and their methods of cooking, says: "These Indians who have only bark kettles generally roast their meat. This they do by fixing one end of a stick that is sharpened at both ends into the ground at a little distance from the fire, with this pole, on which the meat is fixed inclining towards the fire. On this stick the meat is occasionally turned when one part becomes sufficiently roasted."

Carver says the Naudowessies make pots in which they boil their victuals, from a certain black clay or stone which resists the effects of the fire nearly as well as iron. When they roast, if it is a large joint or a whole animal such as a beaver, they fix it as Europeans do, on a spit made of hard wood, and placing the ends on two forked props, now and then turn it. If the piece is smaller, they spit it as before, and fixing the spit in an erect and slanting position, with the meat inclining towards the fire, frequently change the sides till every part is sufficiently roasted. They make their dishes in which they serve up their meats, and their bowls and pans out of the knotty excrescences of the maple tree or any other wood. They fashion their spoons with a tolerable degree of neatness (as these require much less trouble than the larger utensils) from a wood that is termed in America spoon wood, and which greatly resembles box wood.

(2) The men of every nation differ in their dress very little from each other, except those who trade with the Europeans. These exchange their furs for blankets, shirts and other apparel, which they wear as much for ornament as necessity. The latter fastened by a girdle around their waists about half a yard of broad-cloth which covers the middle peculiar views. The women wore clothes that were calculated for comfort and convenience and not for the reason that they covered and concealed the person. Therefore the breech-cloth and leggins of the children were allowed to attain considerable age before being encumbered with any clothing whatsoever. On state occasions, however, these people were wont to shine in a resplendency of fur and feathers, while rings, necklaces and girdles of beads and claws and headgear of strange and weird device added greatly to the impressiveness of the scene.

Proud, willful, overbearing, but stoically brave, the Indian discovered one weak and especially contemptible side to his nature: They were foolishly, grovelingly and slavishly superstitious.[1] At any time and under any conditions the omen or foreboding came. A bird, an parts of their bodies. Those who wear shirts never make them fast either at the wrists or collar; this would be most confining to them. They throw their blanket loose upon their shoulders, and holding the upper side of it by the two corners, with a knife in one hand, and a tobacco-pouch, pipe, etc., in the other, they walk about in their villages or camps; but in their dances they seldom wear this covering. Those among the men who wish to appear gayer than the rest, pluck from their heads all the hair, except from a spot on the top, about the size of a crown piece, where it is permitted to grow to a considerable length. On these are fastened plumes, feathers of various colors with silver or ivory quills. The manner of cutting or ornamenting this part of the head distinguishes nations from each other. The paint their faces red and black, which they esteem as greatly ornamental; they also paint themselves when they go to war; but the method they make use of on these occasions differs from that whereof they use in their ordinary dances. The young Indians who are desirous of excelling their companions in finery, slit the outward rim of both their ears; at the same time they take great care not to separate them entirely; but leave the flesh thus cut still untouched at both extremities; around this spongy substance, from the upper to the lower part, they twist brass wires till the weight draws the elongated rim to the shoulder, or sits down in a disorderly, and draws it almost down to the shoulder. This decoration is esteemed to be excessively gay and becoming. It is also a common custom among them to bore their noses and wear in them pendants of different sorts. Sea-shells were much worn by those of the interior parts, and reckoned very ornamental. They go without any covering over the thigh, except that before spoken of, around the middle, which reaches half way to the thigh; but they make for their legs a sort of stocking either of skins or of cloth. These are sewed as near to the shape of the leg as possible, so as to admit of being drawn on and off. The edges of the stuff of which they are composed are left annexed to the seam and hang loose for about the length of a span; to these they have also placed a number of ribbons, so that the leg is generally ornamented, if of cloth, with ribbons or lace; if of leather, with embroidery and porcupine quills curiously colored. Their shoes are made of the skins of deer, elk or buffalo; these being sometimes dressed according to the European manner, at others with the hair remaining on them, and cut into short pieces, which are tied by straps to the feet and convenient for walking. The edges around the ankles are decorated with pieces of brass or tin fixed around the leather strings about an inch apart, which being pretty thick, make a tinkling noise either when they walk or dance.

The women wear a covering of some kind from the neck to the knees. Those who trade with Europeans wear a linen garment the same as that used by the men, the flaps of which hang over the petticoat. Such as these wear clothes made of broadcloth and serge, in the same as those of the men. They differ from each other in the mode of dressing their heads, each following the custom of the nation or band to which they belong, and adhering to the fashion made use of by their ancestors from time immemorial. The women of every nation generally place a spot of paint about the size of a crown piece on the middle forehead; some of them put paint on their hair, and sometimes a small spot on the middle of the forehead.—Carver.

While discussing the topic of dress it may be well to briefly refer to the methods adopted by the Indians for decorating their dwellings, as well as the manner in which the same are built. Carver expresses it as his opinion that these people as a rule pay much greater attention to their own personal appearance and ornamentation than to the comfort and artistic appearance of their homes. In the construction of the latter he tells us that they first erect a number of proper forms for a house, which they at first fastened near to their ends with bands of bark. These were then raised, the bottoms being spread as wide as possible so as to give a larger area to the interior. To these upright, or rather inclined, poles were added two at stated distances, which not only formed the support of those already placed, but in addition served as the exterior frame of the building. On the outside of this frame were laid the skins of elk or deer, previously sewed together, and of sufficient size not only to cover the entire frame, but also to form a covering to form a door. Some idea perhaps may be obtained of the number of skins required for this purpose from the fact that the apartment occupied by the chief master of the Naudowesies to which Carver particularly refers was not less than forty feet in circumference.

In building they observed no regularity in the arrangement of their tents, placing them as best suited their convenience. Another kind of dwelling adopted by the natives was a hut, the frame of which was made of pliable poles which were bent so as to form a semi-circle at the top. These were then lashed together and covered with matting made of platted rushes, or of birch bark. These huts or cabins were without windows or chimneys, as there was a sufficient opening in the roof to serve for the place of the latter. When in storm it became necessary to close these openings, the house became exceedingly troublesome. Of the interior furnishings it may be said that they were composed largely of skins which were placed in rows on the ground, upon which the family lay. On some occasions when the floor space was not sufficient to accommodate the entire family, elevated frames were built, upon which the younger children slept.

(1) Concerning the superstitions of the Indian much has been written which is of great interest to those who have already made or desire to make a close study of the peculiarities of that people. From among a large number of articles pertaining to this subject, to which we propose to give a somewhat extended notice, is one taken from Perrot's memoire, which has been written and arranged by the Rev. Chrysostom Verwyst, O. S. F., in his interesting and instructive little work entitled "Missionary Labors of Fathers Marquette, Menard and Allouez in the Lake Superior Region." It cannot be asserted that (pagan) Indians profess any doctrine; it is certain that they do not follow, so to say, any religion. They only observe some Jewish customs; for they have certain feasts at which they do not make use of a knife to cut the meats which have been boiled, but tear and devour them with their teeth. Their women, also, when they have given birth to a child, have the custom of not entering for one month the cabin of their husband. They are not even allowed during all that time to eat with the men, nor to partake of anything prepared by them. For this reason they do their cooking apart.

"As their principal divinities the Indians acknowledge the Great Hare, the Sun and Demons; I mean those who have not been converted. They give the most frequently the Great Hare, as they venerate and adore him as the creator of the earth; also the Sun as the author of light. But they also put the wicked spirits among the number of their gods, and if they invoke them it is because they fear them, and in the invocation which they make to them they beg of them life. Those among the Indians whom the French call jugglers (medicine men) speak of the devil familiarly, consult him and counsel him in the chase.

"They have besides many other divinities to whom they pray, and who, they claim, reside in the air, on the land and beneath the earth. The gods of the air are thunder, lightning and in general all visible objects that they cannot comprehend, for instance, the moon, eclipses and whirlwinds. The gods of the land consist in malignant and injurious creatures, especially serpents, tigers and other animals or birds with animal claws. They also comprise under this head such animals as are extraordinary in any kind for beauty or dexterity. The gods beneath the earth are bears who pass the entire winter without eating, nourishing themselves only from the substance they extract from their navel inabilities while fasting. They have a particular care for those who live in caves or holes underground, whom they invoke when they have dreamed of them in their sleep.

"For such like invocations they get up a feast consisting of eatables or tobacco, to which the Sachems are invited, and the host declares in their presence what he has dream he has seen, and whence it is that a sacrifice feast in honor of the Manitou of which they dreamed. At such feasts one of the head men makes a speech, and naming the creature to which the feast is vowed, he addresses to the following words: 'Be merciful to him who offers thee those viands—naming each kind of meat that is being offered—have pity on his family; grant him all he needs!' And the general answer is pronounced several times until the prayer is finished. This 'O' means the same with them as 'amen' with us. There are some who at such feasts eat all that is set before them, others again do not oblige you to do so; you may eat what you like and take the rest home.

"They honor the Great Tiger as the god of the water, whom the Algonquins and others speaking the same language call 'Michipissy' (or Missibizi, or Mishibiji, pronounced Mee-shee-be-zhee) even respectively by Father Hennepin in the Relation of 1697 and Bishop Baraga. They tell you that this Michipissy lives in a very hollow cave; that he has a large tail which extends into the water, and whenever they are going across, but when he wiggles it lively it causes a great tempest. On voyages they are obliged to make, be they long or short, they invoke him in the following manner: 'Thou who art powerful over all winds, favor our voyage and give us calm weather.' This they say while smoking a pipe of tobacco, the smoke of which they blow up into the air. However, before undertaking anything that long voyages they are sure to vow some dogs whom they hang up on some tree or pole. Oftentimes also they vow to the sun or lake, dress skins of elk, hinds or bucks in order to obtain good weather. But in the winter before undertaking a voyage on the ice they invoke for this purpose a certain spirit called by the Algonquins Manempik, to whom they offer the smoke of tobacco, praying him to be propitious and favorable to them on their journey. But this devotion is practiced with considerable carelessness, the little fervor they have then not nearly approaching that which they have at solemn feasts.

"The Nipissings, the Amikouas and all tribes allied to them, assert that the Amikouas, which means Offspring of the Beaver, derived their origin from the carcass of the great beaver, whence came forth the first man of that tribe. They say that this beaver left Lake Huron and arrived at the river called the French River, where when he was beginning to fall he constructed some dams in said river, which are now rapids and portages. When he came to the river which rises in lake Nipissing he crossed over and followed several other rivulets and creeks which he passed. He then came to the river which issues from the Outenuklame, where he went to work again and constructed dams in those places where he did not find any before. These also now are the roads and rapids where a person is obliged to make portages. Having thus spent several years in his voyages he resolved to people the earth and this he performed when he left there, and multiplied wherever he had passed in penetrating the creeks which he had discovered on his way. Finally he arrived below the Calumets, where for the last time he made some dams. Turning back on his tracks he saw that he had formed a beautiful lake, Lake Superior, and there he died. They believe that he is buried north of the lake, towards a place where the mountain resembles the shape of a beaver, and that his tomb is there; and for the reason they call it 'The place where reposes the slain Beaver.' When Indians pass by there they invoke him and blow smoke from their pipes into the air to honor his memory and to beg of him to be favorable to them on the voyage they have to undertake. If a stranger or some poor widow in want, residing near these Amikouas or near some of their family, happened to see a branch corroded by some beaver during the night, animal, an accident of the most trivial character, seen under even ordinary conditions, were at times sufficient to fill him with an awful and overpowering dread. Under such conditions he became uselessly inane and absolutely despicable. Even the most well-meaning and friendly-disposed at such times fell beneath the ban of this unconquerable fear, as many a missionary father could testify. In this regard one writer says: "The Jesuit missionaries among the Indians soon learned that some of the most embarrassing conditions of their residence and some of the most threatening dangers to which they were exposed—thwarting their efforts at conversion and keeping their lives in momentary peril—came from the superstitious suspicion of the natives. Cases of individual disease did not alarm them, but anything like an epidemic, contagious or prevailing malady, they always ascribed to an evil charm. They bent a lowering gaze upon the missionary as he went on his errands of mercy, suspecting him of communicating disease. Often did these zealous fathers, in cunning secrecy, draw the Sign of the Cross on the forehead of the sick infant; for even Baptism came to be dreaded under some circumstances, as if also that were a charm. The darker passions of treachery and revenge, cherished animosities, cunning watchfulness for opportunity to gratify a grudge, and the practice of dissimulation were, of course, as human proclivities, found in their full power among the men of the woods." Here, then, among these people, 'midst squalor, untidiness and filth, nauseated with vile odors and pestered with vermin, the missionaries—men of culture and refinement—endured a painful and horrible existence, in order that the light of Christianity might be shed throughout the world. One of the most formidable features in the way of opposition with which the earliest missionaries met in their endeavor to evangelize the Indians, were the medicine men and magicians, who maintained a powerful sway over the minds and actions of the people. The medicine bag was, in fact, an indispensable belonging, for which every male Indian expressed the greatest reverence and respect. Into this bag or receptacle went a variety of things—watch, clock, compass, bell, drug, or in fact any article which, by reason of its ingenious construction or some other marked peculiarity, led them to believe in its wonderful power for healing; hence it took the place of amulet, fetish or charm, with which the superstitious of other lands were wont to ward off imaginary evils or mete revenge upon a hated foe. Another prominent feature in the character of the Indian was his fearful ferocity,[1] for which, of course, the conditions and surroundings among which he had been reared were largely accountable. With this characteristic were closely intertwined those of the many superstitions upon which his life and actions were almost entirely based. There is, indeed, much to be said in extenuation of his many acts of cruelty, the perpetration of which relegated him in the minds of the majority to a sphere far below that for which the most ordinary specimen of humanity is usually judged. It must be said in his favor, however, that these brutish and ferocious instincts were not aroused to a special point of aggression in their depredations against the whites, for all who fell into their hands suffered alike. Their continuous warfare with neighboring tribes and factions was hardly to be wondered at when we remember the unceasing state of embroilment attained by the peoples of civilized Europe; while the cruelty exhibited by them, when compared with that dealt out by Christian to Christian under the guise of law and authority, promulgated for the good and protection of the people, loses much of its atrociousness.

The cruelty of the Indian had nothing of the selfish or artificial about it, but was inflicted upon his victim with an energy so unhesitating and emphatic as to leave no question whatever as to the motive involved. It was with the instinct rather of the beast, with creature eyes and senses, that he wrought the first one who finds it on the entrance to his tent picks it up and carries it to the master of the feast, who immediately causes a collection of victuals to be made for this poor person, because he is mindful of their ancestors; and the people of that village club together with a good will to make a present to him who has done them the honor of reminding them of their origin (namely that they are descended from the Great Beaver). They do not practice these things among the French, as they ridiculed both them and their superstitions."

On the subject of Indian superstition, Parkman also writes at considerable length, among other things saying: "A belief prevails, vague but perfectly apparent, that men themselves owed their first parentage to beasts, birds or reptiles as bears, wolves, tortoises or cranes; and the names of the totemic clans, borrowed in nearly every case from animals, are the reflection of this idea. This belief occasionally takes a perfectly definite shape. There was a tradition among Northern and Western tribes that men were created from the carcasses of beasts, birds and fishes by Manabozho. The Amikouas, or People of the Beaver, an Algonquin tribe of Lake Huron, claim descent from the carcasses of the great original Beaver or Father of the Beavers. They believe that the rapids and cataracts on the French River and upper Ottawa were caused by dams made by their amphibious ancestors. An Indian hunter was always anxious to propitiate the animals he saw to kill. He has often been known to address a wounded bear in a long harangue of apology (McKinney refers to this in his Tour to the Lakes, in which he mentions the discomposure of a party of Indians when shown a stuffed moose. Thinking that its spirit would be offended at the indignity shown to its remains, they surrounded it, making apologetic speeches and blowing tobacco smoke at it as a propitiary offering). The bones of the beaver were treated with a special tenderness, and carefully kept from the dogs lest the spirit of the dead beaver, or his surviving brethren, should take offense (this superstition was very prevalent, and numerous examples of it occur in old and recent writers from Father le Jeune to Capt. Carver). This solicitude was not confined to animals, but extended to inanimate things. A remarkable example occurred among the Hurons, a people comparatively advanced, who, to propitiate their fishing nets and persuade them to do their office with effect, married them every year to two young girls of the tribe with a ceremony far more formal than that observed in the case of mere human wedlock (this ceremony is frequently alluded to by early writers, who ascribe a similar practice to the Algonquins of the Ottawa as well as the Hurons. It is also referred to in the Relation of 1639 by Lalemant, who gives the time of its annual occurrence as the middle of March. At this ceremony, it was deemed indispensable that the brides should be virgins, so that mere children were chosen. The net was held between them; and its spirit or oki was harangued by one of the chiefs, who exhorted him to do his part in furnishing the tribe with food. Lalemant, moreover, was told that the spirit of the net had on one occasion appeared in human form to the Algonquins, complaining that he had lost his wife, and warning them that unless they could find him another (manifestly immaculate, they would catch no more fish). The fish, too, no less than the nets, must be propitiated; and to this end, they were addressed every evening from the fishing camp by one of the party chosen for that function, who exhorted them to take courage and be caught, assuring them that the utmost respect should be shown to their bones. The harangue took place after the evening meal was made in solemn form; and while it lasted, the whole party except the speaker were required to lie upon their backs, silent and motionless around the fire.

out his existence. By instinct he traced his way through the fathomless forests, knew the seasons, located his quarry, or found or avoided the foe. It must also be remembered that while the Indian's attack upon the enemy was covert and mysterious, his intentions never were. There was no velvety covering to the sinewy and aggressive hand; his hatred was outspoken, defiant and all-enduring; his blood-thirstiness and desire for revenge unquenchable; his patience in following out a purpose inexhaustible. That the lives of so many good and pious men should have been sacrified to the whims of such a people is deplorable indeed; yet not to be wondered at, for the prejudice born of ignorance, was aroused more fully in condemnation by the fiendish exhortations and covert allusions of the medicine men, who saw in the kindly acts and ministrations of the missionary a rivalry which threatened their very existence.

That the Indian was remorseless in his enmity is plainly to be seen in his methods of reprisal. So deep, indeed, was his hatred, that he would even follow his foe beyond the tomb, despoiling him if possible of his privileges in the hereafter, which to the Indian's untutored mind makes torture and even death a welcome boon. The use of the scalping knife and tomahawk, so abhorrent to the civilized mind, then was but a result of inordinate superstition. Thus among other beliefs was one that if a body—be it white or red, friend or foe—be despoiled of the scalp, the soul of the deceased would be forever deprived of entrance to the happy hunting grounds and participation in the many delights to be thus obtained. It was, therefore, their object to maim a fallen enemy, not only that he might be eternally debarred from the privileged future vouchsafed to all good Indians, but that it might be the cause of menace and lasting sorrow to the members of his family. In the art of torture[1] the Indians also proved past-masters, whose ability to search out the most vulnerable and susceptible parts of the body was only equaled by the care and success with which they prolonged the life and agony of their victim. In this particular, however, they showed more than the usual consistency, preparing themselves from earliest infancy to undergo a similar ordeal with fortitude, should they be called upon to do so. Of this Lafitua says: "The heroism is real and is born of a grand and noble courage. That which we admire in the martyrs of the primitive church and which in them was the work of grace and miracle, is nature in the savage and comes from the vigor of their spirit. The Indians seemed to prepare themselves for this from the most tender age. Their children have been observed to press their naked arms against each other and put burning cinders between them, defying each other's fortitude in bearing pain. I myself saw a child of five or six years old, who, having been severely burned by some boiling water accidentally thrown upon it, sang its death song with the most extraordinary constancy every time they dressed the sores, although suffering the most severe pain." "To this," says another writer, "is to be added the profound admiration, as for a consummate virtue, which they have for the tortured warrior whose nerves do not flinch under his agonies, and who raises cheerily the paean of his scornful triumph."

Of the many ingenious devices for tortures invented by the Indians, La Hontan, a voluminous as well as frequent authority, writes at length. One case to which he particularly refers in this connection occurred during the war between the French and Iroquois, which was waged with much brutality on both sides. The incident occurred in the earlier part of 1692, at which time Frontenac, then Governor of Quebec, had sent out a force of one hundred and fifty men under the command of Chevalier Veaucour, with fifty friendly Indians, who in an engagement with a party of sixty of the enemy had killed all but twelve, whom they brought as prisoners to Quebec. Upon their arrival there the Governor at once condemned two of the worst of the prisoners to be burnt alive with a slow fire. A number of the settlers, among them being his wife, expostulated with the Governor in behalf of the prisoners, to all of which, however, he turned a deaf ear, expressing it to be his firm and unalterable conviction that such measures, even though having the appearance of being harsh and extreme, were an absolute necessity in order to both frighten and impress the Iroquois, who had burnt, with but few exceptions, every Frenchman who had fallen into their hands. The Governor's ultimatum having been given, missionaries were at once sent to the doomed men in order that they might be afforded the benefits of religion and be duly prepared for the awful and impending

(1) Of this peculiar feature of Indian education, Carver tells us that captured prisoners are compelled to sing their death song, which generally consists of these or similar sentences—I am going to die, I am about to suffer; but I will bear the severest tortures my enemies can inflict with becoming fortitude. I will die like a brave man and I shall then go to join the chiefs that have suffered on the same account. These songs are continued with necessary intervals until they reach the camp where they are going. Those of the prisoners who are decreed to be put to death by the usual torments are delivered to the chief of the warriors, and such as are to be spared are given into the hands of the chief of the nation. This sentence is irrevocably and for all time settled in the minds of the captives as to their ultimate fate. Those of the captives who were advanced in life and had acquired renown by their warlike deeds were reserved for the fire. This was considered an honorable distinction and could be claimed by none but to whom it by right fell as they were readily to be recognized by marks upon their breasts and arms, which were accepted as undeniable evidences by their captors. These marks were made by breaking the skin with some sharp instrument which had previously been dipped into a kind of ink, which had been made of soot or pitch pine, each one representing some heroic action on the part of the warrior thus decorated. The place of death was generally located in the center of the camp, where, having been stripped, their bodies blackened and the skin of a crow or raven fixed on their heads, they were bound to a stake and compelled to sing their death song for the last time. This song consisted of a recital of their many deeds of bravery and the number of enemies they had destroyed, the language used being of the character evidently intended to irritate and torment their insultors. This is done with a view to arousing them to such a pitch of fury that they are induced to at once dispatch their unhappy victims and thus relieve them of the horrors of a prolonged and terrible death. One instance is given of an Indian who, while undergoing torture, had the audacity to tell his tormentor that they were ignorant old women and did not know how to put prisoners to death, which aroused them to such a pitch of fury that they quickly ended his suffering.

change. But when told that they were to die, they sent away the good fathers and at once began to sing their death song. Of the tragedy which followed La Hontan writes: "Some charitable person having thrown a knife to them in prison, he who had the least courage of the two thrust it into his breast and died of the wound immediately. Some young Hurons of Lorette, between fourteen and fifteen years of age, came to seize the other and carry him away to Cape Diamond, where notice was given to prepare a great pile of wood. He ran to death with a greater unconcernedness than Socrates would have done. During the time of execution he sang continually that he was a warrior, brave and undaunted; that the most cruel kind of death could not shock his courage; that no torments could extort from him any cries; that his companion was a coward for having killed himself through the fear of torment; and lastly, that if he was burnt, he had this comfort that he had treated many French and Hurons after the same manner."

The Indian was ever an eager and passionate gambler,[1] much of his repressed exuberance finding vent in that peculiar and fascinating pastime. But this source of amusement, like many others of his attributes, was carried to such an extent that it became an absolute vice. Once entered upon a game, and should the fortune of the hour go against him, the limit was only reached when nothing was left to him with which to back his opinion. So intense was the passion, in fact, that when driven to desperation, the squaws even were used as merchantable commodities and made the stake. The games resorted to at such times were naturally crude and peculiar, but even then the same principles of alertness, quickness of motion and general deception prevailed, as those which mark the methods applied to all phases of the gambler's art in modern times. Sticks and stones were manipulated with marvelous skill and adroitness, and an intensity of interest pervaded each changing feature as the game progressed. In feats requiring strength, agility and skill, the Indians were also wonderfully versed and perfect. But even in the midst of these, to them enjoyable events, the entire conditions were not in perfect harmony unless some act of cruelty, the magnum opus of the Indian mind, was introduced.

But these kindred amusements were but companions of the sedentary hours spent by the savage among the lodges of his tribe. As the hunting[2] season approached,

(1) Regarding this particular vice, Carver says that the Indians are particularly susceptible to it, in betting their arms, their apparel and in fact everything they possess, but he fortune soever adverse to their interests, be it said in their favor that they neither murmured nor reproached but bore the frowns of fortune with philosophical composure.

Says another authority: "They amused themselves at various sorts of games, but the principal and most esteemed among them is that of the ball, which is not unlike the European game of tennis. The balls they use are rather larger than those made use of at tennis and are formed of a piece of deer-skin; which being moistened to render it supple, is stuffed hard with the hair of the same creature and sewed with its sinews. The ball-sticks are about three feet long, at the end of which there is fixed a kind of racket, somewhat like a fan, but more fashioned of thongs cut from the deerskin. In these they catch the ball and throw it to a great distance, if they are not prevented by some one of the opposite party, who fly to intercept it. This game is generally played by large companies that sometimes consist of more than three hundred; and it is not uncommon for different bands to play a game against each other. They begin by fixing two balls in the ground at about six hundred yards apart and one of these goals belong to each party of the combatants. The ball is turned up high in the center of the ground and in a direct line between the goals, towards which each party endeavors to strike it, and whichever side first causes it to reach their own goal reckons towards the game. They are so exceedingly dexterous in this manly exercise that the ball is usually kept flying in different directions by force of the rackets, without touching the ground during the whole contention. They play with so much vehemence that they frequently wound each other and sometimes a bone is broken."

There is another game also in use among them worthy of remark, and this is the game of the Bowl or Platter. This game is played between two persons only. Each person has six or eight little stones, not unlike the peach stone either in size or appearance, except that they are triangular; two of the sides of which are colored black and the others white. These they throw up into the air from whence they fall into the bowl or platter placed conveniently and made to spin round. Accordingly as these stones present the black or white side upwards, they reckon the game. The winning party keeps his place and the loser yields his to another who is appointed by one of the umpires, for a whole village is sometimes concerned in the party, and at times one band plays against another. During the play the Indians appear to be greatly agitated and at every successful throw set up a hideous shout. They make a thousand contortions, addressing themselves at the same time to the stones and loading with imprecations the evil spirits that assist their successful antagonists. At this game, some will loose their apparel or movables of their cabins and sometimes even their wives. Nevertheless, there is no people in the universe more jealous of the latter than the Indians are.

(2) Of this particular feature of Indian life, Morse writes: "They leave their villages as soon as the harvest, beans, etc., are in, and take care of, and their traders arrived and given out their credit (or their outfits on credit), and go to their wandering grounds; it being previously determined in council on what particular ground each party shall hunt. The old men, women and children embark in canoes, the young men go by land with their horses; upon their arrival, they immediately commence their winter's hunt, which lasts about three months. Their traders follow them and establish themselves at places convenient for collecting their dues and supplying them with such goods as they need. In a favorable season most of these Indians are able not only to pay their traders, supply themselves and family with blankets, strouding, ammunition, etc., during the winter, but to leave considerable of the proceeds of their hunt on hand. The surplus, which generally consists of the most valuable peltries, such as beaver, otter, etc., they take home with them to their villages and dispose of for such articles as they may afterwards find necessary.

As an illustration of the value of such a season's work to the Indians and traders alike, the same writer gives as an illustration the results of a season's hunting the winter of 1819-20, engaged in by the Sauk and Fox Indians. These two nations, he tells us, had at that time five traders, who employed nine clerks and interpreters with annual salaries of from two to twelve hundred dollars each (the average about $400), and forty-three laborers whose pay was from one hundred to two hundred dollars each per annum. These traders, including the peltries received at the United States factory near Ft. Edwards, collected from the Sauk and Fox Indians during the season 980 packs, which consisted as follows: beaver skins, 2,760; otter, 922; raccoon, 13,440; muskrat, 12,900; mink, 500; wild cat, 300; bear skins, 580; deer, 28,800; total, 60,682. The estimated value of the entire amount was $58,800. In addition to this, it may be stated that the quantity of tallow obtained from the deer was 286,809 pounds, while the traders also collected from these same Indians 3,000 pounds of feathers and 1,000 pounds of bees' wax.

Of the same subject Carver also writes most interestingly as follows: "Hunting is the principal occupation of the Indians; they are trained to it from their earliest youth, and it is an exercise which is esteemed no less honorable than necessary towards their sustenance. A dexterous and resolute hunter is held in nearly as great estimation by them as a distinguished warrior. Scarcely any device which the ingenuity of man has discovered for ensnaring or destroying those animals which supply them with food or whose skins are valuable to Europeans is unknown to them.

"Whilst they are engaged in this exercise they shake off the idolence peculiar to their nature, and become active, persevering and indefatigable. They are equally sagacious in finding their prey and in the means they use to destroy it. They discern the foot-steps of the beast they are in pursuit of, though they are scarcely perceivable to every other eye, and can follow them with certainty through the pathless forest.

"The beasts that the Indians hunt both for their flesh, on which they subsist, and for their skins, of which they either make their apparel or barter with the Europeans for necessaries, are the buffalo, the elk, the deer, the bear, the carribou, the beaver, the otter, the fox, the marten, etc. The route they usually take for this purpose, and the parties that usually go on the different expeditions are fixed in their general councils, which are held sometime in the summer when all the operations of the ensuing winter are concluded. The chief warrior, whose province it is to regulate their proceedings on this occasion with great solemnity, issues out an invitation to those who choose to attend him; for the Indians, as before observed, acknowledge no superiority, nor have they any idea of compulsion, and every one is entirely at liberty to prepare himself fasting during several days. The reasons given for those fasts are that it enables them freely to dream, in which dreams they are informed where they shall find game in the greatest plenty of game; and also averts the displeasure of the evil spirits and induces them to be propitious. The fast being ended and the place of hunting made known, the chief who has to conduct them gives a grand feast to those who are to form the different parties, of which none of them dare to partake till they have bathed themselves. At these feasts, notwithstanding that they have fasted so long, they eat with great moderation, and the chief that presides employs himself in rehearsing the feats of those who have been most successful in the business they are about to enter upon. They soon after set out on the march towards the place appointed, painted or rather bedaubed with black, amidst the acclamations of all the people.

"It is impossible to describe their agility or perseverance whilst they are in pursuit of their prey; neither thickets, ditches, torrents, pools or a marked change was to be observed on every hand; the listlessness and apathy of weeks and months were cast aside, while active preparations for the coming event were noticeable everywhere. Scouts were sent out in different directions to note the approach or location of the quarry; weapons were examined with careful solicitude, footgear was made in readiness, while the squaws also prepared to accompany the hunters, in order that they might dress and otherwise care for the flesh of the animals slain. The day preceding the exodus of a hunting party was noted by the observance of certain rights which were supposed to result in many propitious omens. The elders of the party were also wont to resort to their medicine bags for solace, while the younger and untried fretted in undisguised aversion at their enforced restraint. The time having now arrived, the party moved forward, led by those whom previous seasons of experience had wrought into matchless specimens of the hunter's craft. To them the wilderness, with its far-reaching and pathless wastes, was like the reading of an open page. Never for one moment were they at a loss as to the proper course to pursue, and when in haste and the gathering glooms found them still upon the way, the stars gave magic council, which ever led them right. For the hunt all necessary details had been previously arranged, so that it was thoroughly understood by each individual of the party whether a general and concerted rush was to be made upon the game or whether they were to be surrounded and slowly driven by converging lines into a snare or pitfall prepared for the occasion. In this undertaking, too, the utmost precaution was taken by means of a well-regulated system, to prevent any misunderstanding or subsequent disagreement among the hunters. Thus when the number and character of the animals surrounded or given chase to made it desirable to obtain as many as possible, those so badly wounded as to be unable to get away were left unheeded, while the pursuit was continued. The chase ended, each brave returned to his own, his proprietary right being made evident by the character or marking of the weapon used in its destruction. In days prior to the coming of the white man among them, the Indians exerted most scrupulous economy in the disposal of provisions, putting every particle of the animals killed to some good and suitable use. Under the example of the invader, however, this most desirable trait soon became as a lost art, the Indian veritably outrivaling his unworthy preceptors in unnecessary extravagance.

rivers stop them; they always go straight forward in the most direct line they possibly can, and there are few of the savage inhabitants of the woods that they cannot overtake.

"When they hunt for bears, they endeavor to find out their retreats, for during the winter these animals conceal themselves in the hollows of the trees or make themselves holes in the ground, where they continue without food whilst the severe weather lasts.

"When the Indians think that they have arrived at the place where these creatures usually haunt, they form themselves into a circle, according to their practice, and moving onward endeavor, as they advance towards the center, to discover the retreat of their prey. By this means, if any lie in the intermediate neighborhood, they are sure of arousing and bringing them down, either with their bows or their guns. The bears will take to flight at the sight of a man or a dog and will only make resistance when they are extremely hungry or after they are wounded.

"The Indian method of hunting the buffalo is by forming a circle, or a square, nearly in the same manner as when they search for the bear. Having taken their different stations, they set the grass, which at this time is rank and dry, on fire and these animals who are extremely fearful of that element, flying with precipitation before it, great numbers are hemmed in a small compass and scarcely a single one escapes.

"They have different ways of hunting the elk, deer and the carribou. Sometimes they kill them out in the woods to which they retire during the severity of the cold, where they are easily shot from behind the trees. In the great northern climates they take advantage of the weather to destroy the elk; when the sun is strong enough to melt the snow, and the frost in the night forms a hard crust on the surface, this creature, being heavy, breaks it with its forked hoofs, with difficulty extricates himself from it; at this time, therefore, he is soon overtaken and destroyed.

"Some nations have a method of hunting animals which is very easily executed and free from danger. The hunting party divides itself into two bands, and choosing a spot near the borders of some river, one party embarks on board their canoes, whilst the other, forming themselves into a semi-circle on the land, the banks of which reached the shore, let loose their dogs, followed by these means rousing all the game that lies within these bounds; they then drive them towards the river, into which they no sooner enter than the greatest part of them are immediately dispatched by those who remained in the canoes.

"Both the elk and buffalo are very furious when they are wounded, and will turn fiercely on their persistent pursuer and trample them under their feet if the hunter finds he cannot avoid their fury by direction or seeks for security in flight to some adjacent tree. By this method, they are frequently avoided and so tired with the pursuit that they voluntarily give it over.

"But the hunting in which the Indians, particularly those who inhabit the northern parts, chiefly employ themselves and from which they reap the greatest advantage is the beaver hunting. The season for this is throughout the entire winter—from November to April—during which time the fur of these creatures is in the greatest perfection. The hunters make use of several methods to destroy them. Those generally practiced are either that of taking them in snares, cutting through the ice or opening their causeways. As the eyes of these animals are very quick and their hearing exceedingly acute, great precaution is necessary in approaching their abodes, for, as they seldom go far from the water and their houses are always built close to the side of some large river or lake, or dams of their own construction, upon the least alarm they hasten to the deepest part of the water and dive immediately to the bottom. As they do this they make a great noise by beating the water with their tails on purpose to put the whole fraternity on their guard.

"They take them with snares in the following manner: Though the beavers usually lay up a sufficient store of provisions to serve for their sustenance during the winter, they make from time to time excursions to the neighboring woods to procure further supplies of food. The hunters having found out their haunts, place a trap in their way baited with small pieces of bark or young shoots of trees, which the beaver has no sooner laid hold of than a large log of wood falls upon him and breaks his back. His enemies who are upon the watch soon appear and dispatch the helpless animal.

"At cold times, when the ice on the rivers and lakes is about half a foot thick, they make an opening through it with their hatchets to which the beavers will soon hasten on being disturbed at their houses for a supply of fresh air. As their breath occasions considerable motion in the waters, the hunter has sufficient notice of their approach and methods are usually taken for knocking them on the head the moment they appear above the surface.

"When the houses of the beavers happen to be near a rivulet, they are more easily destroyed. The hunters then cut the ice, and separating the net under it break down the cabins of the beavers who never fail to make towards the deepest part, where they are entangled and taken. But they must not be suffered to remain there long as they will soon extricate themselves with their teeth, which are well known to be excessively sharp and strong.

"The Indians take great care to hinder their dogs from touching the bones of beavers. The reasons they give for these precautions are: First, that the bones are excessively hard, that they spoil the teeth of the dog, and secondly, that they are apprehensive that they shall so exasperate the spirits of the beaver by this permission as to render the next hunting season unsuccessful.

"When the Indians destroy buffalo, elk, deer, etc., they generally divide the flesh of such as they have taken among the tribe to which they belong. But in hunting beaver, a few families usually unite and divide the spoil between them. In the first instance, they generally pay some attention in the division to their own families; but no jealousy or murmurings are ever known to arise on account of any apparent partiality.

"Among the Naudowessies, if a person shoots a deer or buffalo and it runs to a considerable distance before it drops, where a person belonging to another tribe being near first sticks a knife into it, the game is considered as the property of the latter, notwithstanding it had been mortally wounded by the former. Though this custom seems to be arbitrary and unjust, yet that people cheerfully submit to it. This decision is, however, very different from that practiced by the Indians on the back of the colonies, where the first person who gives it life is entitled to the best share."

"Of another peculiar device in hunting, Drake gives the following account, which is taken from Mourt's Relations: 'The same month in which the Mayflower brought over the forefathers, November, 1620, to the shores of Plymouth, several of them ranged about the woods nearby, to learn what the country contained. Having wandered from their own, they were apprised in their endeavor to return. They say 'We were shrewdly puzzled and lost our way. As we wandered, we came to a tree where a young spirit was bowed down over the bunch and some acorns strewed underneath. Stephen Hopkins said it had been to catch some deer; so, as we were looking at it, William Bradford being in the rear, when he came looking upon it also, and as he went about it gave a sudden jerk up and he was immediately caught up by the legs. It was a very pretty device, made with a rope of their own making and having the noose as artificially made as any roper in England can make it.'"

gance. These hunting expeditions were periodical occurrence, and on occasion necessitated the undertaking of long and tedious journeys, owing to the character and condition of the game. For instance, the ranges of buffalo, moose, carriboo, mountain sheep, elk or otter were limited at times, while bear, deer and beaver were more general location. On returning, therefore, from one of these expeditions, when the trophies of the chase were numerous and the journey homeward long, the braves would come to the relief of the squaws, assuming a portion of the burden, or would, perhaps, cache what they were unable to carry.

In warfare[1] the Indians maintained an unwritten code of rules which, with the exception of occasions where a general surprise was meditated, regulated the matters of challenge, truce and settlement of tribal disputes.

A raid or expedition once determined upon, an immediate change took place. Runners were sent to neighboring and friendly tribes, councils were held, oratory was resorted to and aggressive alliances were formed. Oratory, especially such occasions, proved a small test of a warrior's standing among his tribe and associates; not indeed that the gift of eloquence was the only requisite but rather that one who had proved by deed his right to a voice in the council that obtained the most respectful hearing of her entire approval of those present. Falsifiers, braggarts and blusterers were of

(1) The following description of an Indian feast and war dance as given by Perrot is taken from Father Verwyst's work on "Missionary Labors," previously referred to: "There are other feasts in use among the Indians in which a certain kind of adoration is practiced in consecrating to the pretended divinity, not only the meats of the feast, but also exhibiting at his feet the contents of a leather bag which they call the "war bag," or in their language 'Pindikosan' (Burago Pindjegasan') which contains the skins of owls, snakes, white birds, parrots, magpies and other very rare animals. They also put into this bag those pieces of herbs to be used as medicine (hence the name medicine bag). Before the feast they always fast without either eating or drinking until they have had a dream. During this fasting, they blacken their face, shoulders and breast with coal; they smoke, however. Some are said to have fasted twelve consecutive days—which seems incredible—others less. If they dream of a divinity residing on or under the ground, they continue to blacken themselves, as has been said, with coal; but if they dream of the Great Hare or of the spirits of the air, they wash themselves and then besmear themselves with black earth; from that very evening they begin the solemnity of the feast.

"The author of the feast invites two companions to assist him at the feast and they have to sing with him in order to propitiate the divinity of which they have dreamt and for which the ceremony is intended. Formerly, when they had no guns, they used to make as many proclamations (public invitations to the feast) as there were large kettles on the fire for boiling the different meats. Then the author of the feast begins to sing with his two assistants who are imbued with certain characteristics of red. This song is solely sung in honor of the divinity of which he dreamed for each creature, animate or inanimate, has its own song and dance which it is to be honored, praised and invoked. They continue singing during that night all those songs that are sung in honor of their imaginary deities until all of the guests have assembled. As the guests being assembled, the feast-giver begins to entone alone the song which belongs to the god of whom he dreamed.

"The feast consists of the meat, as the flesh of a dog is considered as the best and most highly prized of all meats. They had several other kinds of meat, for instance that of the bear, that of some other large animal; if they have none, they supply the deficiency with Indian corn seasoned with fat which they pour upon the plate of each guest. You will take notice that to render this feast solemn, there must be a dog whose head is presented to the principal war chief; the other parts of the animal are distributed among the warriors. When the meat is boiled they take the kettles off the fire and a herald makes public proclamation in the village to let people know that the feast is ready and that now everyone may come. The men are allowed to come with their arms and the old men each with his plate.

"They are not ceremonious as to place, seating promiscuously, without order wherever they like. Strangers are as welcome as the inhabitants of the place, they are even served the first and given the best things of the feast. When everyone is seated at his place, the author of this ceremony, who always remains standing, assisted by his two companions, his wife and children having seated themselves on both sides of him ornamented with their best trinkets, and his two companions armed like himself with a javelin or a quiver of arrows, raises his voice so as to make himself understood by all present, saying that he offers these viands with sacrifice to such a manitou, naming him, and that it is to him he offers them. These are the words I heard: 'I adore and invoke thee that thou mayst be favorable to me in the enterprise I have on hand and that thou mayst have pity on me in the battle, granting me victory over my foes and good spirits, all those who are in the air, on the earth and underneath, that they may preserve me and my party and that we may be able to return after a happy voyage to our country.' Then all present answer in chorus, 'O,' 'O.' These kinds of feasts are generally only gotten up on an occasion of war or some other enterprise against their personal enemies. If a Frenchman happens to be present, they do not fail to invoke bad spirits.' They pretend only to invoke good manitous. The words they use in these invocations are peculiar to themselves, which themselves can understand them. They usually have recourse to those spirits whom they imagine to be the most powerful and who can be more propitious to them than others. They also imagine that they can foretell the accidents that may happen to them on the part of their enemies or other misfortunes if they have omitted these invocations.

"The master of the feast having finished his invocations in the posture above described, with his bow and quiver of arrows, his javelin or dagger, assumes a most furious look, entones his war song and at each syllable that he pronounces makes most horrible contortions of head and body, the most terrible that can be seen. All this is done, however, according to a certain rising and falling inflection of the voice; for both the voice and the body accord at the same instant with the demonstrations of his enmity, which shows that his courage grows stronger more and more, walking always according to the tunes and inflection of his song from one end of the place to the other where the feasting is going on. Thus he goes backward and forward several times, continuing his gesticulations and when he passes before the guests, who are seated on the ground on both sides facing each other, they answer his war song without discord, shouting in one voice 'Ouiy,' 'Ouiy,' from the bottom of their throats. But the most remarkable thing in their inflections occurs when in certain parts of his song he pronounces two or three syllables a great deal faster than the rest; when this occurs all present do the same, answering, 'Ouiy,' quicker, observing the tempo which the cadence requires. This is observed so regularly that out of five hundred assembled not one is found to fail therein.

"All the women, children and in general all in the village who are not invited to the feast put them of themselves in order to be spectators of the solemnity. They lose eating and drinking and often abandon their wigwams, which they thus leave exposed to be plundered by other Indians who are naturally prone to stealing.

"After the master of the feast has got through walking and singing, he assumes the same posture he has practiced. One of his companions now takes his place and enacts the same drama which he saw performed a moment ago, and after he gets through he joins the master of the feast. The other assistant also chants in his turn and after him all the guests, one after another, and they endeavor to outdo one another in assuming most furious appearances. While singing, some filled their plates with hot ashes and burning coals while they threw upon the spectators, each vociferating in chorus with a very strong but slow voice, 'Ouiy.' Others seize burning firebrands and throw them into the air; others again act as if they were going to tomahawk the spectators. These last are obliged to return the affront offered to him whom they fain to strike by making him a present of a tomahawk, knife or some other object of trade valuing only a farthing as have slain or captured an enemy are allowed to act in this manner. These faints signify that it is thus that he slew the enemy. Then it is the turn of the master of the feast to give him notice to address in the company, the latter would tell him before all present that he was a liar, and never capable of slaying anybody, which then would cause him with shame.

"During the singing of these songs, they show themselves haughty, intrepid and ready to overcome all enemies, as if they herself as they were with in the midst of battles where they have been in war. When they stop singing, at certain intervals all present cry out in chorus, 'Ouiy.' After that they continue to chant one after another, each in his turn, sometimes three or four together. When doing so, they station themselves one at each end and one in the middle of the place where the feast is going on; and walking from one end of the cabin to the other they meet without losing a single note of their song, nor changing the contortions of their face and body. Although they sing different songs with different gestures, the guests follow the singers and answer in their turn whenever the dancers pass before them. It must be remarked that each man has his own peculiar song, neither can any one chant his comrade's song without his consent, which affront would draw the blow of the tomahawk on the head of him who had thus sung the war song of another, that being the greatest insult that a person could offer him in an assemblage where he is present. This war song of his cannot be sung even after his death on days of solemnity unless by those of his family who bear his name. On ordinary days, when no feast is being celebrated, it is lawful to sing it in his presence, provided the singer is not seated at the time, and that he knows that the owner of the song pretends to ignore it to be his.

"When all present have chanted, those who have been chosen to wait upon the guests first take the place of the strangers, after they fill and replace the kettles. Then we wait upon their chiefs. When waiting upon the chiefs and the strangers, they give them the best they have at the feast. They deal portions to the others more indiscriminately, without much distinction, all of whom are sitting upon the ground which serves them as a table, and there they hold the plate brought along before them. Spoons are not provided with his own plate; otherwise he would not get his share. Hence, they never fail in this, the Indian being, naturally, too gluttonous to forget on an occasion like this to fill his belly.

"When they have determined to make a general march into their enemy's country or to form small war parties, the leader makes a feast such as has just been described. Those who feel inclined to go with him meet there to be enrolled with him for he would not be accompanied by a single person if he had not first feasted them. The march is conducted according to his orders. As long as it lasts, the leader has his face, shoulders and breast blackened with earth or coal. He is also very careful to chant every morning, when starting, his death song without ever failing in it until he be out of danger or has returned to his village, where he makes again a feast, in case no evil happened him in order to thank the spirit who has been favorable to him on his journey. To this feast are invited the chiefs of the village and those who accompanied him in his enterprise."

little consequence on such occasions, although the word of caution was generally given a considerate, if impatient hearing. The night before their departure the braves devoted to hideous and diabolical performances. Says one writer on this subject: "The painted bedizened and yelling fiends lashed themselves into a fury of passion, with contorted features and writhing gestures, striking their hatchets into the crimson warpost and imitating the laments and shrieks which they intended to draw from a mastered foe. The clatter of drum and rattle is in keeping with their tuneless music. Thus with all the aspect and array of devils they prepared themselves to strike the blow. The aged and feeble, women and children, were left in the lodges to await in dread the return of the braves; never, however, disheartening them, but following them with rallying parting cheers of praise and promise. The warwhoop is a phrase which has had terrific meaning for those who have quailed before its pandemonium fury. True to their proud kinship with the animals, the braves borrow from bears, wolves, owls and the rest, those shriekings and barkings, those howls and yelps, by which they strike a panic through their victims and to paralyze their energies." The return of the party was made equally noticeable with its departure, by the wailings and lamentations or shouts of exultation with which, according to the success or failure of the undertaking, they are greeted.

Occasionally, when prisoners were brought in, those of the tribe who had been bereaved were allowed to adopt[1] one or more in compensation, as it were, for the loss sustained. Those of the less fortunate prisoners, however, were compelled to undergo the ignominy of running the gauntlet and torture at the stake. The means and implements of warfare used by the aborigines for some considerable time after the settlement of the whites on this continent were necessarily crude, consisting of the bow and arrow, spear, tomahawk and scalping knife. The points of the arrows were skillfully formed from stones or bones, and when used in war were in many instances subjected to a coating of poison. Spearheads and tomahawks were also formed of a like material, while the stone-headed warclub, a frightful engine of destruction, was cleverly and securely bound by thongs of hide to a flexible plaited handle. We are told that as early as 1613 the Indians received their first consignment of firearms from the Dutch, an act of treachery, which cost the French and English settlers in Canada and along the Atlantic coast most severely. Becoming accustomed to the more deadly weapons, the Indian naturally enough gained confidence in himself and at the same time lost much of that awesome regard for the invader which a previous inequality in condition had so thoroughly inspired.

War is generally decided upon by the principal chiefs of the town or settlement which has a wrong to right or supposed injury to adjust. For this purpose he raises or lifts the war hatchet or club, but even then the head chief or principal man of the nation may deem it prudent to step in and stop further aggression. If there still remains a difference of opinion, then the warrior goes forth, followed by all who favor his pretensions. It is rarely the case on an occasion of this kind that the town is unanimous, while the entire nation has never been known to be, the division generally being equal. When starting upon the war path, the head warrior generally gives notice as to where he will encamp, being accompanied at the time of his departure by only one or two of his associates. The food supply of the war party is limited, generally consisting of a small quantity of parched corn and jerked meat.

The purpose of this war dance was evidently to arouse within the breasts of the warriors a fitting condition of hatred and passion, without which it was deemed the undertaking would lack many of the most essential qualifications for success. In the dance, however, they worked themselves into a state of mad excitement by continuous dancing, yelling and various contortions of face and body; on these occasions, too, and under circumstances connected with them, every wrong which they had suffered at the hands of their enemies was brought vividly to mind for the purpose, as they put it, "of making the heart strong." To such a degree of animosity is this spirit worked among them that they

(1) When a war party returned to its canton with a number of prisoners a herald was sent throughout the villages or camps to give notice to such as had lost any relatives in the expedition, so that if they so desired they might attend the distribution of prisoners which was about to take place. In arranging for this distribution the preference was generally given to such women who had lost their sons or husbands, and after they had been satisfied the selection from among those remaining was left to others who had suffered losses but in a minor degree, or others who simply desired to adopt an additional member into their family. These divisions are carried on without any dispute or disagreement on the part of those making the selections, who then lead their newly acquired relatives or servants away, and, having unbound them, wash and dress their wounds if they happened to have received any, and clothe them, then serve them with the most comfortable and refreshing food their condition and supplies will allow. Of their subsequent condition Carver gives the following description: "Whilst their new domesters are lamenting they endeavor to administer consolation to them; they tell them that as they are redeemed from death they must now be cheerful and happy, and if they serve them well without murmuring or repining nothing shall be wanting to make them such atonement for the loss of their country and friends as circumstances will allow of.

"If any men are spared they are generally given to the widows who have lost their husbands by the fortune of war, which there be any such. To her, if they happen to prove agreeable, they are soon married. But should the dame be otherwise engaged the life of him who falls to her lot is in great danger, especially if she fancies that her late husband wants a slave in the country of spirits to which he is gone.

"When this is the case a number of young men take the devoted captive to some distance and dispatch him without any ceremony; after he has been spared by the council they consider him of too little consequence to be entitled to the torments allotted to those who have been judged worthy of them.

"The women are usually distributed to the men, from whom they do not fail to meet with a favorable reception. The boys and girls are taken into the families of such as have need of them and are considered as slaves; and it is not uncommon that they are sold in the same capacity to the European traders who come among them.

"The condition of such as are adopted differs not in any one instance from the children of the nation to which they now belong; they assume all the rights of those whose places they supply. Should, however, any of these by chance make their escape and be afterwards retaken they are deemed as unnatural children and ungrateful persons who have deserted and made war upon their parents and benefactors, and are treated with uncommon severity."

finally arrive at a pitch when they become almost demoniacal, and are in a fit condition for the perpetration of the most horrible and revolting crime. As an instance of this, we will quote an incident where, when under a similar state of excitement to that portrayed, a distinguished Dakota warrior shot a barbed arrow into the body of an Ojibway, who was dancing with the Dakotas, intending to join them on the war trail against their enemies. The only excuse offered by the perpetrator at the time when this outrage was committed, was, that he wished to let out the hated Ojibway blood which flowed in the veins of his brother (who was said to be partly of Dakota extraction). Fortunately the shot did not terminate his life, and after a long and painful sickness he at last recovered and removed to the house of one of his Ojibway relatives on Lake Superior, to whom he poured forth the story of his wrongs. So powerfully did this affect them that they raised a war party to march against the encampment of the Dakotas, which was located on Lake St. Croix. While the warriors of this party were in active preparation this Indian returned to his home among the Dakotas and interested them with the description of his visit among his people, and told them that a large party was soon to arrive to smoke the pipe of peace with them. This pleased the Dakotas and set at rest any doubts which might have remained in their minds as to the friendliness of the Ojibway nation towards them. Believing implicitly in the story as told to them by this warrior, they sent out messengers to their different villages, inviting the people to come and stay with them, and assist in the reception of the Ojibway delegation, and take part in the sports and amusements which were generally engaged in on such occasions. So they came in large numbers, encamping on the south shore of Lake St. Croix, and near its outlet into the Mississippi River. Furthermore, the Dakotas, satisfied that the Ojibways were peaceably inclined, continued their hunting expeditions with unusual carelessness, and failed to resort to previous methods always adopted when the presence of an enemy in their country was for a moment suspected.

In the meantime the war party of the Ojibways arrived within a short distance of the Dakota camp; and from this point during the night they sent forth a party of young men who were fluent in the Dakota language to spy upon the encampment of that people. This they accomplished without difficulty, and having satisfied themselves thoroughly upon all necessary points, they returned to their party, informing their leaders that they had counted three hundred lodges. Of the scene which followed we take the following account from the writings of William W. Warren: "At the earliest dawn of morning they marched upon the sleeping encampment of the Dakotas. They made their approach by a deep ravine which led through the high bluffs (which here bound the shores of the lake) on to the narrow prairie which skirts the water side, and on which was pitched the leathern lodges of the enemies. It is said that through the dim twilight the advancing warriors saw a woman step out of the nearest lodge to adjust the door covering, which a sudden gust of the rising east wind had thrown up. She stood as if a sound had caught her ear, and she listened, anxiously looking up the dark ravine when she entered her lodge. She must have heard the measured tread of the advancing warriors, but mistook it for the motion of the rising wind, and the dashing of the waves on the sandy beach.

"Once fairly debouched on the narrow prairie, the Ojibways lost no time in extending their wings and involving the encampment on the land side. When this movement had been completed in perfect silence, they gradually neared the lodges of their sleeping enemies, and as they arrived within the proper distance, and the dogs of the encampment began to snuff the air and utter their short quick yelps, the shrill war-whistle was sounded by the leaders, and suddenly the dread and fear-striking war-whoop issued from the lips of hundreds of blood-thirsty warriors. Volley after volley of bullets and arrows were fired and discharged into the defenseless tepees, and the shrieking and yelling of the inmates as they became thus suddenly started from their sleep, made the uproar of the attack truly deafening.

"Completely taken by surprise, the warriors of the Dakotas fought at a disadvantage; their women and children ran shrieking to the water side, and hastily jumping into their narrow wooden canoes, they attempted to cross to the opposite side of the lake. The wind, however, had increased in force, and sweeping down the lake in a fearful gale, it caused the waves to run high, and in many instances the crowded and cramped canoes filled with water and upset, launching the fleeing women and children into a watery grave.

"After a long and unavailing defense, such of the Dakota warriors as had stood their ground were obliged to retreat. Thirty of their number are said to have fled under a ledge of rock, where, being entirely surrounded, they were shot down one after another."

This is said to have been one of the most successful attacks of that period, it being estimated that over three hundred Dakota scalps fell into the hands of the Ojibways, while even more than that number perished in the waters of the lake. Thus it will be seen from how trivial and unnecessary a cause such terrible results were brought about.

When the young men of a tribe are preparing to go to war, they have a peculiar course of treatment administered to them. They are first of all put into a sweat-house made for the purpose, where they remain for four days, during which period they drink a large quantity of tea made from bitter roots; on the last or fourth day of their incarceration they come out and at once prepare to take the trail. For this they are supplied with a knapsack which consists of an old blanket that contains some parched corn, flour, jerked meat, and leather with which to patch their moccasins. In their shot-bags they carry a charm or protection against all ills, commonly known as war physic or war medicine, and which is composed of the bones of a snake and a wild-cat. The legendary story of this physic is, that a long time ago the wild-cat or panther devoured their people, and they set a trap for him and caught him in it, burned him and preserved his bones. The snake was in the water, and, according to the same story, the old people sang and he showed himself; they sang again, and he showed himself a little out of the water; they sang for the third time, and he showed his horns, one of which they cut off; and when he showed himself for the fourth time they severed the remaining horn. A piece of these horns, then, and the bones of the wild-cat or panther, is regarded as the great war medicine.

According to Carver, Indians begin to bear arms at fifteen years of age, and unless absolutely disabled, continue in active service, as it were, until sixty, when they lay them aside. This range of service, however, possibly only pertains to the more northerly tribes, as we have it from some authority that the warriors of the southern nations are considered exempt from military service when fifty years of age. In every band or nation or community, there is always to be found a select number of so-called warriors or fighting men, who are prepared on every emergency to take the field, or act in defense of the towns or settlements. To these the use of the bow and arrow, tomahawk, knife, war-clubs, or firearms were the weapons of offense and defense, the more modern of such, however, being limited to those tribes located nearest to the settlements.

But one exception to this general condition was to be found, and that in the tribes who lived in the far West, inhabiting the country extending down to the South Sea, who, always attacking their enemies on horseback, carried but one weapon, a stone of medium size and curiously wrought, which they fastened to a string about a yard and a half long; this string in turn was fastened to their right arms a little above the elbow. These stones they carried in their hands, until, approaching close to the enemy, they begun swinging them with great rapidity, using them so dexterously as to cause much havoc and discomfort among those thus attacked. So expert in fact were these people with this engine of warfare, and so swift the speed of their horses, that it but rarely occurred that people of other tribes who invaded their country ever returned to tell of their experience among them. There was in fact but one hope for any who attempted such invasion, and that was to locate some morass or thicket, to which, if pursued, they could quickly retire; otherwise they were certain to be cut off.

The majority of Indians, however, prior to the use of firearms among them, resorted to the use of the bow and arrow and short clubs; the latter were made of a very hard quality of wood, the head being fashioned like a ball and about three and a half inches in diameter. In this part of the club was deftly fixed a piece of steel or flint with a keen edge, which acted admirably in the capacity of a tomahawk. The dagger used at this time, and especially by the Naudowessie nation (to whom Carver particularly refers), was originally made of flint or bone, although in after years it was formed of steel. This dagger was about ten inches in length, the part of the blade nearest to the handle being three inches wide; both edges were kept exceedingly keen, the blade tapering gradually to a sharp point. This dagger was generally worn in a sheath made of deer's leather, which was nearly always ornamented, and was hung by a string, so that the handle rested close to the breast. This weapon, by the way, was not in common use, being as a general thing worn by a few of the principal chiefs, who rather adopted it as much for ornamental purposes as for its usefulness as a weapon. As to the motives for war discovered among the Indians, they were found to be similar in many particulars to those prevailing among the people of more civilized nations. In this respect, however, Carver expresses it as his belief that the reasons given by the former were as a general thing more rational and just, than those advanced by Europeans, which were based largely upon vindictiveness and a desire for personal or national aggrandizement. In support of this position he says:

"The extension of empire is seldom a motive with these people who invade and commit depredations on the territories of those who happen to dwell near to them. To secure the rights of hunting within particular limits; to maintain the liberty of passing through their accustomed tracks, and to guard those lands which they consider from a long tenure as their own against any infringement, are the general causes of those dissensions that so often break out among the Indian nations and which are carried on with so much animosity. Though strangers to the idea of separate property, yet the most uncultivated among them are well acquainted with the rights of their community to the domains they possess, and oppose with vigor every encroachment on them.

"Notwithstanding it is generally supposed that, from their territories being so extensive, the boundaries of them cannot be ascertained, yet I am well assured that the limit of each nation in the interior parts are laid down in their rude plans with great precision. By theirs, as I have before observed, was I enabled to regulate my own; and after the most exact observation and inquiries, found very few instances in which they erred.

"But," continues this authority, "interest is not often the most frequent or most powerful incentive to their making war on each other. The passion of revenge, which is a distinguishing characteristic of these people, is the most general motive. Injuries are felt by them with exquisite sensibility, and vengeance pursued with unremitted ardor. To this may be added that natural excitation which every Indian becomes sensible to as soon as he approaches the age of manhood, to give proofs of his valor and prowess.

"As they are early possessed with the notion that war ought to be the chief business of their lives, that there is nothing more desirous than the reputation of being a great warrior, and that the scalps of their enemies and a number of prisoners are alone to be esteemed valuable, it is not to be wondered at that the younger Indians are continually restless and uneasy if their ardor is repressed and they are kept in a state of inactivity. Either of these propensities, the desire of revenge or the gratification of an impulse that by degrees becomes habitual to them, is sufficient frequently to induce them to commit hostilities on some of the neighboring nations.

"When the chiefs find any occasion for making the war, they endeavor to arouse these habitudes, and by that means soon excite their warriors to take arms. To this purpose they make use of their martial eloquence nearly in the following words, which never fails to prove effectual: 'The bones of our deceased countrymen lie uncovered; they call out to us to revenge their wrongs, and we must satisfy their request. Their spirits cry out against us; they must be appeased. The genii who are the guardians of our honor, inspire us with a resolution to seek the enemies of our murdered brethren. Let us go and devour those by whom they are slain. Sit, therefore, no longer inactive; give way to the impulses of your natural valor; anoint your hair; paint your faces; fill your quivers; cause the forests to resound with your songs; console the spirits of the dead, and tell them that they shall be revenged.'"

Animated by these exhortations, the warriors snatch their arms in a transport of fury, sing the song of war, and burn with impatience to imbrue their hands in the blood of their enemies. Sometimes private chiefs assemble small parties and make excursions against those with whom they are at war, or such as have injured them. A single warrior, prompted by revenge or a desire to show his prowess, will march unattended several hundred miles to surprise and cut off a straggling party. Those irregular sallies, however, are not always approved of by the elder chief, though they are often obliged to connive at them. But when a war is national and undertaken by the community, their deliberations are formal and slow. The leaders assemble in council to which all the head warriors and young men are admitted, where they deliver their opinions in solemn speeches, weighing with maturity the nature of the enterprise they are about to engage in, and balancing with great sagacity the difficulties or inconveniences that will arise from it. Their priests are also consulted on the subject, and even sometimes the advice of the intelligent of their women is asked. If the determination be for war, they proceed for it with much ceremony. The chief warrior of a nation does not on all occasions head the war party himself; he frequently deputes a warrior of whose valor and prudence he has a good opinion. The person thus fixed on, being first bedaubed with black, observes a feast of several days, during which he invokes the Great Spirit or deprecates the anger of the evil ones, holding whilst it lasts no converse with any of his tribe. He is particularly careful at the same time to observe his dreams, for on these do they suppose will their success in a great measure depend; and from the firm persuasion every Indian actuated with his own presumptuous thoughts is impressed that he shall march forth to certain victory. These are generally favorable to his wishes. After he has fasted as long as custom prescribes, he assembles the warriors, and holding a belt of wampum in his hand, thus addresses them:

"Brothers! by the inspiration of the Great Spirit I now speak unto you, and by him am I prompted to carry into execution the intentions which I am about to disclose to you. The blood of our deceased brothers is not yet wiped away; their bodies are not yet covered, and I am going to perform this duty to them." Having, then, made known to them all the motives that induce him to take up arms against the nation with whom they are to engage, he thus proceeds: "I have, therefore, resolved to march through the war path to surprise them. We will eat their flesh[1] and drink their blood; we will take scalps and make prisoners; and should we perish in this glorious enterprise, we shall not be forever hid in the dust, for this belt shall be a recompense to him who buries the dead." Having said this, he lays the belt on the ground, and he who takes it up declares himself his lieutenant, and is considered as the second in command; this, however, is only done by some distinguished warrior who has a right by the number of his scalps to the post.

The chief is now washed from his sable covering, anointed with bear's fat and painted with their red paint in such figures as will make him appear most terrible to his enemies. He then sings the war song and enumerates his warlike actions. Having done this, he fixes his eyes on the sun and pays his adorations to the Great Spirit, in which he is accompanied by all the warriors. This ceremony is followed with dances, the whole concluding with a feast[1] of dogs' flesh, reference to which has already been made.

There are also many other peculiar features connected with this feast with which the historian treats at length, and many heresies on the part of the people which are thoroughly and interestingly explained. Thus, for instance, we learn that with a view to inducing warriors to expose themselves more freely to danger, by promising that any wounds received by them would be promptly treated and expeditiously cured, the priests or medicine men of the tribe, who are also their doctors, prepare a special efficacious medicine for that purpose.

Accompanying this undertaking there is more than the usual amount of ceremony, during which they collect various roots and plants to which they pretend to impart extraordinary powers of healing. Aside from this, however, it must in all fairness be said that, although presumingly pretentious in their claims, these men had a remarkable knowledge of many plants and herbs, the application of which to different diseases they most thoroughly understood.

But to return to the subject of war and the Indian. For their manner of making arrangements for such, we will again refer to the authority already extensively quoted: "From the time the resolution of engaging in a war is taken to the departure of the warriors, the nights are spent in festivity, and their days in making the needful preparations. If it is thought necessary by the nation going to war to solicit the alliance of any neighboring tribe, they fix upon one of their chiefs who speaks the language of that people well and who is a good orator, and send by him a belt of wampum on which is specified the purport of the embassy in figures that every nation is well acquainted with. At the same time he carries with him a hatchet painted red.

"As soon as he reaches the camp or village to which he is destined, he acquaints the chief of this tribe with the general tenor of his commission, who immediately assembles the council, to which the ambassador is invited. There, having laid the hatchet on the ground, he holds the belt in his hand and enters more minutely into the occasion of his embassy. In his speech he invites them to take up the hatchet, and as soon as he has finished speaking, delivers the belts.

"If his hearers are inclined to become auxiliaries to his nation, the chief steps forward and takes up the hatchet, and they immediately espouse with great spirit the cause they have thus engaged to support. But, if on this application neither the belt nor the hatchet are accepted, the emissary concludes that the people whose assistance he solicits have already entered into an alliance with the foes of his nation, and returns with speed to inform his countrymen of his ill success.

"The manner in which the Indians declare war against each other, is by sending a slave with a hatchet, the handle of which is painted red, to the nation which they intend to break with; and the messenger, notwithstanding the danger to which he is exposed from the sudden fury of those whom he thus sets at defiance, executes his commission with great fidelity.

"Sometimes this token of defiance has such an instantaneous effect on those to whom it is presented, that in the first transport of their fury a small party will issue forth without waiting for the permission of the older chiefs, and, slaying the first of the offending nation they meet, cut open the body, and stick a hatchet of the same kind as they have just received into the heart of their slaughtered foe. Among the more remote tribes this is done with an arrow or spear, the end of which is painted red. And the more to exasperate, they dismember the body to show that they esteem them not as men, but as old women."

As a general thing, when departing upon a venture of this character, the Indians prefer to go in small parties, thus avoiding the necessity of extra exertion which would necessarily be required to provide subsistence for so large a number of people during their prolonged and tedious journeys either by land or water. They also travel in what in modern days would be considered as ill marching order, carrying only the most necessary baggage or provisions. In fact, the sum total of a warrior's equipment consists of his weapons and a mat, whilst he relies upon maintaining himself in food by the game he kills or the fish he catches while en route.

We have more than once referred to instances of great want of precaution on the part of the Indians when advancing into the country of a foe, but it must in justice be said that these were exceptions; for, as a rule, when near or supposedly near to an enemy, they are most cautious. Passing through a country, however, where they have no reason for apprehension, they are extremely lax in this particular, their force being scattered over a broad extent of territory in search of game, and each party consisting of a very limited number. However, no matter how far the distance may be over which they travel on such occasions, the rendezvous is sure to be kept with business-like promptness, unless for some extraordinary or very substantial reason. While on a raid, it is a general custom among the Indians to locate their camp and pitch their tents before sunset. Here, perhaps, as much as anywhere, they exhibit a considerable want of judgment, as they take but little precaution to guard against surprise. Some allowance, of course, must be made for this owing to the peculiar superstitious belief which governs their actions, for they have an implicit confidence in their manitous or household[1] gods which they carry with them, and which they believe endowed with a power of protection far superior to that which human watchfulness could assure.

(1) As stated in a previous description, this feast is held in the tent or dwelling of the chief warrior, who in spite of the fact of his long and enforced fast, refrains from eating and sits down opposite with his pipe in his mouth, recounting the valorous deeds of his family.

When an Indian war party arrives at a point of danger, these conditions are materially changed. Now the games are abandoned, loudness in conversation and jubilant shouts are hushed and camp fires extinguished. Instruction or information is conveyed from one to the other by means of signs, while with the caution and noiseless motion of a wild beast they glide from point to point, closing in upon surrounding, or avoiding the foe at will. As a rule the Indian makes his attack at break of day, at which time the foe is supposed to be enjoying the soundest sleep. Everything is arranged for hours before the advance is made; so that it is often the case that the attacking party lie flat upon their faces throughout the entire night, and in that position approach still farther until within a bow-shot of those they are about to destroy. Then at a concerted signal given by the chief warrior, they give vent to a series of blood-curdling yells, and discharging a cloud of arrows upon their defenseless and unsuspecting foes, rush in upon them with knife and tomahawk and consummate the slaughter.

This is the Indians' most improved mode of procedure, the chief deserving the most praise and consideration at their hands being he who can devise a plan whereby a surprise and attack may be accomplished and the most foes slain with the least loss to the attacking party. They, therefore, look with an entire lack of approbation on any system requiring the attack of an enemy in the open field, and this kind of warfare they at all times, if possible, avoid. So, too, upon arriving near the enemies' settlement, if they find him on guard and more strongly entrenched, and superior in numbers than anticipated, they at once, if possible, retire, no matter how long the distance they may have traveled to accomplish his destruction. Their motto then is, "surprise and destroy," the success of which has been unhappily demonstrated on far too numerous occasions to those who were unacquainted with that peculiar style of warfare[2].

Of their adeptness in surprising, Carver says: "Though the Indians are negligent in guarding against surprises, they are alert and dexterous in surprising their enemies. To their caution and perseverance in stealing on the party they design to take, they add that admirable talent, or rather industrious qualification, of tracing out those they are in pursuit of. On the smoothest grass or the hardest earth, and even on the very stones, they will discover traces of an enemy, and by the shape of the footsteps and the distance between the prints distinguish, not only whether it is a man or a woman who has passed that way, but even the nation to which they belong. When they have overcome an enemy and victory is no longer doubtful, the conquerors first dispatch all such as they think they shall not be able to carry off without great trouble; and they endeavor to take as many prisoners as possible; after this they return to scalp those who are either dead or too much wounded to be taken with them. At this business they are exceedingly expert. They seize the head of the disabled or dead enemy, and placing one of their feet on the neck, twist their left hand in the hair; by this means having extended the skin that covers the top of the head, they draw out their scalping knives, which are always kept in good order for this cruel purpose, and with a few dexterous strokes take off the part that is termed the scalp. They are so expeditious in doing this that the whole time required scarcely exceeds a minute. These they preserve as monuments of their prowess, and at the same time as proofs of the vengeance they have inflicted on their enemies.

"If two Indians seize in the same instance a prisoner, and seem to have an equal claim, the contest between them is soon decided; for to put a speedy end to any dispute that might arise, the person who is apprehensive he shall lose his expected reward, immediately has recourse to his tomahawk or war-club, and knocks on the head the unhappy cause of their contention."

Should an Indian war party, after having accomplished their purpose, discover that they are being pursued by a dangerously large body of the enemy, they will

(1) The manitous or gods referred to and which are termed Wakons by the Naudowessies, consist of otter and marten skins, for which they exhibit extraordinary veneration.

(2) When the Indians succeed in their silent approaches and are able to force the camp which they attack, a scene of horror that exceeds description ensues. The savage fierceness of the conquerors and the desperation of the conquered, who well know what they have to expect should they fall into the hands of their enemies, occasion the most extraordinary exertions on both sides. The figure of the combatants all besmeared with black and red paint and covered with the blood of the slain, their horrid yells and ungovernable fury, are not to be conceived by those who have never crossed the Atlantic.—Carver.

use every means within their knowledge for distracting his attention, or drawing him away from the immediate route which they are following. In endeavoring to do this, they will sometimes scatter leaves or sand or dust over the prints made by their feet; will follow closely and evenly in one another's foot-steps, or at times lift their feet so high and tread so lightly as to leave no mark at all. If, however, they find all these precautions and efforts on their part to be unavailing, and the proximity of the pursuing enemy becoming dangerously near, they kill and scalp all of the prisoners they have with them, and then, dividing into small parties, separate, and attempt by different routes to regain their own country. Of course, when the pursuers arrive at the spot where this final atrocity has been accomplished, they pause and generally return, feeling that further pursuit would be unavailing, while fully aware of the fact that even then it would be impossible for them to recover those of their family or friends whose release they had desired to obtain. But even in event of not being followed, the successful war party returns to its own country with as much rapidity as possible, and for that purpose, should a number of them have been severely or dangerously wounded, they are borne on litters roughly improvised from branches of trees; or, should it be in the winter time, they are drawn on sledges. These latter consist of two small thin boards about a foot wide when joined together, and are nearly six feet in length. No matter how heavily loaded, these sleds are of easy draft, being drawn by a string[1] which passes around the breast.

During the return march prisoners are carefully guarded, while at night time, as a matter of extra precaution, they are stretched along the ground quite naked, with their legs, arms and neck fastened securely to hooks or stakes. As an extra precaution, cords attached to their persons are also held by an Indian, who in consequence awakens at the least motion made by them.[2]

(1) Called metump, and is used pretty generally throughout America; in many places they are made of elaborately wrought.

(2) There have been instances where in spite of such precaution prisoners have been enabled to make their escape. One of these given at length by Carver is as follows: "Notwithstanding such precautions are usually taken by the Indians it is recorded in the annals of New England that one of the weaker sex, almost alone and unassisted, found means to elude the vigilance of a party of warriors, and not only to make her escape from them but to revenge the cause of her countrymen. Some years ago a small band of Canadian Indians consisting of ten warriors attended by two of their wives, made an irruption into the back settlements of New England. They located for some time in the vicinity of one of the most exterior towns, and at length having killed and scalped several people, found means to take prisoner a woman who had with her a son of about twelve years of age. Being satisfied with the execution they had done, they retreated towards their native country, which lay at three hundred miles distance, and carried off with them their two captives.

"The second night of their retreat the woman whose name, if I mistake not, was Rowe, formed a resolution worthy of the most intrepid hero. She thought she should be able to get from her hands the manacles by which they were confined, and determined if she did so to make a desperate recovery of her freedom. To this purpose when she concluded that her conquerors were in their soundest sleep, she strove to slip the cords from her hands. In this she succeeded and, cautioning her son whom they had suffered to go unbound, in a whisper against being surprised at what she was about to do, she moved to a distance with great wariness the defensive weapons of the Indians which lay by their side.

"Having done this she put one of the tomahawks into the hands of the boy, bidding him to follow her example, and taking another herself, fell upon the sleeping Indians, several of whom she instantly dispatched. But her attempt was nearly frustrated by the imbecility of her son, who wanting both strength and resolution, made a feeble stroke at one of them which only served to awaken him: she, however, sprang at the rising warrior and before he could recover his arms made him sink under the weight of her tomahawk; and this she alternately did to all the rest excepting one of the women who awoke in time and made her escape.

"The heroine then took off the scalps of her vanquished enemies, and seizing also those they were carrying away with them as proofs of their success, she returned in triumph to the town from whence she had so lately been dragged to the great astonishment of her neighbors, who could scarcely credit their senses or the testimonies she bore of her amazonian intrepidity."

(3) A peculiarity regarding this custom is to be noticed in the fact that even a warrior who has been taken prisoner and received into the house of grace by his captors, should he escape and return to his people, would neither be received nor acknowledged by them.

The Indians had but one idea regarding their enemies, that being, if possible, their absolute extirpation, so that such a subject as the exchange of prisoners never entered into their minds. There were, in fact, no half-way measures indulged in in the treatment of prisoners, who were in either one way or another put to death, adopted[3] by the tribe who had captured them as an equal and brother, or made slaves of.

In the treatment of wounds, the Indians have proved exceedingly skillful and are able, we are told, by use of certain simples, to extricate splinters, iron or any sort of matter without making incision. The skin of the snake, which that reptile sheds annually, is also used by them to extract splinters. As a general thing, the Indians are remarkably healthy, being subject to very few diseases, a majority of which are brought about by the fatigues which they endure in war or hunting, and the inclemency of the seasons, to which they are more or less exposed. The greatest of all causes, however, for indisposition on their part is that of gluttony; as a result of long and continuous fasting, they are troubled with pains and weaknesses in the stomach. They are also considerably addicted to pleurisy, as a remedy for which they apply a peculiar system of sweating. "The manners," says Carver, "in which they construct their stoves is as follows: they fix several small poles into the ground, the top of which they twist together so as to form a rotunda; this frame they cover with skins or blankets, and they lay them on with so much nicety that the air is kept from entering through any crevice, a small space being only left, just sufficient to creep in at, which is immediately afterwards closed. In the middle of this confined building they place red-hot stones, on which they pour water until steam arises that produces a great degree of heat.

"This causes an instantaneous perspiration, which they increase as they please. Having continued in it for some time, they immediately hasten to the nearest stream and plunge into the water, and after bathing therein for about half a minute, they put on their clothes, sit down and smoke with great composure, thoroughly persuaded that the remedy will prove efficacious. They often make use of this method to refresh themselves or to prepare their minds for the management of any business that requires uncommon deliberation and sagacity." The Indians are always subject to dropsy and paralytic complaints, although only in rare instances. For all such ailments, including fevers, they are liberal in the use of lotions and concoctions made of herbs, with the uses and purposes of which the medicine men are most thoroughly acquainted. But aside from the admitted value of the medicine, there are other courses to pursue in a case of sickness which are deemed equally essential by the patient and his friends. These consist of a number of superstitious ceremonies, which are followed out with the greatest precision and attention to detail. The Indians can never be convinced that one is ill as long as he has any craving for food whatever, but as soon as he refuses food they become alarmed and immediately take measures to treat the case as a dangerous one. The duties of these Indian doctors are multifarious, they being not only regarded as actual and unquestionable authorities on all kinds of diseases and proper remedies for such, but they are also believed to be able, by means of such ceremonies as those referred to, to gain intelligence from the spirits regarding the cause of the complaints, thus still better enabling them to administer intelligently any case which may be brought to them. Cases are also quite numerous where patients believe themselves to be under the influence of witchcraft. In such instances the physician is always consulted. Then, of course, follow a lot of mummeries and incantations, with which the patient is suitably impressed. Notwithstanding these and the many other foolish measures adopted by these medicine men with which to impress their constituents, it seems to have been the opinion of more than one who has traveled among them and studied their peculiarities and characteristics that the actual exercise of their art is due to a well-grounded knowledge of the materials available as well as to an extensive experience in the treatment of similar cases.[1]

Peace,[2] we are told by Morse, is determined on and concluded by the head chief and his counselors, and "peace-talks" are always addressed to them. In some cases, when the resentment of the warriors runs high, the chief and his counselors have been greatly embarrassed.

Most of the wars carried on amongst the Indians, we have been given to understand, are hereditary, the original feud, as it were, having been handed down from generation to generation, and so steadfast did the parties on both sides become to the principles involved that even when it became necessary to arrange for peace both were exceedingly careful to avoid any appearance of having made the first advance. It is also a noticeable fact that no matter how much a chieftain may desire for such an arrangement, nor how badly his people are in need of it, he will, in discussing the matter with the enemy, lose no opportunity of forcing upon their notice the fact that it is to their, and not his interest that suitable arrangements for ending the conflict should be completed. Once in a while, Carver tells us, incidents have contributed to bring about a peace understanding between nations that otherwise could not be prevailed on to listen to such terms, and as an instance of this he quotes the following: "About eighty years ago the Iroquois and Chippewas, two powerful nations, were at war with the Ottagaumies and Saukies, who were much inferior to their adversaries, both in number and strength. One winter nearly one thousand of the former made an excursion from Lake Ontario by way of Toronto toward the territories of their enemies. They coasted Lake Huron on its east and northern borders until they arrived at the island of St. Joseph, which is situated in the straits of Ste. Marie. There they crossed the straits upon the ice about fifteen miles below the Falls, and continued their route still westward. As the ground was covered with snow, to prevent a discovery of their numbers, they marched in single file, treading in each others' foot-steps. Four Chippewa Indians passing that way observed this army and readily guessed, from the direction of their march and the precaution they took, both the country to which they were hastening and their designs.

"Notwithstanding the nation to which they belonged was at war with the Ottagaumies and in alliance with their invaders, yet from a principle which cannot be accounted for they took an instant resolution to apprise the former of their danger. To this purpose they hastened away with their usual celerity, and taking a circuit to avoid discovery, arrived at the hunting grounds of the Ottagaumies before so large a body moving in so cautious a manner could do. There they found a party of about four hundred warriors, some of which were Saukies, whom they informed of the approach of their enemy.

"The chiefs immediately collected their whole force, and held a council on the steps that were to be taken for their defense. As they were encumbered with their families, it was impossible that they could retreat in time; they therefore determined to choose the most advantageous spot, and to give the Iroquois the best reception in their power.

"Not far from the place where they then happened to

(1) Carver gives numerous incidents which satisfactorily illustrate the ability of the Indians to reason with much acuteness on the causes and symptoms of many of the disorders which are attendant on human nature, and their ability to apply with equal judgment proper remedies.

(2) Wiauswah, a wise and celebrated chieftain of the Ojibways, tried long and patiently to bring about a lasting peace between his people and those of their hereditary foes, the Dakotas. His friends, we are told, were so far successful as to put an end by distinct treaty to the custom of torturing captives, which was still practiced by the Dakotas in the early part of the eighteenth century. And we are told that from the time that he effected this mutual understanding with his enemies this bad practice ceased altogether and the taking of captives became less frequent.

be there were two small lakes, between which ran a narrow neck of land about a mile in length and only from twenty to forty yards in breadth. Concluding that the Iroquois intended to pass through this defile, the united bands divided their little party into two bodies of two hundred each. One of these took post at the extremity of the pass which lay nearest to their hunting grounds, which they immediately fortified with a breastwork formed of palisades, whilst the other took a compass round one of the lakes with the design to hem their enemies in when they had entered the defile.

"Their stratagem succeeded, for no sooner had the whole of the Iroquois entered the pass than, being provided with wood for the purpose, they formed a similar breastwork on the other extremity, and thus enclosed their enemies.

"The Iroquois soon perceived their situation and immediately held a council on the measures that were necessary to be pursued to extricate themselves. Unluckily for them, a thaw had just taken place which had so far dissolved the ice as to render it impassable and yet there still remained sufficient to prevent them from either passing over the lakes on rafts or from swimming across. In this dilemma it was agreed that they should force one of the breastworks, but they soon found them too well defended to effect their purpose.

"Notwithstanding this disappointment, with the usual composure and unapprehensiveness of the Indians, they amused themselves three or four days in fishing. By this time, the ice being quite dissolved, they made themselves rafts which they were enabled to do by some trees which fortunately grew on the spot and attempted to cross one of the lakes. They accordingly set out before daybreak, but the Ottagaumies, who had been watchful of their motions, perceiving their designs, detached one hundred and fifty men from each of their parties to oppose their landing. These three hundred marched so expeditiously to the other side of the lake that they reached it before their opponents had gained the shore, they being retarded by their poles sticking in the mud. As soon as the confederates arrived, they poured in a very heavy fire both from the bows and musketry on the Iroquois, which greatly disconcerted them; the latter, finding their situation desperate, leaped into the water and fought through the enemies. This, however, they could not do without losing half their men. After the Iroquois had landed, they made good their retreat, but were obliged to leave their enemies masters of the field, and in possession of all the furs they had taken during their winter's hunt. Thus dearly did they pay for the unprovoked excursion to such a distance from the route they ought to have pursued, but to which they were only impelled by a sudden desire of cutting off some of their ancient enemies; but, had they known their strength, they might have destroyed every man of the party that opposed them, which even at the first onset was only inconsiderable and when diminished by the action totally unable to make any stand against them.

"The victorious bands rewarded the Chippewas who had been the means of their success with a share of the spoils. They pressed them to take any quantity they chose of the richest of the furs and sent them under an escort of fifty men to their own country. The disinterested Chippewas, as the Indians in general are seldom actuated by mercenary motives, for a considerable time refused these presents, but were at length persuaded to accept them. The brave and well-concerted resistance here made by the Ottagaumies and Saukies, aided by the mediation of the Chippewas, who, laying aside on this occasion the animosity they had so long borne those people, approved of the generous conduct of their four chiefs were altogether the means of effecting a reconciliation between these nations and in process of time united them all in the bands of amity."

When a peace has been arranged for, a number of chiefs of one of the parties, together with others interested in the result, set out for the country of the enemy. As a rule, these men are consulted for their own ability and great integrity. As an emblem of their office, they bear with them the Pipe of Peace, which is always treated with the greatest respect and veneration. In fact, the instance is unknown wherein bearers of this sacred badge of friendship were treated disrespectfully or their rights violated. It is, in fact, a well-grounded belief among the Indians that the Great Spirit would never suffer an infraction of this kind to go unpunished. The Pipe of Peace, also called the Calumet, is about four feet in length, the bowl being made of red marble and the stem of a light kind of wood covered with curiously painted hieroglyphics in various colors and adorned with the plumage of the most beautiful birds. Each nation has its Peace Pipe, which is differently decorated from that of others, but every nation is well aware of such peculiarities and differences, and readily recognizes from its appearance the people from whom the offering comes. The Peace Pipe, having arrived at the encampment of the enemy and a council meeting having been gathered, one of those accompanying the chief of the visitors fills the pipe with tobacco mixed with special kinds of herbs, being exceedingly careful at the same time that no part of it touches the ground. When the pipe has been properly filled, he then takes a coal that is thoroughly kindled from a fire, which is generally kept burning in the center of the council and places it upon the tobacco. As soon as ignition has been properly performed, he removes the coal and then turns the stem of the pipe first towards the heaven and then to the earth, after which, holding it horizontally, he, while standing in the center, performs a revolution which enables him to face every party seated within the circle. In making the first of these movements, he is supposed to present the pipe to the great spirit in supplication of his aid. By the second he endeavors or hopes to ward off any malicious designs or interposition on part of the evil spirit and by the third to gain the assistance and friendship of those spirits who are supposed to inhabit the air, earth and waters. Having thus propitiated all parties concerned, he presents the pipe to the hereditary chief, who, having taken two or three whiffs, blows the smoke from his mouth, first towards the heavens and then about him towards the ground. Thence it is passed to the ambassadors, the chief of the warriors and to all other chieftains according to their grade, each of whom observes the same ceremony as he to whom the pipe was first given. During this entire ceremony the pipe remains in the hands of the official who filled it, none other being allowed to touch it excepting with his lips. There are other ceremonies connected with the duties of an ambassador sent upon such a mission as this, most of which are of an interesting nature. One is in the form of a song and dance, which is performed by those entrusted with the duty, upon arriving at a point near to the town or camp they are about to visit. These songs and dances are made as appropriate as possible to the occasion, being intended to impress those who witness them with the friendly intent of their visitors, and a desire for a mutual understanding. It also acts as an announcement to the people of the arrival of their visitors, and enables them to come forward and proffer the hospitalities of their town to the visitors. A council meeting immediately follows the arrival of such delegation, after which, if the understanding has been mutually agreeable, the painted or war hatchet is buried in the ground as a memorial that all animosities are over between the two nations. On this occasion also a belt[1] of wampum is presented to the hereditary chief of the tribe as a further evidence and ratification of the peace between them. This belt, which is covered by hieroglyphics worked in beads, is also of value as a record for the use and information of posterity.

(1) These belts are made of shells found on the coasts of New England and Virginia, which are sawed out into beads of oblong form, about a quarter of an inch long and round like other beads. Being strung on leather strings and several of them sewed neatly together with fine and sinewy threads, they then compose what is called a belt of wampum. The shells are generally of two colors, some white and the others violet; but the latter are more highly esteemed than the former. They are held in as much estimation by the Indians as gold, silver or precious stones are by the Europeans.

The belts are composed of ten to twelve or a greater number of strings, according to the importance of the affair in agitation, or the dignity of the person to whom it is presented. On more trifling occasions strings of these beads are presented by the chiefs to each other and frequently worn by them about their necks as a valuable ornament.—Carver.

A Minnesota Historical Collection gives the account of the peace dance held at Ft. Snelling on May 20, 1829. There were on this occasion, says this record, about one hundred relatives of the four Sioux who had been delivered in 1827 to be executed by the Ojibways. An uncooked dog was hung upon the stake and each dancer came up and took a bite. Seven days afterwards twenty-two bark canoes, filled with Ojibways from Sandy Lake, Gull Lake and Rum River, arrived and on Sunday, the last day of May, the Sioux and Ojibways danced together before Agent Taliaferro's house. Then the Sioux crossed the river and danced before the Ojibway lodges, and to return the compliment, next day the Ojibways went to Black Dogs, a Sioux village four miles above the fort on the Munday River, and danced. An agreement was then made that they would hunt in peace on the prairies above the Sauk River.

In his reports to the Secretary of War in 1822, Mr. Morse, who had spent a considerable portion of the summer of 1820 among the Indians under a commission held from the President of the United States, says that the belief of the Indians relative to their creation was not unlike that of civilized nations. In illustration of this he refers to the case of Masco, a chief among the Sauks, who informed him that his people believed that the Great Spirit in the first place created from the dust of the earth two men; but finding that these alone would not answer his purpose, he took from each man a rib, and made two women; from these four, he says, sprung all red men. The locality in which this incident is believed to have transpired, was known as Moneac or Montreal. The Sauks also believe that the Indians were all of one nation with them until they behaved so badly that the Great Spirit came among them and talked different languages to them, which caused them to separate and form different nations.

As regards their beliefs of the future[1] state, another has been quoted as saying that his people believed that as soon as an Indian left this world he commenced his journey towards the habitation provided for him by the Great Spirit, which those who behaved themselves well in this life found with but little difficulty. On the other hand, he asserted that those whose mortal existence had been marked by bad behavior were sure to meet with unusual difficulties in searching for this new habitation; they were constantly getting into the wrong road; the paths they followed were difficult of travel and exceedingly crooked and misleading, while they frequently came upon broad and dangerous ravines, through which they had to pass in order to continue their journey. Thus were they punished for the evils done in the flesh, until at last satisfied with the penance which had been put upon them the Great Spirit directed them into the proper path, by means of which they soon reached their friends and future dwelling.

(1) They expect to be translated to a delightful country where they shall always have a clear, unclouded sky and enjoy a perpetual spring; where the forests will abound with game and the lakes with fish which might be taken without requiring the painful exertion of skill or of laborious pursuit; where, in short, they shall live forever in regions of plenty, and enjoy every gratification they delight in here, in a greater degree.

Here they found a plentitude of all kinds of game, while, when not pursuing their favorite pastime of hunting, they had nothing to do but to dance and sleep. It was also the belief of those people that when young children died they did not at once enter into a realization of all of these satisfactory conditions. Another belief of the Indians, Mr. Morse tells us, was that there were two Great Spirits which were brothers and equally good; that one of them died and went to another world, and has ever since been with Mach-i Man-i-to, the evil spirit; that this spirit has a son who makes prisoners of all the children that die too young to find the good path, and takes them to his own town, where they were formerly deprived by him of their brains in order that when they grew up they might not have sense enough to leave him; that the good spirit, seeing this, sent an eagle to pick a hole in the head of every young child as soon as he dies and makes its appearance in the other world, and to deprive each of its brains and conceal the same in the ground; that the child is always immediately afterwards taken a prisoner by the evil spirit, and kept until a suitable age to travel, when the eagle returns its brains, and then, it having sense enough, immediately leaves the bad spirit and finds the good road. Most of the Indians interviewed by Mr. Morse on this subject told him that their deceased friends appeared occasionally to them in the shape of birds[1] and different kinds of beasts.

Of pagan notions in regard to the immortality of the soul, Perrot in his memoir gives the following account: "All pagan Indians believe in the immortality of the soul. They maintain that the soul, after leaving the body, goes to a beautiful prairie country, where there is neither heat nor cold, and where the atmosphere is agreeably temperate. They say that country is full of animals and birds of all kinds and varieties. Hunters there never find themselves exposed to hunger, as they can slay and eat whatever animal they like. They assure us that this beautiful country is very far away on the other side of the earth. Hence they place provisions and arms on the graves of the dead, for they believe that the departed will find in the other world for their use all that has been given them in this, especially for the voyage they have to make.

"They believe moreover, that as soon as the soul has left the body it enters this charming country, and having traveled several days, it meets on its way[2] a rapid river, over which there is but a small stick to cross over. When walking over this thin stick, it bends so much that the soul is in danger of falling into the water and being carried away by the current. They maintain that, should this accident unhappily occur, it would get drowned, and that all these dangers are at an end when once she has entered the land of the dead. These also believe that the souls of young people of both sexes have nothing to fear, as they are vigorous and strong. But it is not the same with those of the old and of children when not assisted at this dangerous passage by other souls; this is oftentimes the reason why they perish.

"They also say that this same river is full of fish beyond imagination. Sturgeon and other fish abound there, which they kill with their hatchets and clubs in order to roast them on their voyage, for after leaving the river they no longer meet with game. After having traveled for quite a long time, they come to a very steep mountain which obstructs their passage and obliges them to seek another elsewhere. However, they find none, and after having suffered a great deal they come at last to that terrible passage where two pestles of prodigious size, rising and falling in turns, form a great difficulty which it is hard to surmount; for should the soul be unhappily caught beneath, that is, when one of the pestles is just falling, it would surely be killed; but the disembodied spirit watches most carefully for the lucky moment (when one of the pestles goes up) to slip through this so dangerous place. Yet many get caught and perish, especially the souls of old people and children, as they are less strong and vigorous, and rather slow when trying to get through.

"Once through this dangerous passage, they enter a charming country where excellent fruits are found in abundance. The ground is covered with all kinds of flowers, the odor of which is so wonderful that it enchants the heart and charms the imagination. There is now but a short distance to make, so as to arrive at the place where the noise of the drum and gourd, keeping time to the songs and shouts of the dead at their entertainment (dance), makes itself agreeably heard. This stimulates them to run most eagerly directly towards the place where the sound of the happy multitude proceeds. The nearer they come, the louder the noise becomes, and the delight and joy to which the dancers give expression by continual shouts, ravish the

(1) In regard to this subject some Indians observed that the spirit of a certain Indian who was burned the day before appeared near his grave in the shape of a turkey, and that the noise he made was distinctly heard throughout the night.

(2) The road to the "happy hunting grounds of the dead" is called Ke-wa-kun-ah, "Homeward road," also Che-ba-kun-ah, "Ghost road." The soul travels till she comes to a deep, rapid stream, over which lies the much dreaded Ko-go-gaup-o-gun, or rolling and sinking bridge; once safely over this, as the traveler looks back it assumes the shape of a huge serpent swimming, twisting and untwisting its folds across the stream.—Verwyst.

newcomers more and more. When they are near the place where the dancing is going on a certain number of the dead leave their fellow-dancers and go to welcome them, and manifest the great pleasure their arrival causes to the whole company. They are then conducted to the place where the dancing is going on, where they are kindly received by all those present. They find there meats of all tastes, and without number. Nothing more exquisite or better prepared can be imagined. They can eat whatever they like and pleases their appetite. When they get through, they mingle with the rest to dance and enjoy themselves forever, without being any longer subject to grief, inquietude, infirmities, or any of the vicissitudes of mortal life.

"This is the belief of the Indians in regard to the immortality of the soul. It is a dream, a chimera of the most ridiculous things that can be invented, but they cling to this belief with so great obstinacy that, when a person wants to convince them of its ridiculous absurdity, they tell the European who speaks to them about these things, that we have a particular country for our dead (and they another for theirs). Having been created by spirits who lived in harmony with one another, and who were mutual friends, they (i. e. the spirits or manitous that created the pale-faces) had chosen in the other world a different country from theirs (that is of the departed Indians, each race having a heaven for itself). They say that it is an indubitable truth, and one they have learned from their ancestors, that they once went to war into a country so far away that they came at last to the extreme end of the earth. They then passed the place where the large pestles keep going up and down, as I have described above, at the entrance of the beautiful land of the dead. Having passed through this, they heard at a little distance the beating of the drum and the sound of the gourds, and, curiosity having impelled them to go on a little farther to see what was going on, they were discovered by the dead, who then came towards them. They tried to flee, but were soon overtaken and conducted to the cabins of these inhabitants of the other world, where they were well received. The dead then escorted them as far as the passage of the pestles, which they stopped so as to enable them to pass through without danger (into the land of the living). Taking leave of them, they told their living countrymen never to come back there again till after death, for fear some misfortune might happen to them."

Of Indian feasts[1] we learn from Carver that even at the time of his journeyings among them many of the nations neither made nor used bread, salt, nor spices, while not a few of them had never tasted any. In regard to this, he mentions the Naudowessies particularly, whom he said had no bread nor any substitute for it. These people, however, were greatly addicted to the use of wild rice, which grew in large quantities in different parts of their country, boiling and eating it by itself, and without using anything in the way of a relish. They were also strongly addicted to the flesh of animals slain by them in the chase, which they also devoured without the assistance of any dishes of another nature. Large quantities of sugar which they extracted from the maple trees were also eaten in a manner similar to that in which they disposed of their other foods, that is, entirely by itself. Of the use of milk they had not the slightest idea, for, as Carver relates, although they might collect great quantities from the buffalo or elk, they only considered it as proper for the nutriment of the young of those beasts during their tender state.

"One dish, however," this authority goes on to say, "which answers nearly the same purpose as bread, is in use among the Ottagaumies, the Saukies and the more

(1) Of the feasts and fasts of the Indians, William Warren also speaks at length in his interesting history of the Ojibways, the customs observed by whom undoubtedly pertained to a greater or lesser extent among the other nations. Speaking of the beliefs of these people he says: "It is true that they believe in a multiplicity of spirits which pervade all nature, yet all these are subordinate to the one Great Spirit of good." "This belief," says Mr. Warren, "is as natural as the belief of the Catholics in their interceding saints, which in some respects it resembles: for in the same light as the intercessor between him and the Great Spirit does the more simple red man regard the spirits which in his imagination pervade all creation. The never-failing rigid fasts of first manhood, when they seek in their dreams for a guardian spirit, illustrates this belief most forcibly."

As regards their fastings he refers to instances of persons who, while enduring the pangs of almost superhuman fast, have been gladdened by a vision of the Great Spirit in their dreams. In such instances he invariably appears to the dreamer in the shape of a beautifully and strongly formed man, and it is a confirmed belief amongst them that he or she who has once been blessed with this vision is fated to live to a good old age and in enjoyment of ease and plenty.

All other minor or guardian spirits the whole they know in their first dream of fasting appear to them in the shape of quadrupeds, birds or some inanimate objects in nature, as the moon, the stars or the imaginary thunders, and even this dream or spirit is never mentioned without sacrifice. The dream itself which has appeared to the faster guides in a great degree his future career in life, and he never relates it without offering a sacrificial feast to the spirit of the dream. The bones of the animal which he offers are carefully gathered unbroken, tied together, and either hung on a tree, thrown into deep water, or carefully burned. Their beliefs and rites connected with these fasts and dreams are of great importance to themselves, more so than has been generally understood by writers. The grand rite of Me-da-we-win or grand medicine and the beliefs incorporated therein are not yet fully understood by the whites. This rite, Mr. Warren assures us, is still shrouded in the greatest mystery, for while an entrance into the lodge itself while ceremonies were being enacted has sometimes been granted through courtesy, it by no means enables onlookers to become thoroughly initiated in the mysteries of the creed. Among the Ojibways the secrets of this particular rite have been guarded sacredly, a breach of confidence being followed by swift and uncompromising reprisal. Many writers have witnessed this ceremony have formed the opinion that it was foolish and unmeaning. This, Mr. Warren says, is absolutely wrong, as in the Me-da-we rite is incorporated most that is ancient among the songs and traditions that have descended, not orally but in hieroglyphics, for at least a long line of generations. In this rite is also perpetuated the purest and most ancient idioms of their language. The rites of the Me-da-we-win, a strict observance of which was supposed to secure life in this and a future world and to conciliate the lesser spirits who people earth, sky and water, was practiced in the earlier days in its purest and most original form. Every person who had been initiated into the secrets of this most mysterious society from the first to the third degree was imperatively obliged to be present on every occasion when these grand ceremonies were solemnized. This created nearly a national gathering, and the bonds which united one member to another were stronger than exist at the present day. (1880-85).

Each village has assumed unstated periods to perform the ceremonies of initiation, while at a large village a large wigwam was permanently erected in the midst of their great town, which they designated as the Me-da-we-gun, wherein the rites of their religion were performed. Though probably rude in its structure and not lasting in its materials, yet was it the temple of a numerous tribe, and so sacredly was it considered that even to this day in their religious phraseology the island on which it stood is known by the name of Me-da-we-gun.

In those days their native and primitive manners and usages were rigidly conformed with. Man or woman never passed the age of puberty without severe and protracted fasts in which they sought communion with some particular guardian spirit whom they considered in the light of a medium spirit between them and the "One Great Master of Life," towards whom they felt too deep a veneration than to dare to commune with directly. Sacrificial feasts were made with the first fruit of the field and the chase.

eastern nations, where Indian corn grows, which is not only esteemed by them, but it is reckoned extremely palatable by all the Europeans who enter their dominions. This is composed of their unripe corn as before described, and beans in the same state boiled with bears' flesh, the fat of which moistens the pulse and renders it beyond comparison delicious. They call this food succatosh."

Careful investigation shows beyond doubt that a majority of the food used by these people was either boiled or roasted and then to a condition far beyond that which is at present known as being rare or underdone. They were also very fond of the broth in which these meats were cooked, which they drank in large quantities. The meats for which the Indians showed a particular preference were those of the beaver, buffalo, elk, deer, the bear and raccoon, all of which were prepared in a manner as mentioned. Whenever possible, however, the flesh of the deer and bear were eaten together, as the dryness of the former was largely amended by the large amount of juice and fat peculiar to bears' flesh. There is also a shrub, the name of which is not forthcoming, to which the Indians are very partial in the spring of the year.

Morse, in his official journeyings among the Indians (1820-1822), says that they have two sacrifices in each year; the most notable of these events is celebrated during the month of August, the exact date being fixed by the head chief and councillors of the town. They are guided in this decision according to the state of the affairs of the town and the forwardness of the corn crop, and it is consequently later or earlier as the matter may be. This is designated by the title of the "green corn dance" or "the ceremony of thanksgiving for the fruits of the earth." The feast lasts from four to twelve days, and in its direction and general surroundings resembles to a certain extent a large camp meeting. To this feast the Indians come from all quarters, bringing with them their families, tents, and provisions, and encamping near the council house or house of worship. The animals killed for this particular occasion are neatly and carefully cleaned, the heads, horns and entrails being suspended on a large white pole with a forked top which extends over the roof of the house. He describes further procedure on the part of the Indians as follows:

"The women having prepared the new corn and provisions for the feast, the men take, first, some of the new corn, rub it between their hands, then on their faces and breasts; and they feast, the great chief having first addressed the crowd, thanking the Great Spirit for the return of the season, and giving such moral instruction to the people as he thinks proper for the time. On these occasions the Indians are dressed in their best manner, and the whole nation attend, from the greatest to the smallest. The quantity of provisions collected is immense, everyone bringing in proportion to his ability. The whole is cast into one pile, and distributed during the continuance of the feast among the multitude by the leaders appointed for that purpose. In former times the festival was held in the highest veneration, and was a general amnesty, which not only absolved the Indians from all punishment for crimes, murder only excepted, but seemed to bury guilt itself in oblivion."

Of the festal and feasting season, the historian Parkman speaks as one of idleness and leisure for men and women. It was the period of feasting, gambling, smoking and dancing, which amusements engaged the passing hours. According to the writings of Morse and his extensive investigation concerning the subject, all of the Indian tribes residing east of the Rocky Mountains believe in the existence of a Supreme Being, the creator of the world, whom they called Kitch-e-mon-e-too[1] or the Great Spirit, and to him they ascribed every perfection. He was believed to be the author of everything that was good, and so benevolent as never to inflict any evil upon his creatures. This spirit was worshiped but little, although occasional supplications were made to him for success in their more important undertakings. Sacrifices to this deity were still less frequent, but when offered consisted of some part of the property owned by those performing that duty. There was also a Bad Spirit which they believed in, by name Much-e-mon-e-too, to whom they ascribed all of the evils to which mankind is exposed. This deity they held in extraordinary fear, and as a consequence offered many costly sacrifices to propitiate him. These sacrifices were quite frequent, as in the estimation of the Indian, he was an actively aggressive god, spending a great portion of his time in plotting against the peace and safety of mankind.

In addition to these two principal objects of veneration and dread, the Indians also believed in a large number of good and bad spirits, superior in power and intellect to the ordinary man, and who inhabited the different elements surrounding them. These spirits, they believed, presided over the destinies of nature in general, in their hands being the guidance and direction and absolute control of lakes, rivers, mountains, caverns, beasts, birds, fishes, vegetables and stones, as a result of which each of these was looked upon and treated with more or less veneration.

At the feasts[2] pertaining to the two principal deities,

(1) Ke-che-mun-e-do.—Warren.

(2) From Parkman, however, we learn that there were other feasts given to the Great Spirit, sometimes by a single person, but oftener in companies. On such occasions as these they generally repaired to the lodge where the feast was to be made, and, having shut themselves up, began beating the drum, shaking the Che-che-qum-a gourd shell with a handful of corn in it—singing and smoking. This performance was kept up from twelve to eighteen hours, during which time the feast and which in the particular instances referred to were held each spring (sometimes at other seasons of the year), many impressive ceremonies were observed. Here the celebrants danced, sung, howled, and in fact made every conceivable noise in order that they might appease the anger of the Bad Spirit, and thus prevent him from doing them any harm. On this occasion, likewise, they deposited a large amount of valuable property, consisting of guns, kettles, bows, arrows, etc., as a sacrifice to Mich-e-me; but to the Great Spirit[3] they simply addressed their prayers. For forty-eight hours previous to this ceremony, which was always made by the chief of the band, that official observed an absolute fast.

Another religious ceremony among the Indians of which the same author speaks, is observed by the Pottawattomies in the naming of their children, the ceremony[4] generally being performed when the child is about a month old. This he describes as follows: The parents of the child invite some old and respected man to their lodge in the evening, and inform him that they wish him to name their child on the day following. The old man then engages two or more young men to come to the lodge early in the next morning to prepare the feast; this feast must be cooked by young men, in a lodge by themselves; no other person is permitted to enter till it is ready for the guests, who are then, and not before, invited. After the feast is over, the old man rises and informs the company of the design of their meeting, and gives the child its name, which he follows with a long speech in substance as follows: He expresses hope that the Great Spirit will preserve the life of the child, make him a good hunter and a successful warrior.

Of the religion of the Indians, Carver writes at some considerable length, stating as his belief, however, that it is difficult to obtain a thorough knowledge of the religious principles of these people, owing to the ridicule which had been put upon their ceremonies by Europeans, which had led them to conceal many of the most pertinent and most interesting facts. He concurs with other writers in their emphatic avowal of a belief in a Supreme Being or giver of life, which he tells us the Chippewas call Manitou or Kitchi-Manitou and the Naudowessies, Wakon or Tongawakon, the Great Spirit, and look upon him as the source of all good from whom no evil can proceed. He also tells of the Bad Spirit, to whom they ascribe great power, and suppose that through his means all the evils which befall mankind are inflicted. He also speaks of the lesser spirits, but gives it as his opinion that the ideas the Indians annex to the word "spirit" are very different from the conceptions more enlightened nations entertain of it. They appear, in fact, he says, to fashion to themselves corporeal representations of their gods, and believe them to be of a human form, though of a nature more excellent than man.

Of a similar character are their beliefs regarding futurity. Their faith in a future state is absolute, and in connection with this they have also imbibed the somewhat comforting assurance that their employments there will be similar to those engaged in while on earth, relieved, however, of all labor and difficulty which pertains to them when here.

In the earliest stages of their acquaintance with the Indians, the whites found them living in a state of polygamy, which was regulated to a great extent by the position and wealth of the party and his consequent ability to maintain a more extensive establishment. At the time that Carver first came amongst them, he discovered this condition, the privileges of which the chiefs enjoyed particularly; each one having a seraglio consisting of an uncertain number, there usually, however, being from six to fourteen. Those of lower rank, while not limited as to the number of wives they were permitted to take, were guided altogether by their ability to maintain them. Carver further tells us that it was not an uncommon thing for an Indian to marry two sisters, while when it happened that there were more he would take all of them. In these families the utmost harmony is said to have prevailed, the younger wives being submissive to the elder ones, whilst those without children uncomplainingly performed the menial offices of the household. The Indian nations, we are told, differ but little from each other in their marriage ceremonies, and even less in the manner of their divorces. One instance, perhaps, will suffice to illustrate this, and for that purpose we select the custom adopted by tribes living along the borders of Canada or within that territory. Among these people, Carver tells us, when a young Indian has fixed his inclinations on one of the other sex, he endeavors to gain her consent, and if he succeeds it is never was in course of preparation. Everything being fully prepared, the invitations were then sent forth, the same consisting of a small stick or reed. Upon the arrival of the guests, they seated themselves in a circle on the ground in the middle of the lodge, and the feast was at once begun. Each man having eaten his proportion, the bones were carefully collected and put into a wooden bowl, and afterwards thrown into the river or burned. One requisite of this ceremony was that the entire feast must be eaten; so if one failed to dispose of his share, he passed his dish with a piece of tobacco to his neighbor, who immediately proceeded to finish it for him. A peculiar feature about this rite was to be observed in the fact that those who gave the feast did not partake of it themselves, giving as a reason that they donated their part to the Great Spirit. The ceremony was concluded by leaving a quantity of consecrated tobacco, which they afterwards returned and buried.

(3) Some Indian sages have said that the Great Spirit from the earth originally made three different races of men—the white, the black, and the red race. To the first he gave a book denoting wisdom; to the second a hoe, denoting servitude and labor; to the third or red race he gave the bow and arrow, denoting the hunter state. To his red children the Great Spirit gave a great island on which the whites have found them; but because of having committed some great wickedness and angered their Maker they are doomed to disappear before the rapid tread and advance of the wiser and more favored pale-face.

The absolute truthfulness of the foregoing is to be taken with some allowance, as prior to their coming among them they could have no possible knowledge of the existence of a white or black race, nor of their characteristic symbols, the book and the hoe.

(4) With the Sauks, Foxes and Kickapoos this ceremony is not always regarded; they, however, in common with the Chippewas, Ottawas and Pottawattomies, have a great number of feasts. They all make a feast of the first deer, bear, elk or buffalo killed by a young man; and even the first small bird that a boy kills is preserved and makes a part of the next feast.—Morse.

known that her parents have obstructed their union. When every preliminary is agreed upon and the day appointed, the friends and acquaintances of both parties assemble at the house or tent of the oldest relation of the bridegroom, where a feast is prepared for the occasion. Sometimes the company meeting at these gatherings are numerous, all of them engaging in dances,[1] songs and other means of diversion usually resorted to on the occasion of public rejoicings.

When these have finished, all those who attended merely out of ceremony depart and the bridegroom and bride are left alone with three or four of the nearest and oldest relations of either side, those of the bridegroom being men, those of the bride women. Presently the bride, attended by these few, having withdrawn herself for the purpose, appears at one of the doors of the house and is led to the bridegroom, who stands ready to receive her. Having now taken their station on a mat placed in the center of the room, they lay hold of the extremity of the wand, about four feet long, by which they continue separated, whilst the old men pronounce some short harangues suitable to the occasion. The married couple after this make a public declaration of the love and regard they entertain for each other, and, still holding the rod between them, dance and sing. When they have finished this part of the ceremony they break the rod into as many pieces as there are witnesses present, who each take a piece and preserve it with great care. The bride is then reconducted out of the door at which she entered, where her young companions await to attend her to her father's house; there the bridegroom is obliged to seek her, and the marriage is consummated. Carver tells of another ceremony, that of the Naudowessies, which is not only singular in itself but has the additional interest of being entirely different from that used by any other nation that he met with during his travels among them. In this instance, when one of the young men of this tribe has fixed on a young woman he approves of, he makes known his desire to her parents, who give him an invitation to come and live with them in their tent. He, of course, accepts the offer, and in so doing ratifies an agreement to remain with them for a period of one year, during which time he is to act in the capacity of servant to them. During this time he hunts, bringing all of the game killed by him in such excursions to the family, and by this means demonstrates to the father of the girl his ability to support a wife and the family that may come in consequence of that union. This peculiar arrangement, however, pertains only to young men when seeking their first wife, and is not repeated on later occasions. The period of probation having expired, the marriage is then solemnized after the custom of the country, three or four of the male relations of the bridegroom, and as many of the bride's, accompanying the couple from their respective tents to an open part in the center of the camp.

Here the chiefs and warriors of the tribe have been assembled to receive them, a party of the latter being drawn up in two ranks on either side of the bride and bridegroom as soon as they have arrived at that point. The assemblage is then addressed by the principal chief, who announces to them the purpose of this meeting, and further states that the couple then standing before them, mentioning the names of each, have come voluntarily to avow in this public manner their intentions of living together as man and wife. He then enquires of the young couple, alternately, whether they desire that the union might take place, and, they having made an affirmative reply in an audible voice, the warriors present fix their arrows and discharge a flight of them over the heads of the married pair, which done, the chief pronounces them man and wife. The bridegroom then turns around, and, bending his body, takes his wife on his back, in which manner he carries her amidst the acclamations of the spectators to his tent. This ceremony is always succeeded by as bountiful a feast as the personal resources of the man can afford, the entire proceedings being followed by songs and dances. In his memoirs, Perrot describes the marriage ceremony as follows: "There are some Indian tribes where people marry to live together until death, and there are others where the married separate whenever they like."[1]

(1) Dancing is a favorite pastime among the Indians, and it is rarely, if ever, that they meet on any public occasion but that this exercise becomes a part of the ceremony or entertainment. At home, too, among their lodges, when not engaged in the sterner pursuits of the hunt or war, the young of both sexes apply themselves vigorously to this amusement on almost every evening. Of their method and manner of dancing on festal occasions, Carver tells us that in these as well as all other dances, every man rises in turn and moves about with great freedom and boldness, singing, as he does so, the exploits of his ancestors. During this time, the company, who are seated upon the ground in the circle around the dancer join with him in marking the cadence by an odd tone which they utter together and which sounds: "Heh, heh, heh." These sounds or notes are articulated with a harsh accent and strained at with the utmost force of their lungs, so that one must imagine their strength must soon be exhausted by it, instead of which they repeat it with the same violence during the whole of their entertainment. The women, particularly those of the Western nations, dance very gracefully; they carry themselves erect and with their arms hanging down close to their sides move first a few yards to the right and then back again to the left. This movement they perform without taking any steps as the European would do, but, with their feet conjoined, moving by turns their toes and heels. In this manner, they glide with great agility to a certain distance and then return, and let those who join in the dance be ever so numerous, they keep time so exactly with each other that no interruption ensues. During these, at stated periods, they mingle their shrill voices with the hoarser ones of the men who sit around (for it is to be observed that the sexes never intermix in the same dances), which, with the music of the drums and chichicoues make an agreeable harmony. The Indians have several kinds of dances, which they use on different occasions, as the Pipe or Calumet (a) Dance, the War Dance, the Marriage Dance and the Dance of the Sacrifice. The movements in every one of these are dissimilar, but it is almost impossible to convey any idea of the points in which they are unlike.

(a) Calumet.

(1) Of this, Father Chrysostom Verwyst says that, as far as his knowledge extends, he is not aware of any particular marriage-ceremony among our pagan Chippewas. They simply come and live together for life or as long as they can agree. They have very loose notions in regard to matrimony, and for very slight reasons part and marry somebody else. Polygamy is very rare, but divorce and adulterous marriages are frequent. They marry without much consideration and readily abandon one another. Even among the Christians, the standard of morality is very low in many places, especially where they come in frequent contact with the irreligious, the impure and materialistic civilization of this country. Invalid marriages are nine cases out of ten the cause of apostasy on the part of the Christian Indians.

The Iroquois, the Loups (Mohikans, Mohegans) and some other tribes follow the last-named custom; but the Ottawas (Outaouas) marry to live with their wives all their life unless a very strong reason causes the husband to repudiate his wife. For without such a reason the husband would be exposed to the danger of being plundered by his wife and of suffering a thousand indignities at her hands; for the woman whom he abandoned to marry another would put herself at the head of her relatives and take from him what he had with him and what could be found in his lodge; she might pull his hair and scratch his face, and, in one word, there is no indignity or affront which she could not heap upon him and which she would not be justified in inflicting upon him, and that without his being able to prevent her, unless he would be willing to become the scorn of the village. In case such a husband does not marry somebody else, the woman who is deserted may plunder him when returning from a chase or traffic, leaving him but his arms, and even these she at last takes from him, should he still refuse to return to her. But if he would prove that she was unfaithful to him before, or even after leaving her, he can marry someone else without her being able to complain of it. The wife on her part cannot leave her husband, because he is her master, as he has bought and paid for her. Even her folks cannot take her away from him, and if she leaves him custom authorizes him to kill her without hindrance. This has many a time caused war between families who are determined to uphold the right of the husband (in slaying his wife) when she would not consent to return to him.

The Iroquois, the Loups and some other tribes do not act like the Ottawas towards their wives; still there are some who never part and who during life love each other solely. But a far greater number, especially the young, marry to leave one another whenever they think proper. They will each take a woman during a voyage of hunting or of trafficking and divide with her one-half of the profits they have made. A man can even make a bargain with a woman as to what he will give her for the time he intends to keep her with the understanding that she is to be faithful to him; after having made the voyage, she can leave him again. Still there are some to be found who mutually love each other and who always remain united, especially such as have had children together, which children, according to Indian custom, belong to the mother, as they always live with her —the males until they are able to get married, and the girls until their mother's death. Should the father of a family abandon his wife, the children he had by her, when grown up, would treat him with contempt and heap reproaches upon him for having abandoned them in their infancy, having left to their mother the care and trouble of raising them.

In some tribes there are laws pertaining to marriage, which emphatically denounce and absolutely prevent a union of certain parties. Instances of this kind are quoted by Mr. Warren, who explains the objection by furnishing as an illustration the totemic reason for such objections among the Ojibways. This is better told in his own language, which is as follows: "The Algics (from whom the Ojibways originated) as a body are divided into several families or clans, each of which is known and perpetuated by a symbol of some bird, animal, fish or reptile, which they denominate the totem or Do-diam (as the Ojibways pronounce it), and which is equivalent in some respects to the coat-of-arms of the European nobility.

"Totems descend invariably in the male line and intermarriages never take place between persons of the same symbol or family, even should they belong to different and distinct tribes, as they consider one another related by the closest ties of blood and call one another by the nearest terms of consanguinity." To break this rule is to commit one of the greatest sins known to the Ojibways' code of moral laws, and tradition has it that in earlier days a breach of this kind was punishable with death.

Morse, who writes of the marriage custom existing during the earlier years of the present century, says: "A man who wants a wife never applies in person; he sends his sister, mother or some other female to the female relations of the woman he names. They consult the brothers and uncles on the maternal side, and sometimes the father, but that is only a compliment, as his approbation or resistance is of no avail. If the party applied to approve the match, they answer accordingly to the woman who made the application. The bridegroom then procures a blanket and such other articles of clothing as he is able to spare, sometimes a horse, and sends them by the woman to the females of the family of the bride. If they accept of this, the match is made and the man may come to the house as soon as he chooses; and when he has built him a house, made his crop and gathered it in; made his hunt and brought home the meat, and put all this in the possession of his wife, the ceremony ends; they are married; or, as they express it, 'the woman is bound.' The appellation is 'the woman that lives with me' or 'the mother of my children.' The law has been understood differently by some, who insist that when they have assisted the woman to plant their crop the ceremony ends and the woman is bound. A man seldom or never marries in his own tribe."

to twenty generally, and girls from fourteen to eighteen. There appears to be but little difficulty in the young Indian procuring himself a wife, particularly if he is a good hunter or has distinguished himself in battle. There are several methods of courtship. Sometimes the match is made by the parents without the knowledge of the parties to be connected, but the most common mode of procuring a wife is as follows: A young man fancies a young woman; he commences his acquaintance with her by making friends with some young man, a relation of hers, often her brother. This done, he discloses his intention to his friend, saying that he is a good hunter, and has been several times to war, etc., appealing to him for the truth of his assertions, and concludes by saying that, if your parents will give me your sister for a wife, I will serve them faithfully according to the custom, which is, until she has a child; after which he can take her to his own relations or live with those of his wife. During the servitude of a young Indian, neither he nor his wife have anything at their disposal; he is to hunt, and that in a most industrious manner; his wife is continually at work, dressing skins, making mats, planting corn. Such are the modes of procuring a wife among the Sauk, Fox and Kickapoo nations; with the Chippewas, Ottawas and Pottawattomies, a wife is sometimes purchased by the parents of a young man, when she at once becomes his own property; but the most common mode of procuring a wife in all these nations is by servitude.

"It frequently happens that when an Indian's servitude for one wife has expired, he will take another—his wife's sister, perhaps—and again serve her parents according to the custom. Many of these Indians have two or three wives, the greatest number that I have known any man to have at one time being five. When an Indian wants more than one wife, he generally prefers that they should be sisters, as they are more likely to agree and live together in harmony. A man fifty or sixty years old who has two or three wives will frequently marry a girl of sixteen. It but seldom happens that the man separates from his wife. It sometimes happens, however, and then she is at liberty to marry again. There are no apparent marriage ceremonies among these Indians."

The children of an Indian family are always known and distinguished by the name of the mother, and even should the woman marry several husbands the issue by each of them are called after her. The reason given for this, remarks Carver, is that, as the offspring are indebted to the father for their souls and to the mother for their actual and material self, it is more rational that they should be distinguished by the name of the latter, from whom there is not the slightest doubt that they derived their being. It is said that there is nothing which surpasses the tenderness shown by the Indians for their offspring, and attention and kindness to the children has ever been admitted as a certain way to their consideration and friendship.

Of the methods adopted by Indians for distinguishing themselves from each other, Carver tell us that, besides the name of the animal by which their tribe and nation are denominated, there are others that are personal, and which the children receive from their mother. The chiefs of the tribes are distinguished by a name that either makes reference to their villages or to the hieroglyphic or symbol of their family; but these marks of distinction are only required after they have arrived at the age of manhood. In addition to this, those who have signalized themselves either on the warpath or in the chase, or are possessed of some peculiar qualification, receive a name to perpetuate their warlike propensities, abilities as hunters, or other eminent mental or physical gift. In this manner, then, the great warrior of the Naudowessies was named Ottahtongoomliscah,[1] i. e., the great father of snakes.

Should any great difference arise between an Indian and his wife, or a lasting dislike become apparent, they rarely quarrel over the situation, but give due and timely notice (a few days generally) of their intentions, and in order to settle at once and forever any quibble or distrust among others as to the actual cause for so doing, they separate. In addition to this, the witnesses who were present at the marriage meet on a certain day at the house of the couple, and bringing with them pieces of rock which they received as mementoes of the ceremony, throw them into the fire. This ends the ceremony, separation being made without difficulty or trouble between the couple or their family or friends; and, in fact, it leaves them in a condition of such friendly relations that, if so desired, they can re-marry within a few months. In making such arrangements for separation, the children, if any, are equally divided, or, if there be an odd one, the woman is allowed to take it. Though this custom might very naturally seem to encourage fickleness among the Indians and thereby increase in frequency these separations, yet Carver tells us there are many who have but one wife, and who enjoy a state of connubial happiness not to be exceeded in more refined society.

Of adultery among the Indians, Morse tells us that in more flagrant cases the culprits are apprehended and severely beaten, in addition to which, if the woman be the offender, her nose is either cut or bitten off. According to the same authority, in case of divorce proceedings the man may marry again as soon as he will, but the woman cannot during the continuance of the yearly sacrifices, which last about twelve days. Marriage gives no right to the husband over the property of the wife, and when they part she keeps the children[1] and the property belonging to them and to her. Not infrequently they take away everything the husband owns, his hunting equipage only excepted.

One writer assures us that hospitality to strangers is among the Indian virtues. Another writer endorses this sentiment, saying: "There are no people more hospitable, kind and free than the Indians; they will readily share with any of their own tribe the last part of their provisions, and even with those of a different nation, if they chance to come in when they are eating. Though they do not keep one common stock, yet that community of goods which is so prevalent among them and their generous disposition render it nearly of the same effect. When the chiefs are convened on any public business, they always conclude with a feast, at which their cheerfulness knows no limits."

The crime of murder was never recognized as a subject for the chiefs or elders of the tribe to decide upon. It was in fact left entirely to the members of the family of the deceased, who consulted among themselves, and then acted in a manner deemed by them most advisable, and to the best interests of the afflicted ones. In cases, however, where action on their part might materially affect the interests of the tribe, or if the case advanced were a doubtful one, or the claim of long standing, the family generally referred the matter for final decision to the tribe. In cases, however, where they have decided to assume the aggressive and take revenge, they seize upon the guilty person; or, failing in finding him, secure his nearest of kin. In some cases the family of him who has done the injury promise reparation, and in that case are generally allowed a reasonable time for the fulfillment of that pledge.

Two cases of Indian justice are given by Warren, both of which we quote at some length, from the fact that they fulfill in an excellent manner their mission as an illustration of this characteristic among the aborigines: "Many winters before they became aware of the presence of the white men on this great island," says the historian, "the Yankton division of the great Dakota[2] tribe resided on the borders of the great Western prairie, near the Red River of the North. At one time it happened, as it often does, that two young men quarreled about a woman, and one, in the heat of passion and jealousy, took the life of the other. Both belonged to numerous and important families, and in accordance with the law of 'blood for blood,' nothwithstanding his relatives wished to buy him off, the murderer was killed.

"Generally a case of this kind ends with the death of the first murderer, but in this instance the drawer of his fellow's blood was a great warrior, and his loss being severely felt by his relatives, the person who had taken his life was in turn murdered. The matter had gone beyond the usual length, and notwithstanding the interference of the old men and chiefs, the person who drew the last blood suffered death for his act at the hands of a relative of the person whom he had killed. The great Yankton camp became a scene of excitement, and murders occurred daily, till the weaker party, consisting of a thousand lodges, left the main camp, and retired by themselves to pursue their hunt for meat to feed their women and children.

"The feud did not end here, but continued with greater fury, the larger camp even sending war parties to take the straggling hunters of their former brethren. Scalps were also taken, and this is equal in Indian custom to a declaration of open and exterminating war. The smaller camp, to prevent their total eventual destruction at the hands of the more numerous Yanktons, moved towards the country of Ke-nis-te-no, with whom they had always waged a never-ending warfare; and, preferring to trust themselves to their generosity rather than to the vindictive hatred of their own kindred, they collected the women and children whom in former years they had captured from them and adopted in their families. These they placed on horses, and, loaded with presents, they were sent to the great Ke-nis-te-no town at Dead River (He-bo-se-be) with the peace pipe of the ceding Dakotas, requesting to be received 'in their lodges' and protected from the 'fire that raged in their rear on the Western prairie.'

"The manly and passionate Ke-nis-te-no sent forty of their warriors to receive them into their country and escort them into their lodge. A grand council was held where the Assineboins told their grievances, asked for protection, and promised to fight by the side of the Ke-nis-te-nos against the Yanktons forever.

"Their words were listened to with deep attention and pity, and they were accepted as allies and brothers. The peace pipe was smoked, 'their council fire was made one,' and they 'ate out of the same dish,' and reposed thereafter under the 'shade of the same forests and swamps,' till their united prowess eventually drove the Dakotas from the Northern plains, and the Ke-nis-te-nos and Assineboins could then go out occasionally to 'bask in the sun on the prairies and to taste the meat of the buffalo.' Shortly after this alliance the Ojibway made

(1) This authority existed extensively among the Indians some forty years subsequent to the coming of Carver. The fact that he differs regarding the manner of disposing of the children, seems to us of little consequence, as there may perhaps have been a difference in arranging these matters among the numerous tribes. Both authorities, however, are given so as to avoid any further or possible misunderstanding regarding the subject.

(2) To avoid any seeming misunderstanding, it may be said that this story or tradition was told as given by Mr. Warren by Esh-ke-bug-e-coshe, the aged chief of the pillaged Ojibways, who lived for many years among these tribes, and has been incorporated by Mr. Warren in his history of the Ojibways.

his appearance among them, and he, too, became a party to the mutual compact which has been kept in promise to this day."

The other story, after describing the atrocious murder of a family by a Canadian Coureur du Bois at the old French fort at La Pointe, where he had been employed by them, goes on to state that, while en route for Montreal where he was being taken for trial, he managed to escape from his guard and sought refuge among the Hurons, whose dress, customs and language he adopted. On one occasion, being present at a war-dance, when the Indian warriors were striking the "red stake" and telling their different exploits performed in war against their enemies, the murderer stepped into their midst, and, likewise striking the stake, he related his deed of treachery and blood, expecting to be honored by the red men as a brave man for the exploit. But he was far mistaken, for, before he had finished his tale of the bloody deed, an Indian warrior arose, and stepping up to him with the single exclamation "dog!" he buried a tomahawk deep into his brain.

The story is still further corroborated by Michel Cadotte and John Baptiste Corbin, who came into the Ojibway country when he was twenty years of age, and he remained there steadily for fifty-six years. He gives the date of the incident[1] as 1722.

(1) A note attached to this incident in the Minnesota Historical Collection states that this story, as told by the trader William Morrison in 1832, appeared in the Detroit Gazette, and is reprinted in Vol. VIII. of Wisconsin Historical Collection. The published account says that the tragedy of killing a trader, his wife and child, occurred during the winter of 1760-61; and that on his way to Montreal for trial, he was released on the St. Lawrence River and fought with the Indians against the British. The boasting of his murder took place at a dance near Sault Ste. Marie. The Indian, disgusted with his cruelty, invited him to a feast, and as soon as he commenced to eat he was informed by the chief that as soon as he stopped he would be killed. He ate for a long time, but at last had to stop, when he was soon lifeless. His body was boiled, but the young men would not eat, for they said he was worse than a "bad dog."

The Indian—Their Music.

Ten Years' Experience of Miss Alice Fletcher with Indian Music.—First Impressions upon hearing the same.—Incident through which the "Beauty and Meaning of these Songs" were at last revealed.—The Wa-wan Ceremony.—Various Phases of Indian Life represented by Song.—Tribal Songs and their Transmission.—Peculiarities to be found in Indian Songs.—Interpolation of Meaningless Syllables and their Purposes.—Three Groups of Indian Songs.—The Song of the Sacred Pole and Buffalo Hide.—Other Songs and their Meaning.—The Poo-g'thun Society.—The Pipes of Fellowship and Ceremonies connected with them.—Funeral Song of the Omahas.—Other Songs and Musical Ceremonies.

A NUMBER of valuable and ambitious works pertaining to the life, character and habits of the American Indian have long since been placed in general circulation. To these works has also been attributed the additional value of critical sanction as authorities upon that subject, and as such have afforded much interesting information which any less laborious attempts must certainly have failed to supply. One theme, however, has passed unchallenged throughout the entire series—more from the lack of reliable information, I should opine, as the subject is fraught with interest to all kinds and conditions of people. The subject referred to is music, Indian Music, if you please, about which many perhaps who have heard the Indian talk, perchance sing, have concluded that the least said the better for all parties concerned. But there is a far greater scope and meaning to this music than the advocates of other and more modern schools may have been led to infer; and as has quite frequently been the case in more recent times, it has devolved upon the patient efforts of a woman to develop a most interesting subject out of what otherwise bid fair to remain an inextricable, unpalatable and chaotic mingling of sounds.

It is no slight privilege, then, to be able at this time and under these conditions to present the subject of Indian music in reliable and substantial form; not by the mere matter of discussing its purpose and relative condition as compared with the music of other peoples, but by actual illustration, so that the reader or student may master its peculiarities in an interesting, practical, and therefore altogether more satisfactory manner.

To Miss Alice C. Fletcher is due the credit of having given to the world the first and only concise and practical insight into the purpose and use of Indian music, the same being told in such a pleasing and interesting manner that it cannot fail in attracting widespread and general attention. In this work she has been ably assisted by Mr. Francis La Flesche and Professor John Comfort Fillmore, the latter for many years a well-known resident of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. While the information and general subject matter of this article was obtained entirely from the Omahas,[1] it nevertheless furnishes an excellent idea of the general trend of thought, mannerisms, and other peculiarities connected with the music of the Indian people.

"After more than ten years of study," says Miss Fletcher, "during which I have had the invaluable aid of Mr. Francis La Flesche and the technical counsel and assistance of Miss Sarah Eliot Newman and Prof. John Comfort Fillmore, I no longer hesitate to present to the public the following collection[2] of Omaha Indian Songs,

(1) The Omahas are of the Siouan stock, and resided on their reservation in Nebraska on the Elkhorn River, eighty miles from the city of Council Bluffs. These people were one of the tribes noticed by Marquette in 1673 and by Carver in 1766. He found them located on St. Peter River. At that time they were divided into two bands, the Istasaundo or Grey Eyes and the Hongashans, and cultivated corn, melons and beans. In 1802, however, a tribe numbering three thousand five hundred were reduced to less than a tenth of that number by small-pox, when they burned their village and became wanderers, pursued by their relentless enemies, the other bands of the Sioux. Lewis and Clarke in 1804 found them on the L'Eau qui Court, numbering about six hundred. Since 1815 many treaties have been made with them, always accompanied by a cession of lands on their part in return for annuities and farming implements. In 1843 they returned to their village between the Elkhorn and the Missouri, and made peace with some of the Sioux; but their great chief Logan Fontanelle was killed by them not long after. Since then they have devoted themselves mainly to agriculture, and have very much improved their condition. In 1875 they numbered one thousand and five, depending entirely upon their crops for their subsistence. In 1890 they numbered one thousand one hundred and fifty-eight.—U. S. Report of Indians taxed and Indians not taxed, 1894.

In his work on the aboriginal races of North America, Samuel G. Drake says of the Omahas: "These Indians follow the chase as usual, and claim the country bounded by the Missouri on the east, by the Shell Creek on the west, by the River Platte on the south and on the north by the Poncas country. The Elkhorn runs in a southerly direction and empties into the Platte about twenty miles above its mouth, and is the largest stream which passes through their territory. Their favorite village once stood near the Missouri River and about one hundred miles above Fort Leavenworth; but several years since they were driven from this location by the Sioux, and since then have settled temporarily on the Elkhorn."

Morse, in his report to the Secretary of War on Indian affairs in 1822, says: "The O'Mahas, in number two thousand two hundred and fifty, not long ago abandoned their old village on the south side of the Missouri, and now dwell on the Elkhorn west from their old village, eighty miles west-northwest from Council Bluffs."

(2) On reading the manuscript of this joint work of Miss Fletcher and Mr. La Flesche and the critical analysis of Prof. Fillmore, I became impressed with the scientific value of the memoirs, and consequently took pleasure in issuing it in the series of Museum Papers.

This publication, however, would not have been possible at present had it not been for the timely assistance of Mrs. Mary Copley Thaw, who in appreciation of Miss Fletcher and her work has founded the fellowship which enables Miss Fletcher to devote the remainder of her life to the preparation of her Indian memoirs.—F. W. Putnam, Curator of the Peabody Museum, Jan. 17, 1893.

The title of the work in which these songs appear is as follows: Archaeological and Ethnological Papers of the Peabody Museum, Harvard University, Vol. 1, No. 5. A Study of Omaha Indian Music by Alice C. Fletcher, Assistant in American Ethnology, Peabody Museum, and holder of the Thaw Fellowship, aided by Francis La Flesche, with a Report of the Structural Peculiarities of the Music, by John Comfort Fillmore, A. M., Cambridge, Mass., June, 1893.

feeling confident that therein is truthfully set forth, in a manner intelligible to members of my own race, the Indian's mode of expressing emotion in musical form.

"I well remember my first experience in listening to Indian music. Although from habit as a student I had endeavored to divest myself of preconceived ideas, and to rise above prejudice and distaste, I found it difficult to penetrate beneath the noise and hear what the people were trying to express. I think I may safely say that I heard little or nothing of Indian music the first three or four times that I attended dances or festivals, beyond a screaming downward movement that was gashed and torn by the vehemently beaten drum. The noise was distressing, and my interest in this music was not aroused till I perceived that this distress was peculiarly my own, everyone else was so enjoying himself (I was the only one of my own race present), that I felt sure something was eluding my ears; it was not rational that human beings should scream for hours, looking and acting as did these Indians before me, and the sounds they made not mean something more than mere noise. I then began to listen below this noise, much as one must listen to the phonograph, ignoring the sound of the machinery, before the registered tones of the voice are caught. I have since watched Indians laboring with a like difficulty when their songs were rendered to them upon the piano; their ears were accustomed to the portamento of the voices in the song, which was broken up by the hammers of the instrument on the strings producing such a continuation of sounds that it was hard for the Indians to hear and recognize the tune. My efforts in listening below the noise were rewarded by my hearing the music, and I discovered there was in these Indian songs matter worth study and record.

"My first studies were crude and full of difficulties—difficulties which I afterwards learned were bred of preconceived ideas, the influence of generally accepted theories concerning 'savage' music. The tones, the scales, the rhythms, the melodies which I heard, and after months of work stood out more clearly as indisputable facts, lay athwart these cries, and could not be made to coincide with them. For a considerable time I was more inclined to distrust my ears than my theories; but when I strove to find facts that would agree with these theories, I met only failures. Meanwhile the Indians sang on and I faithfully noted their songs, studying their character and their relation to Indian life and ceremonies. During these investigations I was stricken with a severe illness, and lay for months, ministered to in part by Indian friends. While I was thus shut in from the rest of the world, with the Indians coming and going about me, in their affectionate solicitude they would often at my request sing for me. They sang softly because I was weak, and there was no drum, and then it was that the distraction of noise and confusion of theory were dispelled, and the sweetness, the beauty and meaning of these songs were revealed to me. As I grew stronger I was taught them, and sang them with my Indian friends; and when I was able to be carried about, my returning health was celebrated by the exemplification of the Wa-wan[1] ceremony with its music."

Of this ceremony Miss Fletcher continues to speak as follows: "I heard the cadences of the ceremonial song of approach; I knew the tune; I had been taught it in my sickness, and now I listened interestedly to the familiar strains as they came nearer and nearer, until the bearers of the Pipe of Fellowship were seen coming down the long entrance way, waving the feather pendants of the Calumets they bore. As they turned into the lodge, the whole people took up the song, and I too joined, able at last to hear and comprehend the music that had through all my difficulties fascinated, even while it eluded me. The occasion of this exemplification was one I can never forget, not only because of the insight it gave me into the music of the people, and the meaning of the ceremony as witnessed, but because of its deeper revelation of the heart and inner life of the Indian. From that time forth I ceased to trouble about theories of scales, tones, rhythm and melody, and trusted the facts which daily accumulated in my willing hands.

"I have transcribed several hundreds of Omaha songs, and have also taken down songs of the Dakotas, Otoes and Poncas tribes, belonging to the same linguistic family as the Omahas. The Pawnees are of another stock, and their songs, of which I have a number, present shades of difference that may become more defined when I have worked over a large collection of their music. The songs of the Nez Percé of Idaho also show differences that are interesting and well worth study, but these songs from different stocks have in them nothing radically divergent from the music of the Omahas, so that the facts herein set forth would seem to pertain to the music of various linguistic families.

"Indian songs, I have discovered, travel far, and those of one tribe are soon at home in another. There seems to have been quite an extended acquaintance between tribes, the Rocky Mountains proving no serious barrier. Customs and songs borrowed from the Croix Indians have obtained for a century at least among the Nez Percé. Dakota songs are also found there with an equally remote introduction. The Omahas took from the Sioux the Ma-wa-da-he songs, and from the Otoe the Hae-ka-ne. The Dakotas appropriated the Omaha Hae-thu-ska songs, as did the Winnebagos. I have had Omahas sing me the songs of different tribes, but they were always credited to the tribe to which they belonged. I have never met an instance of plagiarism among the Indians. Certain kinds of songs can be purchased by individuals, and the song becomes personal property, but the purchaser would never claim to have composed it.

"Among the Indians music envelopes like an atmosphere every religious, tribal and social ceremony, as well as every personal experience. There is not a phase of life that does not find expression in song. Religious rituals are imbedded in it; the reverent recognition of the creation of the corn, of the food-giving animals, of the powers of the air, of the fructifying sun, is passed from one generation to another in melodious measures; song nerves the warrior to deeds of heroism, and robs death of its terrors; it speeds the spirit to the land of the hereafter, and solaces those who live to mourn. Children compose ditties for their games, and young men by music give zest to their sports; the lover sings his way to the maiden's heart, and the old man tunefully evokes those agencies which can avert death. Music is also the medium through which man holds communion with his soul, and with the unseen powers which control his destiny.

"The songs of a tribe are its heritage, many of them having been handed down through generations, and embody not only the feelings of the composer, but record some past event of experience. Consequently they are treasured by the people, and care is taken to transmit them accurately, and this is effected without the usual external aids to memory common to races who have a written language.

"People who possess written music have also some mechanical device by which tone can be uniformly produced, as by vibrations of a chord of given length and tension, the tone of such a chord becoming the standard by which all other tones can be regulated; thus a succession of tones can be recorded and accurately repeated at long intervals of time and by different persons. The Indians have no mechanism for determining a pitch; there is no uniform key for a song. It can be started on any note suitable to the singer's voice. This absence of a standard pitch, and the Indians' management of the voice which is similar in singing and in speaking, make Indian music seem to be out of tune to our ears, conventionally trained to distinguish between a singing and speaking tone of voice. Although the Indians have no fixed pitch, yet given a starting note, graduating intervals are observed; not that any Indian can sing a scale, but he repeats his songs without any material variation.

"The baritone and mezzo soprano are more common than the higher or lower class of voices. The habit of singing in the open air to the accompaniment of percussion instruments, tends to strain the voice, to the detriment of its sweetness of tone and mobility of expression. There is little attempt on the part of the Indian singer to render piano or forte passages or to swell and diminish a tone, although this is sometimes noticeable in love songs. When more than one person take part in a song, the voices are always in unison; the different qualities of male and female voices bring out harmonic effects which are enhanced by the practice of the women using the falsetto; the chord usually presents to the ear two or three octaves, struck simultaneously, and one becomes aware of over-tones.

"The Indian enjoys the effect produced by vibrations of the voice upon a prolonged note; he will give a throbbing tremolo not unlike the sound obtained by vibrating the string of a 'cello while passing over it the bow in an undulating movement. In the love songs, the singer sometimes waves his hand slowly to and from his mouth, to break the flow of the breath and produce pulsations; the tremolo of the voice does not break the tone to his ear, as do the vibrations produced by striking the piano strings.

"Words clearly enunciated in singing break the melody to the Indian ear and mar the music. They say of us that we 'talk a great deal as we sing.' Comparatively few Indian songs are supplied with words, and when they are so supplied the words are frequently taken apart or modified so as to make them more melodious; moreover, the selection of the words and their arrangement do not always correspond to that which obtains in ordinary speech. A majority of the songs, however, are furnished almost wholly with syllables which are not parts or even fragments of words but sounds that lend themselves easily to singing and are without definite meaning; yet when a composer has once set syllables to his song they are never changed or transposed, but preserved with as much accuracy as we would observe in maintaining the integrity of a poem. These syllables are vowel sounds, both open and nasal, the initial letter being generally h, th, or y. While a desire for euphony directs the conscious choice of the initial letter, yet a study of the use of these letters seems to indicate that the feeling to be expressed controls in a measure the selection of the syllables. The flowing, hae ha he hi ho hu, or athae athee lend themselves to the gentler emotions. These sounds are common in the love song, the funeral song, and when the singer breathes his desire for the strengthening of his own life from sources beyond his sight, or seeks to express his aspiration toward the ideal; yah yae yee yi permit sharp explosive tones, and these syllables are generally employed when warlike emotions are excited.

"The use of these syllables and the management of the words of the songs reveal a striving towards poetic expression in measured language. In order to meet the demands of the rhythm of music, the words of the song are frequently taken apart and melodious syllables interposed, giving to the newly formed word a measure it did not possess in ordinary speech. Accents, too, are changed to meet the exigencies of rhythm and elliptical phrases are used. Moreover, there is often an answering sound at the end of repeated phrases made by adding a syllable. This suggests that the expression of emotion calls for rhyme."

The foregoing is thoroughly illustrated in the following song, which Miss Fletcher tells us "is sung by the leader of a war party when disaster or death seem inevitable, and the victory is to be plucked from defeat only by the most daring and heroic efforts. Under such circumstances, or when death alone can be the issue of a combat, these strains are sung to nerve the warrior to do his utmost. The song wakens in the memory of the soldier the joy at his birth, when his sister came to his mother's retired tent, and seeing the new-born infant, with a cry of delight and endearment exclaimed, 'My brother! A man lies there'; a man who will ever guard from danger and hunger and death. The thought of that home joy and trust stimulates the warrior beset by dangers to defy death and fulfill the prediction at his birth.

"The phrase Ahyae-zhum-mae tho[1] is elliptical, made so to accord with the rhythm of the music. The spoken words would be ahyae-zhum-me ha. In the song the phrase is oratorical; me is made mae; ha, denoting the close of the sentence, is changed for euphony to the musical syllable tho; the phrase as sung conveys something more than the literal meaning of the words, 'they may have said'; 'Have they not said?' is the true signification; and the ideal of a man's career is set as a gem in the words, Hin! we-sa-thun nu-kae-dae,' My Brother! he is a man! Hin is a feminine exclamation of pleasure; we-sa-thun or we-tha-thun, a term of endearment used by an elder sister to her younger brother, equivalent to, My dear brother. Nu-kae dae, nu, man, kae-dae, suffix indicating the position of the infant lying down. Through these lines twines the poetry of thought and expression, simple as a wild flower and as delicate. The music assists the tender verse, and bears the weight of the thought. 'Ahyae-zhum-mae tho' in the three musical phrases with the hold on the tho in the third bar of each phrase sounds the call of the man's birth prophesy; the long echoing notes carry the thoughts over the plains and the forests that have known his footsteps, where dwell all the omniscient birds that watch over the brave man, taking note of his deeds. (These birds are represented in the pack used in testing the warrior's record according to the rites of the Tent of War). The musical treatment of these same words when they follow the fourth phrase makes them simple narrative, but in the last three bars the words become again significant, taking on a deeper meaning, one that partakes of an oracular character, as, 'Have they not said, a man!' The climax of both poem and song is in this last phrase, and it cannot fail to be felt by anyone following the words and music." The song in its completeness is published among the archaeological and ethnological papers of the Peabody Museum, and is as follows:

(1) This syllable is not part of the words of this song, but simply a musical syllable without definite meaning, and used, as previously stated, to meet the demands of rhythm.

Indian songs are divided into three groups—class songs, social songs and individual songs. Associated with the first are those of an aggressive or warlike character, such as the song of the Sacred Pole and Buffalo Hide, the Hae-de-wa-che or annual tribal dance, those pertaining to the rites of the Tent of War and the ritual of the filling of the tribal pipes. These songs, Miss Fletcher tells us, are either religious or ritualistic, and are sung only by the initiated or by the members of certain subgentes[1] having charge of sacred or tribal ceremonies.

The second group covers songs belonging to the Poo-g' thun, Hae-thu-ska, To-ka-lo, Ma-wa-da-ne and other secular or secret societies; also all dance and game songs, the songs of the wa-wan or ceremony of the Pipes of Fellowship and the funeral song. These songs are always sung by companies of persons; the last two are somewhat religious in character, but are not sacerdotal. To the third group belong the In-g' thunwa-an (thunder songs); and those which relate to Mystery, to Dreams, and to the Sweat Lodge; Na-g' thae wa-an (captive or death songs); Mekasee (wolf or brave songs); wae-ton wa-an (woman's songs of sorrow); Love lays, songs of thanks, and the prayer taught every Omaha child by its parents, and used throughout life by the whole tribe. These songs pertain to individual hopes, desires or experiences, and they are generally sung as solos.

Among the songs of the first class, those of the Sacred Pole and the Buffalo Hide are most conspicuous. Of this dance, Miss Fletcher tells us as follows: "The Omaha tribe lived in the buffalo country, and their hunting of this game was governed by well-defined rules and regulations which were obligatory upon every member of the tribe, were vigorously enforced, and any disobedience was severely punished by officers appointed to execute the laws. Early in July the entire tribe moved out of their village under a leader who had been ceremoniously placed in command. Upon this man rested the sole responsibility of directing the movements of the tribe, of selecting the camping places, of searching for the game, and of regulating the manner of hunting and securing food. He was held accountable for everything that happened, for the attacks of enemies without and for quarrels within, even down to the fighting of the dogs. If disaster occurred, the leader was deposed, for it was considered that his prayers were ineffectual, and he was not in favor with the Unseen Powers. The tribe when moving kept well together, and often stretched out a mile or two in length, and was guarded by picked men detailed from the bravest of the warriors. This soldier police force not only looked out for lurking enemies, but prevented any man from slipping from the ranks for a private hunt. All the rules respecting the movements of the tribe on the annual hunt were based upon the principle that the liberty of the individual must be subordinated to the welfare of the community, and therefore no one for his personal pleasure or gain was permitted to infringe any of the time-honored regulations. The leader traveled apart at one side in prayerful contemplation of the duties which devolved upon him. His office was one of the most coveted within the tribal gift, and was also one of the most onerous.

"After the tribe had secured an ample store of meat sufficient to meet the requirements of the winter season, the festival of Thanksgiving took place. On this occasion the Sacred Pole and Buffalo Hide were taken from their tents and became the central objects of the ceremony. The Wa-hrae'-hae-tan, a sub-gens of the Hunga gens, had charge of the Pole and its tent, and the Washa-ba-tan, another sub-gens, cared for the Hide and its tent. To the Hunga was entrusted the preservation of the ritual and songs of the Pole, and no one in the tribe except a male member of this gens had the right to sing these hubae wa-an or sacred songs.

"Song No. 3, which is herewith given, is used just preceding the ceremony of anointing the Pole, and was for the purpose of calling the people together to witness that rite." The words of this song are:

"Ae-hae thae-hae tha
Ae-gun shu-ka-tha-ha nuz-zhin-ga
Ae-hae thae-hae tha
Mun-da-ha ae-ha ba-dan ae-ha
Ae-hae thae-hae tha."

The translation, which implies that the Hunga has been formally requested by the chiefs to perform this ceremony, and which calls the people to the Sacred Tent to witness it, is literally as follows, the last syllable in the first, third and fifth lines having no meaning, being simply used to carry out the rhythm:

"I bid I bid tha
Therefore shall ye all stand in a group,
I bid I bid tha
Gather ye nearer, come hither, come!
I bid I bid tha."

Another song which it is unnecessary to reproduce, and which is designated as No. 4 in this collection, was sung during the painting of the Sacred Pole, the words literally meaning, I make the pole red and comely to look upon.

On the third day of this Thanksgiving festival the tribal dance[1] took place. This dance was highly dramatic, especially that part wherein the past experiences of the warriors are depicted. The scene, Miss Fletcher tells us, was full of action and color; the whole tribe took a part, every one being in gala dress. In fact, it would appear that there was hardly a member of the tribe too old or too young not to have upon his person some token of the occasion.

The Tent of War,[2] which was in the immediate charge of the Wae-jin-ste gens, was said to contain certain articles which were supposed to test the truthfulness of a warrior's recital of his deeds of valor. One of these articles was a skin case or pack, fashioned in the symbolic form of a bird, and containing the skins of a number of birds supposed to possess warlike instincts. These birds in their flight over the earth watch and noted all valorous deeds, and so when a man boasted or exaggerated as he told his tale in the presence of this pack his untruthfulness was brought to light by these birds, who caused the reed which he was required to drop upon the pack to roll off to the ground. The rites of the Tent of War are allied to those ceremonies connected with the hearing of the first thunder peal in the springtime.

The music of the ritual of filling the Tribal[3] Pipes is lost. The keeping of this ritual, Miss Fletcher relates, was the hereditary charge of certain members of a subgens of the In-shtae-sunda gens, and the last man who knew it died some years ago. It was a chant and was sung without accentuation by the drum.

Among the second group or social songs, those of the Poo-g' thun society were among the oldest. This society has now been extinct for nearly fifty years, and the stories connected with its songs are lost. All of the examples given of this group are of a warlike character, describing the battle cry of different warriors with which they evidently sought to terrorize the enemy. Thus one exclaims: "When I come to my place I shout, I command as I stand and shout;" while yet another says,

"Where do I send them when I come? To their graves!" The Poo-g' wa-wan constitutes, the same authority tells us, the wildest music of the Omahas, and, unlike their war songs of the tribe, they are marked by a rhythm simple and forceful, and are quite in contrast with many of the Hae-thu-ska songs, wherein the rhythms are contesting and complicated. The origin of the latter songs is not absolutely known, although tradition has it that it sprung from the Poo-g' thun. A valiant record alone entitled a man to admission and promotion in this society, in which bravery made all men equal. The To-ka-lo is another of the Omaha societies which has been extinct for many years. Once it was in great respect with the warriors, and its dances bore a strong resemblance to those of the hae-thu-ska. One of the most attractive features of this society was the procession about the tribal circle, when all members were dressed in full regalia and rode their best horses. The music is well suited, says Miss Fletcher, to the prancing step of a spirited charger.

Other dances associated with the second group are the In-ou-tin or game songs, used extensively by the young men when they gamble, either for fun or in earnest. The children also have songs of their own

(1) Carver tells us that different nations vary considerably in their manner of dancing. For instance, the Chippewas were wont to throw themselves into a greater variety of attitudes than any other people, sometimes holding their heads erect, while at others they bend them almost to the ground, the body inclining from side to side as they passed around. On the other hand, the Naudowessies carried themselves in a more upright position, stepping firmer and moving more gracefully.

(2) The war dance which the Indians used, both before they set out on their war parties and on their return from them, Carver tells us strikes terror into strangers. It is performed as the others amid a circle of warriors; a chief generally begins it, who moves from the right to the left, singing at the same time both his own exploits and those of his ancestors. When he has concluded his account of any memorable action, he gives a violent blow with his war club against a post that is fixed in the ground near the center of the assembly for this purpose. Every one dances in turn and recapitulates the deeds of his family till they all join in the dance. Then it becomes truly alarming to any stranger that happens to be among them, as they throw themselves into every horrible and terrifying posture that can be imagined, rehearsing at the same time the parts they expect to act against their enemies in the field. During this they hold their sharp knives in their hands, with which as they whirl about they are every moment in danger of cutting each others' throats; and did they not shun the threatened mischief with inconceivable dexterity, it could not be avoided. By these motions they intend to represent the manner in which they kill, scalp, and take their prisoners. To heighten the scene they set up the same hideous yells, cries and war-whoops they use in time of action, so that it is impossible to consider them in any other light than as an assembly of demons.

(3) The Pipe dance is the principal and most pleasing to a spectator of any of them, being the least frantic, and the movement of it most graceful. It is but on particular occasions that it is used, as when ambassadors from an enemy arrive to treat of peace, or when strangers of eminence pass through their territory.—Carver.

handed down from older sets of playmates to the younger coming after them. The Omahas also have a few songs of their own composition that are used simply for social dancing.

Another dance of more than passing importance is that of the wa-wan, which is the name given to the ceremony connected with the Pipes of Fellowship. These songs, we are told, are accompanied by rhythmic movements of the pipe-bearers, and also of the pipes which are swayed to the music. "As the rhythmic movements of the pipes and their bearers have always attracted the attention of the white observers," remarks our authority, "the ceremony has been characterized by them as a pipe dance or Calumet dance, whereas the performance does not convey to the Omaha mind the idea of dancing, nor do the movements really resemble Indian dancing, with the possible exception of that of the ceremony which takes place on the fourth night." A wa-wan party usually consists of from eight to twelve men, and they sometimes traveled over two hundred miles to reach their destination. They were never in fear of hostile attacks by the way, war parties turning to one side and letting the Pipes of Fellowship[1] pass in peace.

There is but one funeral song among the Omahas, and it is only sung during the obsequies of a man or woman who has been greatly respected in the tribe. Of the individual songs which are contained in group No. 3, there are seven sub-groups. Of the first of these

(1) Marquette said that the Calumet is the most mysterious thing in the world. The scepters of our kings are not so much respected, for the Indians have such a reverence for it that one may call it the god of peace and war and the arbiter of life and death. . . . "One with this Calumet may venture among his enemies, and in the hottest battles they lay down their arms before this sacred pipe. The Illinois presented me with one of them, which was very useful to us in our voyage."

there are four divisions, one being sung at the initiation of a warlike expedition; another used when the warriors are in the field and danger threatens them; still another is chanted by the women in behalf of the men on the warpath, while the last is a song of triumph over the fallen enemy, sung after the return of the successful war party. The second group contains songs of mystery which appeal directly to the unseen forces which surround man. These come in five divisions—the tribal prayer; songs that come to a youth during his fasting vigil; songs that come in dreams to a man together with a knowledge and use of medicinal roots and herbs; songs that are general in their benefits, giving the singer success in hunting, in war, or any other undertaking; songs that bring help to the hunter; songs of thanks; songs that occur in myths (these are the delight of the children who use them in their games, and they form the only nursery music known in the tribe); songs relating to the adventures and experiences of young men and women; love songs and flageolet music. The next sub-group pertains to war, the next to mysteries, the next to songs of thanks, myth songs, and so on to the end.

The Indian—Ceremonies and Government.

CHAPTER III.

The Paw-waw or Black Dance.—Carver's Experience with a peculiar and unnamed Dance near Lake Pepin.—Dance of the Sacrifice.—Burial of the Dead.—Invitation and Reception of Guest.—The Ceremony.—Care of the Dead.—Indian Mourning.—The Funeral Cortege.—Interment.—Tribal Government.

BEFORE concluding this section concerning Indian life and customs, it may be well to make some further allusion to other dances of a ceremonial nature pertaining to those people. In doing this we will refer to the Paw-waw or Black dance, which Carver tells us he found among the nations to the westward of the Mississippi and on the borders of Lake Superior. This dance created more than usual interest in the early days, it being asserted as a fact by many of the colonists that at such times the devil was raised by the Indians. The dance, however, as seen by Carver among the Naudowessies, was given on the occasion of a reception of a new member into one of the numerous societies which they called Wakon-kitchewah or the Friendly Society of the Spirit. This organization was composed of persons of both sexes, such only being admitted into it as were of unexceptional character, and who receive the approbation of the entire membership. The only music used on this occasion was a drum composed of a piece of a hollow tree curiously wrought, over one end of which was strained a skin which when beaten gave forth a sound far from harmonious, but sufficient to serve as indicating the time. The whole assembly being united, the dance began, several singers assisting the music with their voices, the women joining in the chorus at certain intervals, the whole producing a not unpleasant but savage harmony.

Another dance mentioned by Carver, the name of which, however, he failed to obtain, was performed under rather trying and peculiar circumstances by a number of Indians who came to his tent when he landed near Lake Pepin on the banks of the Mississippi. "Looking out," he tells us, "I saw about twenty naked young Indians, the most perfect in their shape, and by far the handsomest I had ever seen, coming towards me, and dancing as they approached to the music of their drums. At every ten or twelve yards they halted and set up their yells and cries. When they reached my tent, I asked them to come in, which, without deigning to make any answer, they did. As I observed that they were painted red and black as they usually are when they go against an enemy, and perceived that some parts of the war dance was intermixed with their other movements, I doubted not but they were set on by the inimical chief who had refused my salution. I therefore determined to sell my life as dear as possible. To this purpose I received them, sitting on my chest with my gun and pistols beside me, and ordered my men to keep a watchful eye upon them and to be also upon their guard. The Indians having entered, they continued their dance, alternately singing at the same time of their heroic exploits, and the superiority of their race over every other people.

"To enforce their language, though it was uncommonly nervous and expressive, and such as would of itself have carried terror to the firmest heart, at the end of every period they struck their warclubs against the poles of my tent with such violence that I expected every moment it would have tumbled upon us. As each of them in dancing passed by me, they placed their right hand over their eyes, and, coming close to me, looked me steadily in the face, which I could not construe into a token of friendship. When they had nearly ended their dance, I presented to them the Pipe of Peace, but they would not receive it. I then, as my last resource, thought I would try what presents would do; accordingly I took from my chest some ribbons and trinkets which I laid before them. This seemed to stagger their resolutions, and to avert in some degree their anger, for after holding a consultation together they sat down on the ground, which I considered as a favorable omen. Thus it proved, as in a short time they received the Pipe of Peace, and, lighting it, first presented it to me, and then smoked it themselves. Soon after they took up the presents, which had hitherto lain neglected, and appearing to be greatly pleased with them, departed in a friendly manner."

The Dance of the Sacrifice is so denominated because of the offering up of some sacrifice to some good or evil spirit. It is a dance to which the Naudowessies give that title from being used when any fortunate circumstance of a public character befalls them; for instance, at one time a large deer accidentally strayed into the middle of their encampment, and was by them quickly destroyed. This happening just at the new moon, it was regarded by them as a lucky omen, and so, having roasted the carcass whole, a feast was made, after which they all joined in what was known as the Dance of the Sacrifice.

The methods adopted by the Indians in caring for and burying their dead are surrounded, as are almost all of their private or public functions, with numerous peculiar observances and superstitious ceremonies. Many of the features on such occasions are of a character so fantastic and unusual to modern comprehension as to challenge the most charitably disposed as to their actual purport or intent. Yet it must in all fairness be said that there is no possible ground for questioning their sincerity, while there are many things which point to the directly opposite. One of these is their unquestionable reverence for the departed, whose bones, when the tribe is called upon to remove to some other location, are carefully and reverentially gathered together and taken with them, and that, too, no matter how long the period intervening since interment was first made.

The first impressions gained by Europeans in their intercourse with the Indians led them to most emphatically declare in favor of the opinion that the aborigines had no religious instincts or beliefs. In fact, they dubbed them "heathen," pure and simple, and thus cast upon them the ban of suspicion, which it took years of intimate association to overcome. It was even generally believed that they had no souls, and was stated by those of highest authority and intelligence. Here, then, they remained with this stigma resting upon them, the most friendly interpretation of which was a query as to whether the sort of religion which the red men were found to have and recognize was better or worse than no religion at all. So, too, their feelings for the dead were questioned, while the funeral rites, meaning so much in their eyes, were scouted as useless mummeries and affectations, unworthy of respect and degrading to mankind.

Of the care and burial of their dead by the Indians, there are numerous interesting accounts given by those who have from time to time visited or lived among the aborigines in this country. Among these accounts is one by Perrot, in which he tells us that when Indians intend to have a feast in honor of their dead, they carefully make the arrangements beforehand. In other words, they prepare for such an emergency by obtaining the necessary articles and materials for the observance of those ceremonies which always pertain to such occasions, and therefore, while on their visits to the trading posts, and among the Europeans, purchase all that is necessary for that purpose. At home, too, they were just as provident in their arrangements, securing and providing meats, grain, furs and other things which were set aside for that purpose. "When once they have decided to celebrate the grand feast of the dead," continues this writer, "they send deputies of their people to all the neighboring villages nearby (and far away), some of them more than one hundred leagues distant, to notify them to assist at the coming feast, telling them the time fixed for the celebration. A great many people of the invited villages start then, each canoe holding several persons; they make a small collection of goods among themselves in order to make thereof a present in common to the village which has invited them. Those who have invited them prepare for their coming a large cabin, very strong and well covered, in order to receive and lodge all those whom they are expecting.

"As soon as all have arrived the different tribes stand separated, one from the other, in the center of the large cabin. Being thus assembled, they make their presents and give away what they have, saying that they have just been invited to render homage to the remains of the dead of the village and to their memory. Immediately they begin to dance to the sound of the drum and of a gourd in which are small holes, which constantly give out the same tune. They dance from one end of the cabin to the other, one behind the other in single file, moving around the fir, or other trees planted there. While the dance is going on some are busy in the kitchen cooking. Dogs are killed and boiled with other meats, all of which have been diligently prepared. When all is ready, the guests are made to rest awhile, and the dance being now stopped, the repast is served.

"I have forgotten to remark that as soon as the dance stops the presents which the guests have made and all their effects are removed. Their hosts give them other presents of greater value in exchange. In case they have lately returned from trafficking with the Europeans the presents they give will consist of shirts, headgear, stockings, new blankets or some paints and vermillion, though the guests have brought but old articles, perhaps corn, hides, furs of beaver, wild cats, bears or some other animals. When those invited from other villages arrive, the same is done at each new arrival (of guests) and the same reception is given to the people of each village. When all are assembled they get them to dance three days in succession, during which one of those who called them to the feast invites twenty persons, more or less, to the feast at his place, and then a certain number are chosen from each tribe and detached from the rest of the tribe, who keep on dancing. But instead of serving them with victuals at this feast, they give them presents, such as kettles, hatchets, etc.; nothing, however, to eat. These presents then become the common property of the tribe; should they consist in articles of food, they may eat them at once, which they do very readily, for they are never wanting in appetite. Another will do the same in regard to the other dancers; they will be invited to come to his lodge (to receive presents). Thus they treat their guests until all of the villages have given in their turn such kind of donation feasts. During the three days that the dance lasts, they squander all they have in the line of merchandise and other goods, and reduce themselves to extreme poverty, and that to such an extent that they do not keep for themselves even a hatchet or a knife. Oftentimes all they keep is an old kettle for their use. Their intention in making these donations is to render the souls of the departed more happy and honored in the Land of the Dead, for they believe they are under strict obligation to comply with all that is observed at funeral obsequies, and that only such kinds of donations can give repose to the departed. It is customary for them to give all they have without reserve at funeral ceremonies and other superstitious performances. Some of those who have imbibed the milk of religion (become Christians) have not entirely abandoned this kind of customs, and with the body they bury all that belonged to the deceased during life. Such feasts of the dead were formerly celebrated every year, each tribe in its turn giving such a feast, they mutually invite then, one another to the feast. Since some years, however, these things are no longer practiced among some of them, as the French, who have much intercourse with them, made them understand that this useless squandering of their goods ruined their families and reduced them to such straits as not to have even the necessaries of life."

Speaking of the manner in which the Indians conduct their funeral ceremonies, the same writer says: "When an Ottawa or other Indian is about to die, they bedeck him with the most beautiful trinkets his folks have, I mean his parents and relatives. They arrange his hair and paint it with red paint mixed with grease. They also daub his body and face with vermillion and put a shirt on him of the nicest kind if there be any on hand. He is clothed with a jacket and blanket of the richest kind—in one word, he is dressed as gaudily as if he were to give a great feast. They carefully adorn the place where he lies with strings of beads, circlets (of fancy stones) and other gewgaws. His arms are at his side, and at his feet generally all that he used in war during life. All his relatives, and especially the medicine-men, are about him.

"When the sick man appears to be in agony and on the point of expiring, his female relatives and others who have been hired for the purpose begin to cry, singing mournful songs in which mention is made of the degree of relationship between them and the dying man. But whenever he seems to revive and regain his senses, they cease to cry, commencing, however, their wails and lamentations over again as often as the sick man falls into convulsions or gets weak spells. When he is dead, or a moment before expiring, they place him in a sitting position as if he were still alive, his back being supported. I will say here, en passant, that I have seen some whose death agony lasted for more than twenty-four hours and who made terrible grimaces and contortions, their eyes rolling in the most horrible manner. You would have believed that the soul of the dying man saw and noticed some enemy, although he was senseless and almost dead. The dead remain in a sitting position until the next day and are kept in this posture by their relatives and friends who come to see them. They are also assisted from time to time by an old woman who places herself before the female relatives of the deceased there present; shedding hot tears, she begins a lugubrious song, all the other women joining in, and whenever she stops singing, they do the same. They then offer her a piece of meat, or a plate of grain or something else.

"As to the men, they do not weep, that being unworthy of them. Only the father of the deceased evinces by his mournful song that there is nothing in the world that can console him for the loss of his son. A brother does the same for an elder brother, if he has received from him during life sensible tokens of tenderness and friendship. He disrobes, daubs his face with coal and red streaks; he has his bow and arrow in hand as if he meant to attack the first man he would meet. Chanting a song in the most furious manner, he runs like a madman through the streets and wigwams without shedding a tear, showing to all who meet him how great is the sorrow he feels at the loss of his brother. This moves the hearts of his neighbors to compassion, and engages them to make up among themselves a present for the deceased, declaring in the harangue that accompanies it that this present is given to dry the tears of the dead man's relatives and that the mat which they give him is intended for him to repose on (in the Land of Spirits); if the gift consists of bark (birch bark), they say it is intended to preserve his body from the injurious effects of the weather.

"When they are about to bury the body, they go for the persons chosen for this function. They erect a scaffold from seven to eight feet high, which is used instead of a grave, and on it the body is placed. If he is to be buried in the ground, they dig for him a grave of only four or five feet. During all this time the family despoil themselves, bringing him grain (corn, wild rice), furs, or other merchandise to be placed on the scaffold or near his grave. This done, they carry there the body in the same posture he had when dying, and with the same ornaments he wore at that time. He has his arms near him and all that had been placed at his feet before dying. After the funeral ceremonies are over, and the body is buried, they richly pay those who have buried him, giving them a kettle or some strings of beads for their trouble.

"All the people of the village are obliged to assist at the funeral. The whole being concluded, a certain man presents himself amongst them, holding in his hand a small green stick of the thickness of a thumb and about four fingers in length. This he throws into the midst of the crowd. The great point now is to catch the green stick; if it falls on the ground, everyone scrambles for it and tries to pick it up, pushing and pulling one another with so great violence that in less than an hour it has passed through the hands of all those present. If, finally, someone of the crowd has managed to possess himself of it and shows it without it being taken from him, he sells it at a fixed price to the first person who wants to buy it. The price will often be a kettle, gun, or blanket. The guests are then told to meet again for a similar ceremony, the day being appointed; this is done several times, as I have said.

"After this game a proclamation is made that there will be another prize for the best runner among the men. The race course is indicated from the place whence they are to start until the spot where it is said they are to arrive. All the young men dress and form a long line in an open field. At the first shout of the man appointed for that office, they start to run for some distance from the village, and the first one who arrives at the other end bears off the prize.

"Some days afterward the parents of the deceased get up a feast consisting of meat, corn, and wild rice, to which all those of the village are invited who are not their relatives and who descend from families different from theirs (i. e. not having the same totemic mark). These also are invited, especially the ones who have made presents to the deceased. They invite to it strangers from other villages, if any such happen to be present, and they inform their guests that it is the deceased who gives them this feast. Should the feast consist of meat, they will take a piece and this has to be carried to the grave and placed on it; they do the same with other kinds of food. Women, girls and children are allowed to eat these things (placed on the grave), but not grown-up men, for they are to look upon this as unworthy of them. At this feast everyone is at liberty to eat what he likes and to take the rest home. They make considerable presents in merchandise to all those strangers who previously have done the same to the deceased, but those of their own tribe receive nothing. They are then thanked for having remembered the deceased and congratulated upon their charitableness." Warren tells us that, when an Ojibway dies, his body is placed in the grave, generally in a sitting posture and always facing the West. With the remains are buried all of the articles needed in life for a journey. If, therefore, the deceased be a man, his gun, blanket, kettle, fire-steel, flint and moccasins are laid beside him, while if it be a woman, her moccasins, ax, portage-collar, blanket and kettle are so placed. The reason for placing the body in a position facing the West is owing to a belief on the part of these people that their home after death lies to the westward; to use their own words, the Road of Souls is called Ke-wa-kun-ah, or Homeward Road. It is also on occasions named Che-ba-kun-ah, Road of Souls. Mr. Warren states of his own personal knowledge that in the ceremony pertaining to the burial of their dead the old men of the tribe in addressing the remains generally use the word Ke-go-way-se-kah, which means "you are going homeward." As a rule this road is represented as passing mostly through an open and prairie country. This authority gives as his opinion that it is probably from these beliefs that ages ago the Ojibways resided westward and occupied a country "flowing in milk and honey"—a country abounding in all that tends to their enjoyment and happiness, and to which they look back as the tired traveler on a desert looks to a beautiful oasis, or as the wanderer looks back to the once happy home of his childhood.

The Ojibway believes that the soul stands immediately after the death of the body on a deep beaten path which leads to the westward. Here the first obstacle he comes in contact with while following this path is the great Oda-e-min (Heartberry) or strawberry, which stands on the roadside like a huge rock, and from which he takes a handful and eats on his way. He then travels forward until he reaches a deep, rapid stream of water, over which lies the much dreaded Ko-go-gaup-o-gun or rolling and sinking bridge, the passage of which is a most dangerous undertaking. Having passed it in safety, however, when the traveler looks back, it appears to him to have assumed the shape of a huge serpent, swimming, twisting and untwisting its folds across the stream. For four nights following this experience, he camps out, traveling during the daytime over prairie country, when the soul finally arrives in the Land of Spirits, where he finds his relatives accumulated since mankind was first created. Now all is turned to rejoicing, singing and dancing, an eternity of life being spent in the beautiful country interspersed with clear lakes and streams, forests and prairies where fruit abounds and game is to be found with repletion.

Latter-day ceremonies in the burial of the dead seem to be about the same, as we discovered in the description given by Morse of that ceremony. In his report to the government in 1822, he tells us that when an Indian dies his relations put on him his best clothes and either bury him in the ground or put him on a scaffold; but the former is the most common mode of disposing of the dead. As soon as an Indian dies, his relations engage three or four persons to bury the body. They make a rough coffin of a piece of a canoe or some bark; the body is then taken to the grave in a blanket or buffalo skin and placed in the coffin, together with the hatchet, knives, etc., and then covered over with earth. Some of the near relations follow the corpse, the women on this occasion appearing to be much affected. If the deceased was a warrior, a post is usually erected at his head on which is painted red crosses of different sizes to denote the number of men, women and children he has killed of the enemy during his life, which they believe he will claim as his slaves in the other world.

It is frequently the case that some one of his friends will strike a post or tree, and say: I will speak; he, then, in a loud voice, will continue: at such a place, I killed an enemy, I give his spirit to our departed friend; and sometimes he may give a greater number in the same manner. The friends of the deceased will afterwards frequently take victuals, tobacco and other necessaries to his grave, believing that whatever they present to him in this manner he will have in the other world.

An Indian always mourns for near relations from six to twelve months by neglecting his personal appearance and blackening his face, and other signs. A woman will mourn for the loss of her husband at least twelve months, during which time she appears to be very solitary and sad, never speaking to anyone unless necessary, and always wishing to be alone. At the expiration of her mourning, she will paint and dress as formerly, and endeavor to secure another husband.

One of the most interesting accounts extant of the manner in which the Indians treated their dead is given by Jonathan Carver in describing his travels through the interior parts of North America. This account is as follows: "The Indian meets death when it approaches him in his hut with the same resolution he has often faced him in the field. His indifference relative to this important article, which is the source of so many apprehensions to almost every other nation, is truly admirable. When his fate is pronounced by the physician and it remains no longer uncertain, he harangues those about him with the greatest composure.

"If he is a chief and has a family, he makes a kind of funeral oration, which he concludes by giving to his children such advice for the regulation of their conduct as he thinks necessary. He then takes leave of his friends and issues out orders for the preparation of a feast which is designed to regale those of his tribe that come to pronounce his eulogium.

"After the breath has departed, the body is dressed in the same attire it usually wore whilst living, his face is painted and he is seated in an erect posture on a mat or skin placed in the middle of the hut, with his weapons by his side. His relations being seated around, each harangues in turn the deceased, and if he has been a great warrior, recounts his heroic actions nearly in the following purport, which in the Indian language is extremely poetical and pleasing: 'You still sit among us, brother; your person retains its usual resemblance and continues similar to ours without any visible deficiency, except that it has lost the power of action. But whither is that breath flown which a few hours ago sent up smoke to the Great Spirit? Why are those lips silent that lately delivered to us expressive and pleasing language? Why are those feet motionless that a short time ago were fleeter than the deer on yonder mountains? Why useless hang those arms that would climb the tallest tree or draw the toughest bow? Alas! Every part of that frame which we lately beheld with admiration and wonder is now become as inanimate as it was three hundred winters ago. We will not, however, bemoan thee as if thou wast forever lost to us or that thy name would be buried in oblivion; thy soul yet lives in the Great Country of Spirits with those of thy nation that are gone before thee, and though we are left behind to perpetuate thy fame, we shall one day join thee. Actuated by the respect we bore thee whilst living, we now come to tender to thee the last act of kindness it is in our power to bestow: that thy body might not lie neglected on the plain and become a prey to the beasts of the field or the fowls of the air, we will take care to lay it with those of thy predecessors who are gone before thee, hoping at the same time that thy spirit will feed with their spirits and be ready to receive ours when we shall arrive in the Country of Souls.'

"In short speeches, somewhat similar to this, does every chief speak the praises of his departed friend. When they have so done, if they happen to be at a great distance from the place of interment appropriated to their tribe, and the person dies during the winter season, they wrap the body in skins and lay it on a high stage built for this purpose, or on the branches of a large tree, till the spring arrives. They then carry it, together with all those belonging to the same nation, to the general burial place, where it is interred with some other ceremonies.

"After the interment, the band to which the person belongs take care to fix near the place such hieroglyphics as shall show to future ages his merit and accomplishments. If any of these people die in the summer at a distance from the burying ground, and they find it impossible to remove the body before it putrefies, they burn the flesh from the bones, and, preserving the latter, bury them in the manner described.

"As the Indians believe that the souls of the deceased employ themselves in the same manner in the Country of Spirits as they did on earth, that they acquire their food by hunting and have there, also, enemies to contend with, they take care that they do not enter those regions defenseless and unprovided; they consequently bury with them their bows, their arrows and all other weapons used in either hunting or war. As they doubt not but they will likewise have occasion both for the necessaries of life and those things they esteem as ornaments, they usually deposit in their tombs such skins or stuffs as they commonly made their garments of, domestic utensils and paint for ornamenting their person.

"The near relations of the deceased lament his loss with an appearance of great sorrow and anguish; they weep and howl and make use of many contortions as they sit in the hut or tent around the body, when the intervals between the praise of the chiefs will permit.

"One formality in mourning for the dead among the Naudowessies is very different from any mode I observed in the other nations through which I passed. The men, to show how great their sorrow is, pierce the flesh of their arms above the elbows with arrows, the scars of which I could perceive on those of every rank in a greater or less degree, and the women cut and gash their legs with sharp broken flints till the blood flows very plentifully.

"The Indians in general are very strict in the observance of their laws relative to mourning for their dead. In some nations they cut off their hair, blacken their faces and sit in an erect posture with their heads closely covered and depriving themselves of every pleasure. This severity is continued for several months, and with some relaxations the appearance is sometimes kept up for several years. I was told that when the Naudowessies recollected any incidents of the lives of their deceased relations even after an interval of ten years, they would howl so as to be heard at a great distance. They would sometimes continue this proof of respect and affection for several hours, and if it happened that the thought occurred and the noise was begun towards the evening, those of their tribe who were at hand would join with them."

At a distance of some thirty miles below the Falls of St. Anthony is a large cave of remarkable depth. By the Indians it is called Wakon-Teebe, meaning the Dwelling of the Great Spirit. The entrance to this cave is about ten feet in width, the height at that point being about five feet. After passing the entrance, the conditions are immediately changed, the height or dome then reaching to an average of some fifteen feet, while the width extends to fully thirty feet. The floor or bottom of this cave consists of clear, fine sand. Not over twenty feet from the entrance, the explorer comes upon a lake of water which is perfectly transparent and extends to an unmeasured distance within. In this cave the explorer Carver found many hieroglyphics, the character of which indicated beyond doubt that they were of great age. These had been cut in a rude manner upon the walls, which were composed almost entirely of exceedingly soft stone which was easily manipulated with a knife-blade. At a short distance from this remarkable cavern lay the burying ground of several bands of the Naudowessie Indians. These people had no regular abiding place, going from one point to another as best suited their inclination. Nevertheless, they always preserved the bones of their dead with the greatest care until such time should arrive when they could once more deposit them in this particular spot.

The historian Parkman also treats of this subject in a lengthy and interesting manner, referring to the placing of the corpse, the attendance of friends and relatives, the wails of the mourners, speeches of the chieftains, the funeral feast, the gifts and games as similar to those already mentioned. He says, however, that the body was usually laid on a scaffold from whence at intervals of ten or a dozen years each of the four nations comprising the Huron Confederacy would gather their dead together and convey them to some given place as a sepulture. It was at this time, also, that the feast of the dead, always regarded by the Hurons as their most solemn and important ceremonial, was held. Such a ceremonial the writer refers to as having been called by the chiefs of the nation of the Bear in 1836. The interest on this occasion was intensified undoubtedly by the fact that some jealousies had arisen among the nations forming the confederacy which culminated in the refusal of some of them to take part in the general celebration, they announcing that they would hold their own feast apart from the rest. This determination, though meeting with strenuous opposition on the part of the oldest of the nation, was carried out. All those who had seceded from the guidance of the Sachems retired to their towns and villages to prepare their dead for burial.

The scene which followed, Parkman tells us, is almost beyond description. Corpses were taken from the scaffolds or removed from their graves and laid in a row, where they were surrounded by a weeping, shrieking, howling and frantic crowd. Here the remains of each were claimed by its own, who immediately proceeded to remove whatever flesh remained upon the bones, the latter then, after much caressing, being wrapt in skins and otherwise adorned. This excessive care was taken owing to the fact that it was a firm belief of the aborigines that the soul[1] still remained with them, only taking its flight after the great ceremony had been carried out to its completion.

A feast followed these preparatory arrangements, after which the mourners began their march towards Ossossane, where the final rites were to be performed. The bodies of those more recently dead which had not been disturbed were borne to this place on litters, while the packages of bones were slung across the shoulders of the relatives. In this manner the procession slowly marched through the forest, uttering at stated intervals, in unison, the wailing cry which was intended to imitate the voices of disembodied souls winging their way towards the Spirit Land. From every town along the way, with the exception of those who had rebelled, additions were made to the procession, the number being so great that the extensive houses at Ossossane were unequal to the task of accommodating all. In the meantime the national games and other exercises resorted to on similar occasions were being carried on, the youths and younger women combating in archery and other sports for prizes offered. Finally the time arrived for the chief ceremony, when all of the relics of the departed having been gathered together, the procession again formed, each section bearing its dead towards the spot allotted for the performance of the last rites. Arriving there, their remains or bundles were laid on the ground, while those bearing the funeral gifts spread them out to the view and for the admiration of those present. Then followed another feast, at the conclusion of which and numerous harangues attending it, the grave was prepared for the reception of the dead. Into this grave were cast all imaginable things, the entire orifice being lined with rich robes of the beaver. Three large copper kettles were also placed in the middle (in some instances many more were used, as many as twenty-six having been found in one grave), after which the remains were handed down to a number of Indians who had descended into the grave for that purpose and arranged by them in position. This task was followed by the arranging of the bones, which, released from their coverings of skin, were next thrown into the general sepulture. This part of the ceremony over, earth, logs and stones were piled upon the grave and the ceremony[2] was complete.

The Northern Algonquins had also a solemn feast of the dead, but it was widely different from that of the Huron, which is described by Lalemant in the Relation Des Hurons, 1642.

Tribal Government.

"There has always been a general tendency among the Europeans," says Ellis, "to overestimate the presence, method and the influence of anything to be properly called government in the internal administration of Indian tribes. The nearest approach to what we regard as organization, representation and joint fellowship among the Indians is presented to us in what is known as 'The Iroquois League,' which has had an imaginative delineation in the exquisite poem of Hiawatha, and approximately a truthful historical description by the late Lewis H. Morgan, an adopted member of the tribe and familiar from early years with its rich traditions. There seems to have been more of system and method in the confederated league of the tribes composing the union than there was of like organization in each of its component parts.

"In the several independent or even affiliated Indian tribes with which the Europeans came in contact from the first colonization, the latter assumed that there was a tolerably well-arranged method in each of them for the administration of affairs of peace and war by a chief and his council, who had an almost arbitrary authority; that he received tribute which was equivalent to a system of taxation; and that the proceeds constituted a sort of common treasury to be drawn upon for public uses. Many grievances alleged by Sachems at subsequent periods was that they ceased to pay the tribute which they had previously rendered to their chiefs. There may, therefore, have been instances, more or less defined, in which such usages prevailed among the tribes. But it is safe

(1) Not a few of these people believed that there were two souls, one of which remained with the bones, while the other departed at the time of death for the Land of Spirits.

(2) In a note attached to his general article on this subject, Parkman says: "For other descriptions of these rites, see Charlevoix, Bressani, Du Creux and especially Lafitau, in whose work they are illustrated with engravings. In one form or another they are widely prevalent. Bartram found them among the Floridian tribes. Traces of a similar practice have been observed in recent times among the Dakotas. Remains of places of sepulture evidently of kindred origin, have been found in Tennessee, Missouri, Kentucky and Ohio. Many have been discovered in several parts of New York, especially near the River Niagara. (See Squier, Aboriginal Monuments of New York.) This was the eastern extremity of the ancient territory of the Neuters. One of these deposits is said to have consisted of the bones of several thousand individuals. There is a large mound on Tonawanda Island, said by the modern Senecas to be a Neuter burial place. (See Marshall, Historical Sketches of the Niagara Frontier, 8.) In Canada West they are found throughout the region once occupied by the Neuters, and are frequent in the Huron district.

'Dr. Taché writes to me: 'I have inspected sixteen bone-pits (in the Huron country), the situation of which is indicated on the little pencil map I send you. They contain from six hundred to twelve hundred skeletons each of both sexes and all ages all mixed together purposely. With one exception, these pits also contain pipes of stone or clay, small earthen pots, shells and wampum wrought of these shells, copper ornaments, bits of glass and other trinkets. Some pits contained articles of copper of aboriginal Mexican fabric.'

"This remarkable fact, together with the frequent occurrence in these graves of large conch-shells of which wampum is made, and which could have been procured only from the Gulf of Mexico or some part of the southern coast of the United States, proves the extent of the relations of traffic by which certain articles were passed from tribe to tribe over a vast region. The transmission of pipes from the famous Red Pipe-Stone Quarry of the St. Peter's to tribes more than a thousand miles distant is an analogous modern instance, though much less remarkable.

"The Taché Museum at the Laval University, Quebec, contains a large collection of remains from these graves. In one instance, the human bones are of a size that may be called gigantic. In nearly every case, the Huron graves contained articles of use or ornaments of European workmanship. From this it may be inferred that the nation itself, or its practice of inhumation, does not date back to a period long before the arrival of the French."

to say that they were by no means general, still less indicative of a universal custom of Indian government. There was no occasion for endowing a chief, or for furnishing him a salary. The probability is that there has been more of organized and of administrative order in several of the tribes since the coming of the whites than there was before, and that modifications and adaptations of original Indian usages or a recourse to some wholly new ones have necessarily followed upon intimacy of relations with the strangers. When the whites wished to make a treaty with a tribe to obtain a grant of land or to execute any other like covenant, they would naturally call for such persons among them as had authority, executive and decisive, for acting for the tribes. These the whites called kings, chieftains, sachems, counselors; while the commonalty were called subjects. The facts certainly soon came to conform to this view of the whites; but it is doubtful whether such had previously been the state of things. Especially is it doubtful whether the members of a tribe considered themselves as subjects of their chief, in our sense of the word. Our term 'citizens' would more properly apply to them. They spoke of themselves as the people of the tribe."

The writer continues: "There was a wide variety as to headship and methods of organization among the scattered tribes of the aborigines on this continent. We find frequent instances in which headship was divided into two distinct functions, there being the chief for affairs of war and another for civil administration—a fighter and an orator. The 'Paw-waws,' priests or medicine-men, had functions in the government. Sometimes the hereditary headship ran in the male; sometimes in the female line, and occasionally it ran off into collateral branches. The holding of a headship, if its possessor was of marked ability, gave him a large range to assert authority and assured to him full liberty and acquiescence in its exercise. The ablest Indians with whom the whites have had the most serious relations in peace or war have been without exception the chiefs of their tribes. There have been but few of these great men born sovereigns and patriots compared with the vastly larger number of ordinary and petty Sachems who have held their places. Often, too, the character and qualities of the so-called subjects would influence the functions and authority of a chief as well as indicate what sort of man he had need to be.

"Under the term 'belts,' Europeans name the wrought and ornamented strips of skin or cloth in use by the natives, made by themselves and employed to signify or ratify covenants, pledges and treaties in their councils upon the more serious affairs among their own tribes or with the whites. As first known to the whites, through the Indians near the coast, these 'belts' called 'wampum' were often used as currency and ornaments. There they were made of little fragments of seashells; in the interior, of other hard and glittering fragments—glass, beads, etc. The laying them down or passing them from hand to hand marks emphatic points in an address, or impresses its close. The intent is that these 'belts' shall be preserved and identified with the occasion and pledge in giving and receiving them. The nomadic and inconstant habits of the natives do not favor this preservation, but in some instances they have been cherished and handed down through careful transmission in a tribe and acquired sacred associations."

By other and preceding authorities who visited and dwelt among the Indians before their habits and customs had become contaminated by close and frequent associations with the whites, we are told that there was a defined principle of government and rules pertaining to the conduct of the same among the aborigines. From these sources we learn that every separate body of Indians was divided into bands or tribes, each of which forms a little community by itself, although directly belonging to and dominated by the nation and its laws. Each nation is also distinguished by some particular symbol and each band or tribe has a badge peculiar to itself and by which it is recognized, such as that of the panther, tiger, buffalo or eagle. Among the numerous bands of the Naudowessie were to be found those of the tortoise, the squirrel, the wolf, the snake and the buffalo. So permanent, in fact, was this rule or law among all the nations that the very meanest member of a community was thoroughly grounded in his lineal descent, so that he could readily and unhesitatingly distinguish himself by his respective family[1].

Nations were also readily to be distinguished by the manner in which they constructed their dwellings, and, in fact, such adepts were they in this peculiar art that, while to the untrained eye there might not appear to be the slightest difference, they will readily discover even from so trivial an incident or circumstance as the position of a pole left in the ground what nation had encamped on that spot many months before. Of tribal government we are told that every band has a chief termed "the great chief," or "chief warrior," who is selected to that position for his known and tried valor and great experience in war. There is also another[2] who

(1) It was owing to this marked distinction of tribes, and the particular attachment of the Indians to them, that more than one authority has been given to express as his belief that this people originated from the Israelites.

(2) Though these two are considered as the heads of the band, and the latter is usually denominated their king, yet the Indians are sensible of neither civil nor military subordination. As everyone of them entertains a high opinion of his consequence, and is extremely tenacious of his liberty, all injunctions that carry with them the period of positive command are instantly rejected with scorn.

On this account, it is seldom that their leaders are so indiscreet as to give out any of their orders in a peremptory style; a bare hint from a chief that he thinks such a thing necessary to be done, instantly arouses an emulation among the inferior ranks and is immediately executed with great alacrity. By this method, the disgustful part of the command is evaded and an authority that falls little short of absolute sway instituted in its stead.—Carver.

directs in civil affairs, who might with all propriety be designated the Sachem of the tribe. To this chief belongs the important duty of making conveyances and treaties, and attending to other civil affairs, to each of which he affixes the mark of the tribe or nation.

So far from being arbitrary and dictatorial were the methods adopted by the head men and chiefs in the direction of the people, that it virtually appeared as though there was no government at all; nor could it be otherwise, for these people were most emphatic in their belief in personal rights and personal equality, and therefore would not for one moment allow such distinction as magistrate and subject, each, in fact, appearing to enjoy an uncontrollable and untrammeled independence. "The object of government among them," says Carver, "is rather foreign than domestic, for their attention seems more to be employed in preserving such a union among the members of their tribe as will enable them to watch the motions of their enemies, and to act against them with concert and vigor, than to maintain interior order by any public regulations. If the scheme that appears to be of service to the community is proposed by the chief, everyone is at liberty to choose whether he will assist in carrying it on; for they have no compulsory laws that lay them under any restrictions. If violence is committed or blood is shed, the right of revenging these misdemeanors is left to the family of the injured. The chiefs assume neither the power of inflicting nor moderating the punishment."

From the same authority, we gather the fact that in some nations, where the dignity is hereditary, succession is limited to the female line. For instance, when a chief dies, he sometimes is succeeded by his sister's son, although there may be one of his own living, or, perhaps, he failing to have a sister, the dignity is transferred to the next nearest female relation. In the general management of affairs, the interests of the family are carefully guarded, each being permitted (did they so desire) to appoint one of its chiefs to act as an assistant to the principal chief, who watches over the interests of his family and without whose consent no matter of a public character can be executed.

From his observations among the Indian tribes, Morse tells us that except in particular cases a majority of Indian nations are governed principally by the advice of their chiefs and the fear of punishment from the Evil Spirit, not only in this, but in the world to come.

Of their education, the same authority, in his report to the United States government, says: "A great deal of pains is taken by the chiefs and principal men to impress upon the minds of the younger part of their respective nations what they believed to be their duty to themselves and to each other. As soon as daylight appears, it is a custom among the Sauks and Foxes for the chief or principal man to go through their respective villages, exhorting and advising them in a very loud voice what to do and how to conduct themselves. Their families, in general, appear to be well regulated. All the laborious duties of the lodge and of the field, however, devolve upon the women, except what little assistance the old men are able to afford.

"The children, both boys and girls, appear to be particularly under the charge of their mothers; the boys until they are of a suitable age to handle the bow or the gun. Corporal punishment is seldom resorted to for correction. If they commit any fault deserving correction, it is common for their mother to blacken their faces and send them out of the lodge; when this is done, they are not allowed to eat until it is washed off; sometimes they are kept a whole day in this situation as punishment for their misconduct.

"When the boys are six or seven years of age, a small bow with arrows is put into their hands and they are sent out to hunt birds around the lodge, or village; this they continue to do five or six years, and then their father purchases them short guns and they begin to hunt ducks, geese, etc. Their father, particularly in winter evenings, will relate to them the manner of approaching the deer, elk, or buffalo; also the manner of setting a trap; and when able to he will take them hunting with him and show them the tracks of different animals. To all these instructions the boys pay earnest attention.

"The girls, as a matter of course, are under the direction of their mothers, who show them how to make moccasins, leggings and mats. The mother is very particular to keep them continually employed, so that they may have the reputation of being industrious girls, which is a recommendation to the young men."

In what has preceded on this subject has been given—necessarily in a somewhat fragmentary and limited manner—a description of the customs, habits and peculiarities of the American Indian. It is an interesting study, deserving of most careful consideration; for with the history of these people and their ways is indelibly intertwined that of a vast and important continent, and it therefore comes in a measure as a great disappointment that more time as well as space have not been afforded for its discussion. We have now, therefore, arrived at the time and place where must be given a brief description of the particular nations and tribes among whom the Jesuit missionaries labored in Canada, Wisconsin and other portions of the Northwest, to which undertaking we now propose to address ourselves with as little delay as commensurate with the importance of the theme.

One feature about the social side of Indian life—which may still, perhaps, in what we have said about it, remain too obscure—is the domestic, which illustrates the peculiar manner and conditions on which the Indian household was founded. This refers in particular to the result of their polyandrous marriages, which made the female side of the family wholly and entirely responsible for the line of descent. It was in fact a direct reversal of all other conditions then and now known; the offspring, to the utter ignoring of the paternal side of the house, being recognized as their child by the entire tribe, relying on the mother and the members of her family for those rights always accruing to one of legitimate birth. "The mother is a fact," says one authority, "whose relation to her offspring cannot be disturbed by any fictitious device or social complexity; but in polyandry fatherhood at once becomes obscure and indiscriminate." This condition virtually made an uncle of the father; or rather he was equivalent to one, he having been born not as one of a family of brothers, but rather of a family of cousins. "So," continues the same authority, "the grandfather is not a grandfather but a granduncle; the line of motherhood, however, stands fast, for the child cannot have one of several mothers, but only his own. Motherhood, but not fatherhood, is thus determinate and fixed." Thus it will be seen a tribe became more and more centralized, the condition of polyandry supervening to such an extent that if a man went out of his own tribe to marry, he did not bring his wife to that tribe, but went over to hers. With this kind of an arrangement "the individuality of the man can at most be maintained only during his life, his blood merging with that of the tribe of his wife. His children are necessarily of that tribe; but since polyandry is the rule, they, as a matter of fact, may not be his own. But then as a direct result of this peculiar condition of affairs, no feeling could be more intense than that which bound each warrior to his clan."

The effects of these conditions, which almost universally prevailed among the North American tribes, was to bring about two diverse results. Under these peculiar influences in the Northwest, as particularly seen among the Tinnehs, women attained a respectable rank, while among those dwelling in the Central and extremely Southern parts of what at present constitutes the United States, the case was entirely the reverse. Among the Algonquins, Hurons, Iroquois, and other tribes, we are told women sank to a level of slavery and social degradation. Unhonored and despised of man, they were veritably made the hewers of stone and drawers of water, the family drudge and beast of burden, but little, if any, of the heavy labors falling to the man. The male, in fact, had an inborn dislike for work, and cultivated to an extraordinary degree that characteristic. Only on rare occasions, as it became evident that the work which had been undertaken was beyond the strength of the woman, did he ever render the slightest assistance. His duties were simply to follow the warpath and to provide what food was necessary for subsistence. He also made his own clothing, moccasins and leggings, tanning the hides from which they were produced. Then, as now, the Indian was remarkably improvident in preparing for the days to come; and thus, as a result of this carelessness and indifference, they were rarely known to accumulate any property.

Of education, in the sense in which we to-day receive it, the Indian races knew nothing; and it is doubtful if the most enlightened among the nations would have conceived the development of intellectual powers by means of educational institutions, had it not been for their association with the whites. In fact, there is nothing pointing to anything in the way of a school among these people prior to their partial enlightenment through closer association with the whites. Indian education, however, resolved itself into a spiritual desire on part of the young to attain a similar proficiency in the arts peculiar to their times, as that accomplished by their progenitors, and not through any excessive interest shown by the latter to instruct them. "For this reason," says Ridpath, "the education of the Indian youth was the education of instinct and observation. He learned to do what his father did, and in so doing learned also the limited range of his father's thought and imagination. This included the practical arts of building, canoe-making, weapon-making, garment-making, and also the art of writing. The latter art some of the Indian tribes possessed, but it existed in the hieroglyphic stage.

"Perhaps no other people possessed a truer picture-writing than that produced by the Indians. It was wholly pictorial and allegorical, and therefore universal. The Indians were not without skill in inventing and making the symbolic characters of their system. They discovered those substances, chiefly the bark of trees, on which the writing might be most easily executed. The Indian scribes might readily address on the outer or inner bark of the tree the hieroglyphic in which information rather than thought was conveyed. In the nature of things the allegory would run to fact; exigencies of Indian life required that the writing employed should relate to facts and events, with only an occasional symbol of a truly ideal character. The delineation was generally done with rude but significant skill which the reader could hardly mistake. Many conventionalities were introduced, some of which had respect to the particular tribe employing the system, and others of a more general character, significant to all Indians, and indeed to all men."

ONE of the most widely distributed families of whom we shall take cognizance is that of the Algonquins,[1] who were distributed over a vast territory.[2] Those designated as Eastern Algonquins occupied the country south of the Great Lakes down to the northern borders of Carolina, while the home of the Western Algonquins reached up as high as the 55th parallel of north latitude, and extended east and west from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic. This family was divided into four groups or tribes, the first of which comprised the nation of the Knisteneaux, between Lakes Winnipeg and Athabasca; the Ottawas, in the valley of the Ottawa River and around Lake Huron; the Chippewas of Upper Canada and the Northwest, and the Montagnais of Southern Labrador. The second division, or Eastern branch, consisted of the Mikmaks of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the Abenaquis of Eastern New England, the Penobscots, the Mohicans, the Pequods, the Manhattans and the Leni-Lennappes of Delaware. The third, or Southern division, included the Powhattans of Virginia, the Rappahannocks, Panticoes of Carolina and the Shawnees of the Central Western States. The last, or Western branch, included the Illinois, the Miamis of Ohio and Indiana, the Pottawattomies of Michigan, the Kaskaskias, the Michigamies, Sacs, Foxes, Cheyennes, Arapahoes and Blackfeet.

It is with these people the whites had what may be termed the larger historical acquaintance, and undoubtedly from them, as believes one learned authority, the popular system of Indian character has been more largely derived.

Of the Algonquin language it may be said, as of most others among the American tribes, that it was not poor in nominal or descriptive words, but rather that those two elements constituted its real strength. Of its extent, Ridpath tells us that there was a marked absence of the power of abstraction and generalization in the Indian mind, the result being that their words had a narrow, acute and useful significance. Thus he continues, "particular trees or kinds of trees would be named, while the general notion of a tree and the corresponding term would be wanting. It was easy for an Indian to name a tall, white-bark tree by the spring; more difficult for him to name the birch trees; most difficult for him to name forest trees in general; impossible for him to

(1) Drake tells us that the Algonkins, as he called them, were scattered over a greater portion of Canada from low down the St. Lawrence to Lake of the Woods.

The principal and most numerous among the several primitive stocks or families was that of the Algonquins, a name given by the early French discoverers to a tribe of this family living on the St. Lawrence River near Quebec, whose descendants are now (1885) residing partially civilized at the Lake of Two Mountains in Canada. Judging from their oral traditions, and the specimens of their different languages, which have been made public by various writers, travelers and missionaries, nearly every tribe originally discovered by the Europeans residing on the shores of the Atlantic from the Gulf of St. Lawrence south to the mouth of the James River in Virginia, and the different tribes occupying the vast area lying west and northwest of this eastern boundary to the banks of the Mississippi from the mouth of the Ohio to Hudson Bay, belong to the Algic family.—Warren.

(2) The vast tracts of wilderness from the Mississippi to the Atlantic and from the Carolinas to Hudson Bay were divided between two great families of tribes, distinguished by a radical difference of language. A part of Virginia and of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Southeastern New York, New England, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and also Canada were occupied, so far as occupied at all, by tribes speaking the Algonquin languages and dialects. They extended moreover along the shores of the upper lakes, and into the dreary northern wastes beyond. They were in Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, and Indiana, and detached bands ranged the lonely hunting grounds of Kentucky. (a).

Like a great island in the midst of the Algonquins lay the country of the tribes speaking the generic tongue of the Iroquois.

(a) The word Algonquin is here used in its broadest signification. It was originally applied to a group of tribes north of the River St. Lawrence. The difference of language between the original Algonquins and the Abenaquis of New England, the Ojibways of the Great Lakes or the Illinois of the West correspond to the difference between French and Italian or Italian and Spanish. Each of these languages again had its dialects, like those in different provinces of France.

name the vegetable kingdom. This disposition in thought and in speech runs through every avenue of Indian mentality and every department of his language. It was true of noun, adjective and verb. The Indian could easily speak of killing-a-buck-with-an-arrow, of taking-a-fish-with-a-hook, of cutting-a-burnt-sapling-with-his-hatchet, of setting-a-bear-trap, and hundreds of other specific actions; but he could not say to hunt, to fish, to chop, to strap, nor could he readily express any abstract verbal act. All words were narrow and intensified to a remarkable degree. The avenues to abstract reasoning to broad generalization were closed alike in Indian thought and in the forms of that speech in which the thought sought expression."

Another peculiarity of the Indian language was a marked desire for specialization, and hence a general unwillingness "with the different classes, so far as such classes existed among the Indians, to use the same forms of expression." It was therefore commonly understood that each class should understand the language or speech of the other, but that each in turn should use the language belonging to his particular class. Thus Ridpath tells us there was a language of chieftainship; the chief had a certain "noble tongue" which he used and which his tribesmen and squaws understood, and to which they responded, but not in like terms. Co-relatively the chieftain understood the language of his braves and women, but used it as little as practicable. There was also a brave language as well as a squaw language, and to a certain extent a pappoose language. The squaw and her husband in communicating did not use the same vocabulary, or used it only in parts; the brave spoke in the brave speech, and the squaw in hers.

Reference to this subject would not be complete, however, without a few words regarding the principal features of the Huron-Iroquois languages, a people so closely related with the present work. "It is possible," says Ridpath, "that the language of the tribes so named rose to the highest level attained by any of the Indian races within the borders of the United States. The feature of Huron-Iroquois speech, however, were common to all the Indian languages with only specific developments. Thus, for instance, every noun might become a verb, or vice versa. The article and the preposition were wanting, and the adjectives few. There was the same absence of case and gender endings, the same involution of the pronoun with the verb, and the same fluctuation of verbal post-position to denote whether the subjects of the actions expressed were animate or inanimate. Such features prevailed also in the language of the Athabascans and the Dakotas. The reader must understand that there was, however, a large dialectal difference presenting itself in each of these different tongues. Some had differentiated in one direction and others in another. Even the subordinate tribes of the Dakotas could not understand each other, or understood but vaguely without an interpreter. As the inquirer passes from nation to nation, he notes a constant transformation of the vocabulary and the appearance and disappearance of dialectal peculiarities. These laws of mutation continue to operate through all the races of our continent, producing as their results an array of active dialects which none could number or define, and larger groups of languages rising gradually and coalescing on certain lines of identity, along which all of them were to be interpreted and understood."

The Algonquin nation was not of a progressive character—that is, at least so far as general industries were concerned, being satisfied to limit their experiments and labors in that direction to what was absolutely necessary. In this they were guided according to their social or personal status, in which they might perhaps more satisfactorily be graded from a state of almost absolute barbarism upwards to a semi-civilized condition. The Algonquins, like others of the aborigines, followed agriculture to an extremely limited extent, raising corn, squashes, beans and tobacco in quantities to supply their absolute needs, but no more. Of iron, until learning of its value from the white man, they had no knowledge whatever, and but a limited acquaintance with the use of copper, though some of the more advanced among them smelted that metal. Generally, however, the native ore was hammered into shape for weapons, but rarely used for utensils. In the matter of weapons, too, they made but little, if any advance, manufacturing their own from those which had been left by their predecessors, and making no effort whatever to improve on the character or style of the article made. Of the stone weapons and implements made by the American Indians, Ridpath says: "These were with few exceptions the work of the unknown pre-historic peoples who had previously occupied the continent. To the present day the relics of this former race are abundantly distributed throughout Central North America. The Indian races inherited or took from their predecessors the remains of their civilization. These remains included a varied supply of stone implements. These weapons and tools belonged to the Palaedlithic and the Neolithic age.

"It was optional," continues our authority, "with the red man whether he would seek his tomahawk already made to hand by some stonesmith of the pre-historic age, or would make one for himself. The Indians chose to avail themselves largely of the relics left behind by the former races. As a rule, the arrow tip and spearhead which the hunter and warrior sent flying against the enemy or thrust into the brown bear, were the work of predecessors of whom he knew nothing, even by tradition. Out of the relics thus left by a former race the Indians for the most part devised their weapons. They were very skillful in attaching to wooden handles the stone points which they found or occasionally made for themselves."

Their perfection in this art tended largely towards the manufacturing of spears, arrows and tomahawks, owing undoubtedly to the fact that the greater part of their time and education was given to warfare and hunting. Of their manufacture of domestic utensils much less has been said, and it is undoubtedly true that they were less skillful in the production of these articles.

As builders, the Indians exhibited considerable ingenuity, although at times their efforts were far from successful. With the building of a wigwam, however, nearly all were most thoroughly conversant, rapidly and skillfully bringing together a conical frame building of sufficient dimensions to accommodate their families. These buildings were as a rule erected indiscriminately and according to the momentary inspiration of the builder. This was not always the case, however, as with the Huron-Iroquois, who built towns of considerable proportion on symmetrical lines. In some sections of the country logs were used and substantial dwellings erected, but these, of course, were the exception.

As we have previously stated, the art of progression was unknown, or at least remained unchallenged by the Indians, they preferring to undertake only that which was absolutely necessary for them to accomplish. In the making of some articles, however, they were exceedingly skillful, one of the principal arts to which they adapted their energies being that of canoe building. This article is described by Ridpath as follows: "The Indian canoe was made in one of three ways; either the bark of the birch or some other suitable tree was peeled off and very skillfully wrought into the form of a boat, or else the tree itself was taken and cut or burned into shape; and sometimes the canoe-maker availed himself of a whole trunk, but this was rare. The bark canoe was the most elegant of all; it was light to a degree, quite beautiful in form and thoroughly impervious to water. The owner might easily carry his boat from place to place. It was not lacking in strength. The shape was such as to favor rapid motion in the water. The oarsman propelled himself either with the paddle or with a pole reaching to the bottom. He had skill in boatmanship—could skim the lake or shoot the rapid without peril to himself or his fragile craft."

In addition to this accomplishment, the Indians were adepts in tanning skins, manufacturing baskets, making wicker-work, rough images of objects, and weaving. Their most skillful work in decorations was that made upon their garments. Besides this, they quite thoroughly understood the manufacture of several varieties of paints, some of which were intensely durable and brilliant.

The government of the Algonquins, as elsewhere stated, as regards the Indian in general, was fundamentally a chieftainship. This chief did not resemble the patriarch or father of his clan, but was rather a leader. Every tribe had its chief, who thus became the head man and leader of that community. In this particular office heredity counted but little, as that priority which came of descent could easily be displaced and put aside in favor of actual merit. For instance, one authority tells us that if a young warrior not immediately related to the chief should rise and display such courage and prowess in battle as to win the admiration of his tribesmen, he became by that act their leader. There were two grades of chieftainship among them, the great and the small, both of which were decided or settled upon by natural selection.

Almost every tribe in the Algonquin, as in other nations, maintained its council hall, which was regarded as the central seat of power and authority. Nearly all of the laws observed by these people had sprung from usage, and consequently tradition played no little part in all of their deliberations. As an evidence of this, it may be stated that the Indian orator almost invariably began his speech or oration by referring to the customs, habits and claims of his ancestors.

In religion, the Algonquins believed, as did most others, in the existence of a Great Spirit and ruler, to whom was due both worship and sacrifice. They were very exacting regarding their sacrifices or ceremonies pertaining to this and other deities, to whom they made extensive and valuable gifts. On this Great Spirit, however, the Indian did not rely for success, welfare and happiness as much as on dreams and the good will of local deities, such as they believed had the power of inflicting good or evil, as they desired. Some of their views regarding nature were intensely curious and interesting. Of this peculiar characteristic Ridpath writes: "Many of these theories refer the creation of the world to animals, such as the beaver, the bear or the buffalo; the supposed possession of these creatures by unseen spirits was at the bottom of such belief. The heavenly bodies were conceived as being near to earth and of small dimensions. The sky was a roof which might be broken through. The stars were sometimes regarded as points of fracture in the cerulean roof overhead." The Algonquin also was a firm believer in a life hereafter and that the country he was to occupy in that higher sphere was one of great beauty, abounding in all of these luxuries so dear to his heart.

The Hurons.

As the reader is doubtless already aware, the Indian nation most closely allied with historical events which marked the settlement of Canada by the French and note the introduction and spread of religious observance throughout that country, was that of the Hurons, whose close relation with the whites, steady adherence to the teachings of the Jesuit Fathers, terrible losses from famine and disease, and almost utter extinction at the hands of their hereditary foe, the Iroquois, marked a page of bloodshed and disaster unequaled in the annals of that country. According to Parkman, considerably over two centuries have elapsed since the Hurons may be said to have entirely vanished from their original haunts. Those who followed—the sturdy white men who pioneered throughout the then unmeasured primeval—found many indications of active human life which pervaded those districts prior to their coming. Of the extent of character of the people, however, who had thus inherited the place, there was not a vestige of information; and so, though knowing, they virtually knew not, until by means of axe and plough were unearthed many secrets which told plainly—as such silent evidences can—of the character and ways of those who had preceded them.

Often when ploughing the soil unusual obstructions were met with, which, when examined, proved to be the contents of huge pits wherein they had been carefully packed; skeletons and bones, together with weapons, utensils of copper, trinkets and beads, which spoke of life both wild and artistic; and, told in their muteness of devices and observances, left no doubt in the minds of those who discovered them that these people had been dominated by certain beliefs or superstitions which might safely have been denominated a religion. That authority, speaking of those times and discoveries, says: "Not even the straggling Algonquins who lingered about the scene of Huron prosperity can tell their origin. Yet on ancient worm-eaten pages, between covers of grim parchment, the daily life of this community, its fire-sides, its festivals, its funeral rites are painted with minute and vivid fidelity."

What was originally the abiding place and home of the Hurons is now recognized as the northern and eastern portion of Simcoe County, Canada West, which is within the peninsula formed by the Nottawassaga and Matchedash bays of Lake Huron, the River Severn and Lake Simcoe. Thus the area was comparatively small, although the population was extensive. To be more definite as regards this matter, it may be stated that in 1639 the Jesuits then residing among them gained an enumeration of their villages and people which resulted in a showing of thirty-two villages and hamlets, seven hundred dwellings, four thousand families, twelve thousand adults and twenty thousand in all. In his Relation of 1640, Lalemant tells us that there were two families for every fire. According to the authority we are quoting, a Huron family usually numbered from five to eight persons, but of course the total number varied considerably with each succeeding year, so that no absolutely or rather lasting definite number can be fixed, it remaining alone to be said that the figures as given were undoubtedly not in excess of the actual number.

During their visit among these people, in 1615, both Champlain and le Caron reckoned the number of Huron towns at seventeen or eighteen, allowing a total population of about ten thousand adults. Twenty years later Brebeuf counted twenty villages, whose combined population he estimated at thirty thousand. Subsequently le Mercier and Dollier de Casson and the anonymous writer of the Relation of 1660 placed the Huron population at from thirty to thirty-five thousand.

The country in which the Hurons originally dwelt was an intermingling of luxuriant meadow lands and dense forests, through and across which in uncertain and devious angles ran the narrow trails or footpaths which led from one town or village to another. Some of these towns and even villages were more pretentious than others, being well and securely fortified, although not a few of them were in an entirely defenseless condition. The buildings in these villages were constructed of bark, the style and character adopted being similar to those used by all tribes of Iroquois lineage. These settlements covered an area of ground consistent with the number of the population, each family occupying anywhere from one to ten acres, the buildings being located entirely in accord with the fancy of those erecting them, generally in clusters, without any attention being given to order or form of arrangement. The buildings themselves were from thirty to thirty-five feet in length and breadth, although not a few were much larger, some being of enormous proportions.[1] As to the shape of these buildings, they were arched, having much the appearance of the entrance to a garden bower; the frames were made of tall saplings fixed firmly in the ground on either side, the tops of them being bent till they met in the center, where they were lashed firmly together. Other poles were then bound to these transversely, and over the whole were placed large sheets of bark of oak, elm, spruce or white cedar, which were laid over one another as are the shingles of to-day. These were held securely in place by split poles, which were made fast near to their edges by means of cords woven from linden bark. Light was admitted, and smoke from the interior found means of egress through an opening a foot in width, which was left at the crown of the arch along the entire length of the building. At each end of the building were compartments for storage, in which were placed casks of bark filled with edibles, such as smoked fish, Indian corn and other supplies not subject to the attacks of frost. Inside of these buildings the arrangements were often dissimilar; in some, wide platforms four feet in height were built along either side, while in other instances they were raised but a foot from the ground and did not exceed twelve or thirteen feet in length, intervening spaces being arranged for the storage of the family's provisions and other household articles. In the latter case, however, there was an additional platform built some five or six feet above the lower one, which was generally occupied by the children. It was upon these supports that the family slept, occupying them during the summer time indiscriminately and always sleeping in the clothes which they had worn during the day.

(1) The permanent bark villages of the Dakotas of the St. Peters are the nearest modern approach to the Huron towns. The whole Huron country abounds with evidences of having been occupied by a numerous population. "On a close inspection of the forests," Dr. Tache writes to me, "the greatest part of what seems to have been cleared at former times, and almost the only places bearing the character of the primitive forest, are the low grounds."—Parkman.

In his Relation of 1635 Brebeuf also reports Champlain as saying that he saw them in 1615 more than thirty fathoms long, while Vanderdonck reports the length from actual measurement of an Iroquois house at 180 yards, or 540 feet.

Still another and most excellent description of these dwellings is given by the historian Sagard, and there is another also of equal value and importance in the writings upon this subject by Cartier. The platforms we have mentioned were formed of thicknesses of bark supported by a post and pole frame, the whole when completed being covered with mats and skins. Of the life within, Parkman says: "Here in the summer was the sleeping place of the inmates, and the space beneath served for storage of their firewood. Fires were on the ground in a line down the middle of the house, which sufficed for two families, who in winter slept closely packed around them. Above, just under the vaulted roof, were a great number of poles like the perches of a hen roost, and here were suspended weapons, clothing, skins and ornaments. Here, too, in harvest-time the squaws hung the ears of unshelled corn till the rude abode through all its length seemed decked with a golden tapestry. In general, however, its only lining was a thick coating of soot from the smoke of fires with neither draft, chimney nor window. So pungent was the smoke that it produced inflammation of the eyes, attended in old age with frequent blindness. Another annoyance was the fleas, and a third the unbridled and unruly children. Privacy there was none. The house was one chamber, sometimes lodging more than twenty families. He who entered on a winter night beheld a strange spectacle; the vista of fires lighting the smoky concave; the bronzed groups encircling each—cooking, eating, gambling, or amusing themselves with idle badinage; shriveled squaws, hideous with three score years of hardship; grizzly old warriors, scarred with Iroquois war-clubs; young aspirants, whose honors were yet to be won; damsels, gay with ochre and wampum; restless children, pell-mell with restless dogs. Now a tongue of resinous flame painted each wild feature in vivid light; now the fitful gleam expired and the group vanished from sight as their nation has vanished from history."

The towns, to which the Hurons paid more particular attention as regards their fortifications as a means of repelling the stealthy and deliberate advance of the enemy, were to a greater extent made on the side of their territory which was more exposed to the numerous raids and incursions of the Iroquois. Here also was noticeable, as in the construction of their houses, their arrangement and marked similarity; in fact, it would seem as though their range and knowledge of architecture was limited to one idea which, seemingly answering their purpose, was deemed unnecessary to improve upon. These arrangements possibly could not very well have been improved upon, this being particularly the case in the selection of a site for such purposes, which was generally made on the bank of a lake, the crown of a hill difficult of access, or some elevated point of land situated in the fork of confluent rivers. Having decided upon the location, they first of all excavated a wide ditch of considerable depth around the entire site of the village, the earth from which was thrown up from the inside of the excavation. Then, although it required much laborious effort on their part, a large number of trees were felled (these were either burnt off near the ground or hacked down with stones or hatchets) and planted around the edge of the embankment as palisades. "These palisades,"[1] Parkman tells us, "were built in three or four concentric rows, those of each row inclining towards those of the other rows until they intersect, the whole being lined within, to the height of a man, with sheets of bark. At the top where these palisades crossed was arranged a gallery of timber to be used by the defenders; and in addition to this, there were built

(1) Parkman refers to the fact that there was no mathematical regularity shown in the construction of these works, their form being entirely guided by the nature of the case. It was not infrequently the case, therefore, that a precipice or river proved all sufficient for a partial defense, in such instance the line of embankment occurring only on one or two sides. It is also the opinion of that writer that the palisade was planted prior to the heaping and packing of the earth around it. He also refers to the fact that Brebeuf states in his Relation that as early as the year 1636 the Jesuit fathers taught the Hurons how to build rectangular palisade works with bastions. We learn still further from the same authority that the Iroquois adopted the same practice at a still earlier period, but omitted ditching the embankment, and it is therefore probable that even in their earliest defenses, the palisades, where the ground was of a character to readily give way to what implement they had at command, were planted in holes dug for that purpose. Such, he states, was evidently the case with the Iroquois fortress which was attacked by Champlain in 1615.

As an evidence of the general character of these defenses among the Indian tribes, we, in addition, allude to Beverly's History of Virginia, in which he states that the Muscogees with other Southern tribes, and occasionally the Algonquins, had palisaded towns; but the palisades were usually but a single row planted upright. The tribes of Virginia occasionally surrounded their dwellings with a triple palisade.

a number of wooden gutters by means of which streams of water could be poured upon any fires which might be kindled by the enemy. Other means of defense were to be found in large accumulations of magazines of stones ready at hand for immediate use, and numerous rude ladders to be used in mounting to the ramparts.

In the territory occupied by the Hurons there was no particular allotment made by those people of any stipulated area of land, each family rather for the time being maintaining exclusive right of as much as they desired or were able to cultivate. To arrange and prepare this land for cultivation demanded an extraordinary amount of patience and labor, as the country wherein they dwelt was heavily wooded, and the implements at their command were of the crudest character. In preparing for a crop, therefore, it was necessary for them to chop or break off the branches from each tree, piling the same around its base and then setting fire to the whole. This but rarely resulted in the felling of the trunk, which afterwards was subjected to a hacking process with stone implements, by means of which it was finally brought to the ground. This much done, the squaws set to work with hoes of wood and bone, by means of which they stirred up the soil around the stumps sufficiently to sow their corn, beans, sunflowers, tobacco, pumpkins, or Huron hemp. In the management and care of this ground no fertilizers whatever were applied, so that after having been in continuous use for from one to three decades, it became sterile and unproductive. After such length of residence it became necessary to go long distances in order that the proper supply of firewood might be obtained, and as a result of these combined conditions the town or village was moved, or rather abandoned, and a new one built.

The country in which the Hurons dwelt was particularly noticeable for its scarcity of game, and hence these people were to a considerable extent compelled to resort to other means of sustenance. Thus corn became their staple food, the same being cooked in various forms, without the application of salt, making at best a most unpalatable dish. Venison, we are told, was a great rarity with the Hurons, being remarkably scarce and therefore particularly prized; in fact, so scarce was it or had it become that it was used only on an occasion of note, and then of necessity in limited quantities. Of other dishes, dog flesh was highly esteemed, and in some of the towns captive bears were fattened for festive occasions. Perhaps it was owing to these conditions that the Hurons displayed less improvidence than their roving neighbors, the Algonquins, usually storing a considerable quantity of provisions in case a season of excessive drought might come upon them. To this end the greater portion of their corn crop was buried in caches or deep holes, either within their homes or near by. Another thing noticeable about these resident or stationary tribes as compared with those having no regular abiding place was a prevalence towards domestic art. The women became quite expert in the manufacture of earthen vessels for cooking, and were also adepts at weaving rush mats, spinning twine from hemp, from which they made nets. They extracted oil from fish and from the seeds of the sunflower, the latter being used probably entirely for toilet purposes.

In the preparation of their corn and maize for food they broke and pulverized it in large wooden bowls, which had been hollowed out of a solid block by alternately burning and scraping.

Prior to the coming of the French among them, their axes, hatchets, spear and arrowheads, fishhooks and other articles of a like nature had been molded or made from stone or bone, many, however, as we have heretofore stated, having been handed down from preceding generations. The French had been among them but a short time before the use of these crude articles was to a considerable extent discontinued, similar ones of iron and steel taking their places. It must be said that the Hurons had always proven themselves remarkably skillful in the construction of these now discarded implements. But their most thorough appreciation of the artistic was evidenced in their construction of the birch canoe, in which their skill was little short of marvelous. In the manufacture of pipes they also showed ingenuity, owing perhaps largely to the importance attached by them to that particular. These were made in great variety of baked clay and various kinds of stone, which were grafted into most curious and fantastic shapes by the men during the hours of enforced leisure. Then, too, there was the wampum, consisting of white and purple beads and curiously grafted shells, which were wrought together with most remarkable skill. This particular art, we are told, went into disuse with the advent of the French, who supplied them with a better article than their own, as well as a great variety and abundance of glass and porcelain beads, which, strung into necklaces or wrought into collars, bracelets and belts, soon became the favorite decoration of the Indians on festive occasions or at dances. Like other tribes, they adopted it as a means of correspondence, or illustration used on more momentous occasions, such as the settlement of tribal disputes or treaties with other nations, and being hieroglyphically arranged to suit the occasion, were kept as mementos or records of the same. The Hurons had also a system of crude pictures and signs by means of which they could with some approach to clearness demonstrate certain conditions or convey ideas touching subjects of ordinary interest.

The dress of these people was composed largely of skins which were smoke-cured, a system peculiar to the Indian. That of the women, Parkman tells us, according to the Jesuits was more modest than that "of all our most pious ladies of France." The exception to this, however, was the costume worn by the young girls of the tribe on festal occasions, which consisted of a kilt from the waist to the knee, in addition to which they wore wampum decorations on the breast and arms. On such occasions, also, their hair, which was worn long and flowing, was gathered behind the neck and decorated with pieces of native copper or showy pendants made in France, some of which are occasionally discovered in Huron graves. During the summer months the men of the tribe wore little, if anything, except their moccasins; but in the winter they were clad in tunics and leggins of skin, and on all occasions of ceremony they were wrapt from head to foot in robes of beaver or otter furs, some of which were of priceless value. The insides of these robes of state were generally decorated with painted figures and devices, or embroidered[1] with the dyed quills of the Canada hedge-hog.

The men wore their hair in a variety of fashions. On occasions of full dress, the Hurons painted themselves with ochre, white clay, soot, and the root juice of certain berries. They also practiced the art of tattooing, sometimes covering the entire body with more or less artistic designs. To the condition of life experienced by the Huron women there was no bright side, her entire existence being circumscribed, as Parkman tells us, by a youth of license and an age of drudgery. Of other features of Huron life, such as matronhood, motherhood and home life in general, as pertaining to both the men and the women, their traffic with other nations, their festivals and dances—warlike, social or religious—their methods of torture, their use of simples in the cure of disease, the power and position of their medicine-man and doctor, and similar traits and customs, we have already referred to at length in the preceding portion of this article. Having in most cases a marked similarity to those of other nations and tribes, it is inconsequent and unnecessary to individualize them at this time to any further extent.

Huron-Iroquois.

More closely allied, perhaps, than any other nation with the Hurons, was the family of the Huron-Iroquois, better known to the people of to-day as the Tionnontates or Tobacco nation. They dwelt in the heavily timbered valleys of the Blue Mountains, immediately south of the Nottawassaga Bay in Lake Huron, and some two days' journey to the west of the outlying Huron towns. These people counted in all some nine villages, and closely resembled the Hurons both in manners and language. In earlier times these two factions or sections of the Indian family were continually at war with one another; at the time of which we speak they had come to a peaceable arrangement, and in 1640 were close friends and confederates. In fact, one writer remarks, that in the ruin which finally befell the Huron nation, the Tionnontates alone retained a tribal organization, and their descendants, with a trifling exception, are to the present day the sole inheritors of the Huron or Wyandot name.

For a long period, many generations, in fact, after the disintegration of these people, this particular branch maintained a marked influence among the tribes of the West. Of all the tribes round about, these were perhaps the most thrifty and the best examples of an advanced commercial understanding, for they raised considerable in the way of crops for the market and did an extensive trade in tobacco with other tribes. How far their influence in a commercial way would have extended we are unable to state, as the Hurons, through whose country they were compelled to pass in order to reach the French settlements, would not permit them to do so, preferring to obtain all the advantages accruing from traffic in French merchandise.

At a distance of five days' journey from the villages of the Tobacco nation lay the territory of the Neutrals, which, some forty leagues in extent, embraced a wide and fertile district on the north shore of Lake Erie, while the frontier extended eastward across the Niagara, where they had erected three or four outlying towns. These people were first visited by a white man in the person of the Franciscan friar, Father Dallion, who at that particular time estimated the number of towns to be twenty-eight, in addition to which there were numerous smaller villages and hamlets. Lalemant, in his Relation of 1641, estimates the entire Neutral population at twelve thousand, and the number of villages forty. One peculiar custom pertaining to these people was that of burning their female prisoners, an act which, although sometimes perpetrated by the Iroquois, was never charged to the Huron nation.

Neutrals, Eries and Andastes.

The territory occupied by the Neutrals abounded with game, in the capture or destruction of which they were most skillful. Physically they were larger and more powerful than the Hurons, whom they resembled in their methods of living, language and other characteristics. One remarkable custom of theirs was to keep their dead in their houses until even Indian stoicism could not withstand the overpowering results. They then scraped the flesh from the bones, displaying the latter in rows along the walls, where they remained in place till the periodical burying feast occurred.

(1) The art of embroidery as practiced by the Hurons was said to be fully equalled, if not surpassed, by some of the Algonquin tribes.

As in the case of the Tionnontates, the Neutrals were refused the right of transit through the Huron country to the French settlements. To people of ordinary sense or observation this would have caused but little uneasiness, as the most easy and satisfactory route to the trading posts lay along the waters of Lake Ontario. This, however, they failed to see, and as a consequence the Hurons reaped the benefits, exchanging large quantities of French goods at enormous profits for Neutral furs.

Across Lake Erie, and for some considerable distance south and east of that body of water, lay the territory of the Eries, who were also known as the nation of the Cat. Of these people very little is known, excepting the fact that they are supposed to have occupied the southwestern portion of New York, their eastern boundary extending as far as the River Genesee, which found its source in Chautauqua Lake and emptied into Lake Ontario at Fort des Sables, forming the boundary line of the Senecas. In addition to this rather meager information, we have from the reliable authority of Ragueneau the fact that they were similar in habits and in a majority of their characteristics to the Hurons. As fierce and vengeful warriors they were both noted and feared, and the havoc they caused among the foe with their poisoned arrows long made them a terror among the predatory tribes of the country. A little farther south, and almost in the heart of the Appalachian Mountains, their northern frontier being defined by the lower Susquehanna, dwelt the Andastes. These fierce and warlike people were also interwoven to a considerable extent with the earlier history of the country, although but little in the way of actual fact is known as regards their origin and previous history.

The Iroquois.

But of all the tribes known to the early explorers and settlers of this continent who carried terror and devastation to the point of extermination among the peoples of their own race, and harassed and retarded the progress of settlement and civilization in their repeated and ruthless attacks upon the French, the Iroquois stand forth most prominent. Their home lay in the central portion of the State of New York, what might be considered its actual boundary[1] lines terminating on the east with the Hudson River, and was defined on the west by the Genesee. Of these people the historian Parkman says: "Among all the barbarous nations of the continent, the Iroquois of New York stand paramount. Elements which among other tribes were crude, confused and embryonic, were among them systematized and concreted into an established polity. The Iroquois was the Indian of Indians. A thorough savage, yet a finished and developed savage, he is perhaps an example of the highest elevation which man can reach without emerging from his primitive condition of the hunter. A geographical position commanding on one hand the portal of the Great Lakes, and on the other the sources of the streams flowing both to the Atlantic and Mississippi, giving the ambitious and aggressive confederates advantages which they perfectly understood and by which they profited to the utmost. Patient and politic as they were ferocious, they were not only conquerors of their own race, but the powerful allies and the dreaded foes of the French and English colonists, flattered and caressed by both, yet too sagacious to give themselves without reserve to either. Their organizations and their history evince their intrinsic superiority. Even their traditionary lore, amid its wild puerilities, shows at times the stamp of an energy and force in striking contrast to the flimsy creations of Algonquin fancy. That the Iroquois, left under their institutions to work out their destiny undisturbed would ever have developed a civilization of their own, I do not believe. These institutions, however, are sufficiently characteristic and curious, and we shall soon have occasion to observe them."

The same authority cites this nation as a people notably conspicuous in the history of the country. This is undoubtedly true, as reference to the numerous authorities available divulges the fact that the greater number of them have devoted more space and consideration to them than to the people of any other nation. "Both reason and tradition," continues our authority, "point to the conclusion that the Iroquois formed originally one undivided people. Sundered, like countless other tribes, by dissension, caprice or the necessities of the hunter life, they separated into five distinct nations, cantoned from east to west along the center of New York in the following order: Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas and Senecas. There was discord among them; wars followed and they lived in mutual fear, each ensconced in its palisaded villages. At length, says tradition, a celestial being incarnate on earth counseled them to compose their strife and unite in a league of defense and aggression. Another person wholly mortal, yet wonderfully endowed, a renowned warrior and a mighty magician, stands with his hair of writhing snakes grotesquely conspicuous through the dim light of tradition at this birth of Iroquois nationality. This was Atotarho, a chief of the Onondagas; and from this honorable source has sprung a long line of chieftains, heirs not to the blood alone, but to the name of their great predecessor. A few years since there lived in Onondaga Hollow a handsome Indian boy on whom the dwindled remnant of the nation looked with pride as their destined Atotarho. With earthly and celestial aid the league was consummated, and through all the land the forests trembled at the name of the Iroquois.

"The Iroquois people were divided into eight clans. When the original stock was sundered into five parts each of these clans was also sundered into five parts; and by the principle already indicated, the clans were intimately mingled in every village, hamlet and cabin, each one of the five nations having its portion of each of the eight clans.[1]

"When the league was formed these separate portions readily resumed their ancient tie of fraternity. Of those of the Turtle clan all the members became brothers again, nominal members of one family, whether Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas or Senecas; and so, too, of the remaining clans. All the Iroquois, irrespective of nationality, were therefore divided into eight families, each tracing its descent to a common mother, and each designated by its distinctive emblem or totem. The connection of clan or family was intensely strong, and by it the five nations of the leagues were linked together as by an eight-fold chain."

The clans of the Iroquois were neither equal in number, influence nor position. These clans were virtually an enlargement or extension of the family relation, their chiefs to a certain extent holding their position as an hereditary right; this law of heredity, however, it must be remembered, was not altogether binding, as we have previously remarked. Usually, of course, the chief of a clan was succeeded by some near relative, always, however, be it remarked, through the female; such, for instance, as a brother by the same mother, or a nephew by the sister's side. A new chief upon entering his office invariably dropped his own name, assuming that which since the formation of the league had attained to this particular chieftainship. The number of principal chiefs or sachems in a nation varied, ranging from eight to fourteen, there being fifty representatives in all at the Grand Council of the Confederacy, on which occasion every one met on an equal footing. In addition to these fifty Sachems there were a number of subordinate chiefs who ranked according to their worth, their various positions being accorded them as a right by a formal council appointed for that purpose. This class or body of men of course represented the best and varied talent of the nation, counting among its number the most noted warriors and orators. These officials, whose functions were entirely of a civil nature, held councils at stated intervals, where their influence prevailed according to their representative abilities.

Deliberative councils were also held by younger warriors, and even the women, whose desires and requests were properly presented, to still another body, which we believe acted as a sort of intermediary between them and the powers of the nation. Thus, all questions of social, political, military or religious character were discussed and decided upon by what might be termed this department of government or justice.

The usual point of gathering for the Great Council, as we will designate that held by the leading Sachems of the tribe, was at a point in the valley of the Onondaga, which formed the political as well as geographical center of the confederacy. These councils were called by means of runners, who were sent forth with messages or symbols indicating the cause and time of the meeting. To these gatherings a greater portion of the population would go, the lodges of the town on such occasions being crowded to overwhelming, while thousands would be compelled to seek shelter in the surrounding fields and woodlands. The utmost order and deliberation, Parkman tells us, reigned in these councils, a rigorous adherence being observed to the Indian notions of parliamentary propriety.

Unlike the Hurons on similar occasions, the Iroquois required an entire unanimity in their decisions. It was generally on the occasion of these great and important gatherings that a certain class of men were put forward as the orators or verbal representatives of their clan or nation. These almost invariably came from among the subordinate chiefs, who from a natural tendency and admirable course of training were fully prepared and exceedingly well fitted to speak intelligently and effectively of the history and traditions of the league. The capacity for memorizing among these orators was simply remarkable and assuredly unsurpassed by the orators of any other class of people, Indian or otherwise. Aside from this prodigious test of memory, they had but one feeble thread upon which to fall back to aid them in following out their line of argument or discussion. This, of course, was to be found in the numerous hieroglyphics used by them either in the making of their wampum or as used in other ways or devices. These, says Parkman, represented the public archives, and were divided among various custodians, each charged with the memory and interpretation of those assigned to him. That the meaning of these belts was symbolic, was made plainly evident in their councils, and we are assured that one of the most astonishing features of these gatherings of the French, Dutch and English officials with whom they came in contact was "the precision with which, before replying to their addresses, the Indian orators repeated them point by point."

(1) The Senecas had eight tribes, the Cayugas eight, the Tuscaroras seven, the Onondagas eight, the Oneidas three and the Mohawks three. The descendants of the ancient Oneidas and Mohawks affirm that their ancestors never had but three tribes, the Wolf, the Bear and Turtle. On old treaties with these nations now in the State Department, these titles appear as their only social divisions; but by the original laws of the league, neither of these tribes could intermarry. Hence there appears to have been the necessity for the existence originally of the remaining tribes or some of them to admit of the verity of this law relating to marriage.—Morgan.

Crime, as a general thing, was not punished by public authority by either Iroquois or Hurons, all such affairs being considered more in the light of a family quarrel, and therefore left for the kin of the deceased as well as of the offender to settle. It was not infrequent for such matters to be settled without resorting to bloodshed, presents being given in atonement for the act. In this mode of settlement there was something like a graduated scale in the value of gifts; but as a rule thirty valuable presents were recognized as the price of a man's life. In case a woman was killed, forty presents was the number demanded. Witches were considered an abomination by the Iroquois, and as such killed without compunction.

In the military organizations of these people there were two hereditary war chiefs, both of whom belonged to the Senecas. These chiefs were particularly exclusive, appearing to have taken part in the conduct of the wars but on rare occasions. Nevertheless they were in a continual state of embroilment with the surrounding tribes, so that in fact war parties of more or less significance were always upon the trail. Any man of reasonable standing among the nation could raise a war party when he desired by simply proclaiming his purpose throughout the village, singing war songs, striking his hatchet into the war post and dancing the war dance. On such occasions there was no solicitation on his part, those only joining him in his enterprise who so desired to do.

Of the undesirable attributes of the race, the Iroquois maintained as large a complement as did any nation in the land, yet with all there was an indefinable something about them which enabled them to maintain a prestige far in excess of those other nations who at least claimed the rights of equality. The cause of this may perhaps be discovered in the fact that they clung tenaciously to the institutions, traditions, rites, usages and festivals of the league, from which they were never known to deviate even one hair's breadth. Moreover, they tried less to invent or improve than they did to carry out and fulfill; thus their political fabric, as Parkman says, "was one of ancient Indian practices, crystallized into regular and enduring forms. In its component parts there was nothing peculiar to itself. All its elements we find in other tribes, and most of them belong to the entire Indian race. There might perhaps have been a definite effort in legislation, yet such legislation at best meant nothing new, only a following out of preconceived ideas. Like all sound legislation, however, it built of materials already prepared, organizing the chaotic past, and giving concrete forms to Indian nature itself.

"Thus," continues the historian, "the people have dwindled and decayed, but banded by its ties of clan and kin the league in feeble miniature still subsists, and the degenerate Iroquois looks back with mournful pride to the glory of the past. Here, then, is to be found the sum and substance of their true condition, for, although the acknowledged leaders of their kind, it was still evident by their action that they had no desire to pass from their sphere as hunter and warrior to that of a higher and more civilized condition. In fact," says Parkman, "they were inveterately attached to it, impracticable conservatists of barbarism, and in ferocity and cruelty they matched the worst of their race. Nor did the power of expansion apparently belonging to their system ever produce much result."

The Iroquois as a nation had reached, perhaps, the height of prosperity about the year 1650, at which time some authorities have estimated their population amounted to twenty-five thousand. This, however, is hardly borne out by subsequent authorities, for instance, the Relation of 1660, which at that time estimated the whole number of warriors at two thousand two hundred. Five years later le Mercier says there were two thousand three hundred and fifty, while twelve years subsequent to the publication of his Relation the English traveler Greenhalgh estimated their number at two thousand one hundred and fifty. In 1681 Du Chesneau estimated their war force at two thousand; in 1684 De la Barre put it at two thousand six hundred, the nation in the interim having been strengthened by numerous adoptions; while a memoir addressed to the Marquis de Seignelay in 1687 reduces the number to two thousand. Taken at an average, then, these figures would imply a total population, including adults of both sexes and children, at from ten to twelve thousand.

The Ojibways.

Warren tells us that the Ojibways form one of the principal branches of the Algic stock; are a well marked type, and at the time of his writing (1885) were the most numerous section or tribe of this grand division of the aboriginal inhabitants of North America. Next to them in the matter of numbers and importance came the O-dah-waug (or trading people), better known as Ottawas,[1] who originally lived in the valley of the Ottawa River, Canada.

From the report made by La Mothe Cadillac, commander at Mackinaw, in 1695, we learn that the Ottawas were divided into four bands, the Kiskakons or Quéues Coupees; the Sable, so called because their old residence was on a sandy point; the Sinago, or Outaoua-Sinageaux and the Nassauaketon, or "People of the Fork," because they had resided on a river which had three forks or branches, perhaps the Chippewa River of Wisconsin. Nassauaketon was the Algonquin word for a river which forked. Further we learn of these people from the writings of Father Verwyst, who continues: "Lac Courte Oreille, which empties by Court Oreille River into the Chippewa, is called to this day by the Indians 'Ottawa-Sagaigan,' Ottawa Lake, as there is a tradition that Ottawas used to reside on the shores of said lake. The Relation of 1667 says that their ancient dwelling place was near Lake Huron. They used to go by way of Ottawa River to Montreal and Quebec, and thus the river they traveled on was called after them. At Father Menard's time (1660), a large body of Ottawas resided at Keweenaw Bay. Another portion had fled with a band of Tionnontates—Hurons—to the Mississippi and had settled on an island near the entrance of Lake Pepin. Driven away by the Sioux, whom they had foolishly attacked conjointly with the Hurons, they ascended the Black River, Wisconsin, at the headwaters of which the Hurons built a fort, while the Ottawas pushed on to Lake Superior, and settled on the shores of Chequamegon Bay between the mouth of Fish River and Ashland. In 1670-71 they went to live on Manitouline Island, their ancient abode, where the Fathers established among them the flourishing mission of St. Simon. At present they reside in Michigan at Grand and Little Traverse, Harbor Springs and elsewhere. Their language strongly resembles the Chippewa. In 1668-9 Father Allouez succeeded in converting the Kiskakon band of Ottawas at Chequamegon Bay, but the Sinagoes and Keinouchés (from kinoje or kinosha, a pike) remained deaf to the voice of the zealous father, though many subsequently embraced Christianity at Green Bay and Mackinaw. Father Baraga labored among them at Arbre Croche (Harbor Springs) and Grand River, baptizing seven hundred or more. At present their spiritual wants are attended to by the Franciscan Fathers residing at Harbor Springs. It will be remembered in connection with these people that it was a party of the Kiskakon Ottawas who while hunting along the shores of Lake Michigan in 1676 found the remains of Marquette, who had been their instructor at the Mission of St. Esprit. These, as customary with them, having been carefully prepared, were placed in a box of birch bark and taken to St. Ignace on Michillimackinac. The Ottawas, whose territory for a considerable period lay along the eastern and northern shores of Lake Superior, removed from there to the vicinity of Michillimackinac in 1670.

(1) Also Ottaways, Outawas and Outouacs, through whom the first furs were received by the French at Quebec and Montreal.

Du Chesneau says of these people: "The Outawa Indians, who are divided into several tribes and are nearest to us, are those of the greatest use because through them we obtain beaver; and, although they do not hunt generally and have but a small portion of peltry in this country, they go in search of it in the most distant places and exchange it for our merchandise."

The Pottawattomies.

According to the Minnesota Historical Collection, we find that the Po-da-waud-um-weg or Pottawattomies (those who keep the fire) fled from the repeated depredations of the Iroquois and were found by the trader Nicollet in the fall of 1634, or winter of 1635, in the vicinity of Green Bay, Wisconsin. The same authority tells us that after the French settled at Detroit a portion of the tribe followed, while another band settled at St. Joseph, Michigan, and some stragglers near the present city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. In 1701 Ounanguissi, the chief of the tribe, visited Montreal. In 1804 Thomas G. Anderson traded with the Pottawattomies of Milwaukee. The tribe was represented when a treaty was made in 1787 at Fort Harmer, on the Muskingum, Ohio, by Governor Arthur St. Clair. By a treaty with them in October, 1832, the land around Chicago was ceded to the United States. In 1846 the different bands agreed to remove to a reservation in Kansas. In 1883 a remnant of one hundred were living in Calhoun County, Michigan, but the tribe, to the number of four hundred and ten persons, were in a reservation in Jackson County, Kansas, while two hundred and eighty-one wanderers were reported in Wisconsin, and five hundred citizen Pottawattomies in the Indian Territory.

Father Verwyst tells of these people that they lived on the peninsula formed by Green Bay on the west and Lake Michigan on the east. "They and the Winnebagoes," he continues, "had a village about twenty-four miles above the spot where the city of Green Bay now stands, near the Little Sturgeon Bay. In 1641 they were at Sault Ste. Marie falling before the face of the Sioux. In 1665 we meet with them at Chequamegon Bay, where Father Allouez found them to the number of three hundred men bearing arms. In 1668 they resided on the Pottawattomie Islands in Green Bay. They were very docile and friendly disposed to Christianity, besides being more humane and civilized than other Indian tribes. A Pottawattomie[1] band settled about the year 1721 on the St. Joseph River and another near Detroit.

(1) Father Verwyst spells it "Pottawatami."

In 1830 the Very Rev. Frederick Resé, then Vicar-General of Cincinnati and afterwards first Bishop of Detroit, visited the Pottawattomies on St. Joseph's River. He was received with the greatest joy by the poor Indians, and baptized Pokegan, a Pottawattomie chief, and twelve others. However, the Father was soon obliged to leave to attend to other missions. Pokegan was inconsolable. He repaired to Detroit on the 1st of July, 1830. 'Father ! Father !' he exclaimed, 'I come to beg you to give us a Black-gown to teach us the word of God. We are ready to give up whisky and all our barbarous customs. Thou dost not send us a Black-gown and thou hast often promised us one. What! Must we live and die in our ignorance? If thou hast no pity on us men, take pity on our poor children, who will live as we have lived, in ignorance and vice. We are left deaf and blind; steeped in ignorance, although we earnestly desire to be instructed in the faith. Father, draw us from the fire—the fire of the wicked manitou. An American minister wished to draw us to his religion, but neither I nor any of the village would send our children to his school, nor go to his meetings. We have preserved the way of prayer taught our ancestors by the Black-gown who used to be at St. Joseph. Every night and morning my wife and children pray together before a crucifix which thou hast given us, and on Sundays we pray oftener, men, women and children, according to the traditions of our fathers and mothers, as we have never seen a Black-gown at St. Joseph.'[1]

"Father Stephen Badin was sent them in August, 1830, and by January he had three hundred Christians, all of whom confessed regularly, besides one hundred children and adults baptized. In a few years there were from one thousand to twelve hundred fervent Christians. In September, 1838, the United States troops surrounded the Pottawattomies, and as prisoners of war compelled them to remove. They were deported to the banks of the Osage River, where Father Petit, their pastor, confided them to the care of Father J. Hoecken, S. J. On the sale of their lands the United States government allotted the Pottawattomies five million acres on the Missouri River near Council Bluffs."

The Pottawattomies were located on Noquet Island, Lake Michigan, in 1671, and ten years later were living in the vicinity of the present city of Chicago.

The Sacs and Foxes.

At one time the Sacs[2] occupied the country between Lake Huron and Lake Erie. They also lived for a considerable period near Saginaw Bay, Michigan, on the Saginaw and Tittibewasse River. Here they were continually at war with their neighbors, by whom in the many fierce encounters which took place between them they were almost entirely annihilated, in fact, that territory becoming untenable. They left that locality for Wisconsin, where they associated themselves in an alliance with the Ottagaumies or Foxes. Father Verwyst tells us that the Missionary Allouez found some Sacs at Chequamegon Bay, and afterwards, in 1669, at Green Bay and up the Fox River, a distance of twelve miles, where they had located a village. "They were," says this writer, "without fixed dwelling places, roaming about through the woods." On the 4th of June, 1763, the Sacs and Chippewas by stratagem took Ft. Mackinaw and killed almost all the British soldiers of the garrison. Their last great tribal struggle was made conjointly with the Foxes in the Black Hawk War of 1832. Black Hawk was defeated on the Wisconsin by Gen. Dodge, and on the second of August, 1832, Gen. Atkinson overtook the broken fragments of his army and attacked them on the bottoms of the Mississippi, a few miles below the mouth of Bad Axe River, about forty-five miles above Prairie du Chien, and totally defeated and scattered them.

Father Allouez found some of these tribes on the shores of Chequamegon Bay, where they came to fish and trade. They resided along the Fox and Wolf rivers, and had a large village near New London, and another at Mukwa, or a little below there (the latter perhaps a corruption for Muswaki, their Indian name), on the Wolf River, Wisconsin, where Father Allouez visited them in July, 1670, and started the Mission of St. Mark.

(1) This story is taken from Shea's Catholic Missions.

(2) Also Sakis, Saukies, Ousakis and Osaurees. "These people." Warren tells us, "were found by the French near Green Bay, and spoke a difficult Algonquin dialect." Of them, the Jesuit Relation of 1666-7 also says: "As for the Ousaki, they may be called savage above all others; there are a great number of them, but wandering in the forests without any permanent dwelling place."

Drake speaks of the Sacs and Foxes as being usually mentioned together and in reality but one nation.

Morse, in his report to the government in 1822, says of these people: "I have since been informed by some of the old men of the two nations that the Sauk and Fox nations emigrated from a great distance below Detroit and established themselves at a place called Saganau (probably derived from Sau-kie-nock, Saukietown, now Saginaw), in Michigan territory, and that they have since built villages and lived on the Fox River of the Illinois, at Mil-wah-kie (said to be derived from Man-na-wah-kie, good land), on the west bank of Lake Michigan, on the Fox River of Green Bay and on the Ouisconsin (Wisconsin); that about fifty years since they removed to this vicinity, where they lived for some time, and then went down to the Iowa River and built large villages; that the principal part of both nations remained on this river until about sixteen years ago (1806-8), when they returned to their present situation."

According to Charlevoix, the Foxes are said to have been the original possessor of the country contiguous to the river bearing their name, and remained in possession of the same until, as a result of some depredation committed upon some traders, the French, accompanied by a party of Menomonies, attacked and almost annihilated them. The few survivors of this terrible slaughter removed to a point upon the Mississippi, where they have since resided, while the country formerly held by them fell into the possession of the Chippewas.

Of them also, Warren says: "The Outagamies, Renards (a) or Foxes were driven by the Iroquois westward and settled southwest of Green Bay, where they became the allies of the Sakis. They gave the name to Fox River in Wisconsin and for years were hostile to the French."

(a) By a treaty in 1804, the Sacs and Foxes ceded to the United States land on both sides of the Mississippi. During the war of 1812 the chief of the Sacs and Foxes, Black Hawk, assisted the British. In 1832 this chief refused to comply with treaty stipulations and left his village, near Rock Island, Ill., and after some hostilities delivered himself up to the Winnebagoes at La Crosse, and they brought him to the United States authorities. After this, September 21, 1832, the confederated tribes of Sacs and Foxes ceded all the eastern part of the State of Iowa. By a treaty of 1842 they agreed to remove to reservations on the Osage and Great Nemaha Rivers. For thirty years, nearly all the Fox tribes had lived in Tama County, Iowa, and in 1883 three hundred and sixty-eight was the estimated population. In the Indian Territory census of mixed Sacs and Foxes was made in 1883, and four hundred and thirty-seven was the number.—Minnesota Historical Collection.

He converted several of the tribe, though subsequently the mission was abandoned on account of the hostile attitude of the Foxes toward the French. They are the only Algonquin tribe on whom the French made war.

The Foxes and Chippewas were enemies from time immemorial, and many a bloody battle was fought between them. An Indian tradition relates that a large band of Foxes stealthily landed about two centuries ago or more on the southeastern extremity of Madeline (La Pointe) Island and captured four Chippewa women. Elated with their success, they hastily embarked in their small canoes, and when they thought themselves safe from pursuit they raised a defiant shout, which was heard by the Chippewas, who jumped into their canoes. A thick fog covering the lake, neither party could see the other, but the Chippewas were guided by the noise of the songs and shouts of their enemies. They overtook the Foxes near Montreal River and a naval battle ensued, in which the Chippewas totally defeated and annihilated the Foxes. Their last great battle with the Foxes was at St. Croix Falls, where under their great war chief, Wau-boo-jeeg, they defeated the combined forces of the Foxes and Sioux, reducing the former to fifteen lodges, who were then incorporated with the Sacs. This battle occurred about 1780. Wau-boo-jeeg, the Chippewa leader in that war, lived on the projection of land of Pike's Bay, above Bayfield, and died in 1793.

When the French became acquainted with the Chippewas, whose home was the Sault (whence they were called by the French Saultem or Sauteres, now Sauteux), they formed alliance and friendship with them and supplied them with firearms, which enabled them eventually to drive the Foxes out of Northern Wisconsin and the Sioux beyond the headwaters of the Mississippi.

The Illinois.

According to Parkman, the Illinois were an aggregation of distinct though kindred tribes, the Kaskaskias, the Peorias, the Kahokies, the Tamaroas, the Moingona and others. Their general character and habits are designated as being similar in every way to those of other Indian tribes, although by some they are reputed to have been somewhat cowardly and slothful. The Miamis and Piankishaws were close affinities in language and habits to the Illinois. All of these tribes were members of the Algonquin family. They were great traders, exchanging their war presents with the lake tribes for merchandise and other useful articles, such as guns, hatchets, etc.

The Illinois had some extensive towns, to one of which Father Allouez particularly refers in his Relation of 1673-79. This town he estimated to contain three hundred and fifty-one lodges, its population embracing five or six distinct tribes of the Illinois family. Two years preceding this time, that is in 1675, Father Marquette is said to have addressed an audience of five hundred chiefs and old men and fifteen hundred young men, besides women and children, at the same place. Another member who also visited there in 1680 estimated that the town then contained between seven thousand and eight thousand people. At certain periods nearly the entire Illinois population was gathered at one place. The lodges of this town were built along the margin of the river for a distance of a mile or more, and were in shape and material similar to those built by the Hurons. The land in the immediate neighborhood of this town was extensively cultivated and yielded large crops, particularly of Indian corn. Of these people Father Verwyst says that of all the Algonquin tribes of the Northwest the Illinois were the most docile and susceptible to Christianity, in which particular both Fathers Allouez and Marquette speak most considerately of them. When the former of these Reverend Missionaries reached the territory contiguous to the Upper Fox River, he found a considerable band of these people at a spot nine miles distant from the present site of Portage City. He also fell in with a few of the same tribe who were temporarily located in the neighborhood of Chequamegon Bay, and became greatly interested in what these people told him about the wonderful country from which they had come—of the beautiful stretches of verdure and prairie land, the wonderful fecundity of the soil and docility and friendliness of the people. He became very anxious to investigate so prosperous and propitious a locality, and so remained in a somewhat unsatisfied state of mind, until in 1670 he was enabled to visit them at Mascoutin village, where he was received with every evidence of rejoicing. A grand feast was prepared in his honor, while a venerable Sachem of the tribe approached him, remarking: "How good it is, Black-gown, that thou hast come to pity us. Have pity on us; thou art a Manitou (god). We offer thee to smoke. The Naudowessies[1] and the Iroquois are eating us; have compassion on us. We are often sick; our children die; we suffer hunger. Hear me, Manitou; I offer thee to smoke. May the earth yield us corn and the rivers fish. May sickness not kill us and famine not be too hard on us." Then at the end of each invocation all of the old men would answer in unison "O ! O !" which practically meant Amen.

Father Allouez was horrified at thus receiving divine honor, says Father Verwyst, from these poor, ignorant, but well-meaning people. He preached to them most fervently, telling them that he was not the Manitou, the Master of their lives, but that he obeyed Him and carried His word to every land. Father Marquette passed by this mission in June, 1673, when on his way to discover and explore the Mississippi. He stayed there from the 7th till the 10th of June, and was much pleased to see in the midst of the village a large cross, to which were attached quivers and arrows and other Indian presents in thanksgiving to God for having prospered their last winter's chase. At the mouth of the Des Moines River the same Father found a large band of Peorias, another branch of the Illinois tribe, where he was received with greatest joy and respect. In 1675 he founded the mission of the Immaculate Conception among the Kaskaskias on the Illinois River, where he offered up the holy Mass on Holy Thursday and Easter Sunday (the first Mass offered on Illinois soil was in all probability said by Father Marquette on June 20, 1673, when making his original voyage of discovery down that river), and preached the faith of Jesus Christ to an immense concourse of people.

The Illinois were for a time under the care of two Recollect Fathers of the Order of St. Francis, viz., Gabriel de la Ribourde and Zenobius Membré. On September 9, 1680, Father Gabriel was ruthlessly murdered by some Kickapoo Indians. Father Sebastian Râle was killed in his Abenaqui Mission in the State of Maine by an Indian war party, and Father Gravier labored in Illinois. Father Marest was stationed at Kaskaskia in 1712, laboring with great fruit. Many other apostolic men worked successfully for the conversion of the various tribes of Illinois.

Ojibways at La Pointe.

Passing along the northern waters of Lake Huron north of Manitouline and adjacent islands are to be noted a succession of rapids, which, margined on the one side by Canada West and on the other by the Upper Peninsula of Michigan, marks the entrance into Lake Superior. The strait commences at the head of Tequamenon Bay, a frith of the great mother lake, from whence it runs in a southerly direction to the head of Drummong Island in Lake Huron. A little below Lake Superior are the rapids named Sault by the earlier voyagers, but subsequently known as Saut du Gaston, in compliment, we are told, of Jean Baptiste Gaston, younger son of Henry IV. and his wife Marie de Medicis, and younger brother of Louis XIII. A few years later, that is in 1669, the present name, that of Sault Ste. Marie, was given to these rapids by the Jesuit Missionaries who came to that neighborhood.

Below these rapids the strait widens out noticeably into a broad and charming lake, inclosing a number of large and beautiful islands, round which it passes in three distinct channels. Further down it again contracts into a narrow stream. It was to a point immediately contiguous to these rapids that the French traders came as long ago as the days of Champlain, where we are told they found located a band of Indians who subsisted almost entirely upon the white fish which abounded in these waters, and who were known among the Iroquois as Estiaghicks or Ostiagahoroones. By the Hurons, however, they were called Pauotigouecieuhak or Pahouitingouachirini, meaning dwellers at the fall, or men of the shallow cataract. It was here, too, that the first Jesuits located a mission, and in their Relation of 1647-8 they speak of these people in the following language: "These last are those whom we call the nation of the Sault district, from us a little more than a hundred leagues, whose consent to a route it would be necessary to have if one wished to go beyond to communicate with numerous and other more distant Algonquin nations who dwelt on the shores of another lake (meaning Superior) still larger than Mer Douce (Lake Huron), into which it discharges itself by a very large and very rapid river, which before mingling its waters with our fresh water sea (Lake Huron) makes a fall or leap that gives a name to those people who come to live there during the fishing season. Leaving the Sault and passing along the northern coast of the Peninsula and Wisconsin, we at length arrived at Chequamegon Bay, on the shores of which at La Pointe the Missionary Fathers found a large settlement of Chippewas."

Of the origin of these people but little if anything is known, as even those are compelled to admit who have made a thorough and practical study of the nation. Referring to the subject, Mr. Warren says: "During my long residence among the Ojibways, after numberless inquiries of their old men, I have never been able to learn by tradition or otherwise that they entertain the belief that all the tribes of the red race inhabiting America have ever been at any time since the occupancy of this continent one and the same people, speaking the same language and practicing the same beliefs and customs. The traditions of this tribe enter no farther into the past than the one concentration or coalition under one head of the different and now sundered tribes belonging to the Algic stock. A close study of the dissimilarities existing between the Ojibways[1] and Dakotas who have more immediately come under my observation, has led me fully to believe that they are not descended from the same people of the Old World, nor have they ever in America formed one and the same nation or tribe. It is true that they are similar in color and in their physical formation, which may be accounted for by their residence in the same climate and sustaining life through the same means. Many of their customs are also alike, but these have been naturally similarized and entailed on them by living in the same wild hunters' state; and many they have derived from one another during their short, fitful terms of peace and intercourse. Here all similitude between the two tribes ends."

At the time of Mr. Warren's residence among them the Ojibways were scattered over a large extent of country comprising all of that part of the State of Michigan lying north of Green Bay and west of the straits of Michillimackinac bordering on Lake Superior, the central half of Wisconsin and the northeastern half of Minnesota territory. In addition to these they occupied the country lying from the Lake of the Woods over the entire north coast of Lake Superior to the valleys of St. Mary's, and residing even east of that point into Upper Canada. To use his own language, "they literally girdled the great father of lakes." These people also owned by right of conquest all of the numerous lakes from which the Mississippi and Red River of the North derived their sources. At this time they numbered in all some fifteen thousand, including, however, quite a number who were scattered among other tribes along the Missouri and in Canada, and to the north among the Crees and Assineboins; so that the total population might be reasonably estimated at twenty thousand. A little less than one half of this number resided in the United States, in the neighborhood of three thousand being located in the State of Wisconsin, at La Pointe on the Wisconsin, Chippewa and St. Croix Rivers and their tributary streams and lakes. Thus all these people who lived on the immediate shores of Lake Superior were known by the name of Ke-che-gum-me-win-in-e-wug, or men of the Great Water, while others dwelling inland between Lake Superior and the Mississippi were called the Be-ton-uk-eeng-ain-ub-e-jig, or those who sit on the borders. Then, also, there were the Mun-o-min-ik-a-sheenh-ug, or rice makers, who lived on the rice lakes of the St. Croix, and the Wah-suah-gun-e-win-in-e-wug, or men of the tortures, who dwell on the head lakes of the Wisconsin and the Ottawa, lake men who occupied the headwaters of the Chippewa River. Those who lived on the shores of the Mississippi were called the Ke-che-se-be-win-in-e-wug, or Great River men. Of others there were also the Muk-me-dua-win-in-e-wug, or pillagers, who lived in the vicinity of Leech and Otter Tail Lakes. The Sug-waun-dug-ah-win-in-e-wug, or men of the thick fir woods, who dwelt upon the north coast of Lake Superior and who were denominated by the French "Bois Forts," or hardwoods. These constituted the principal divisions of the tribe, although there were also many subdivisions.

Of their natural tendency in the matter of selection, Mr. Warren tells us that the Ojibways resided almost exclusively in wooded countries, their lands being covered with deep and interminable forests and abounding in beautiful lakes and murmuring streams whose banks were edged with all of the trees and plants indigenous to the climate in which they resided.

"The history of the tribe," says Mr. Warren, "till within the last five centuries lies buried in darkness and almost utter oblivion," since which time he gives a most interesting and reliable, though not minute, history of the nation, obtained wholly by means of oral historic traditions. In this manner, then, it has been discovered that they attained their present geographical position in nearly the center of the North American continent, about the gulf of the St. Lawrence River, coming thence from their original location on the shores of the Atlantic. It is but a few generations back, Mr. Warren says, that this tribe have been known by their present distinctive name of Ojibway, certainly not more than three centuries, and in all probability much less. It was within this period that they became disconnected as a distinct and separate tribe from the Ottawas and Pottawattomies, the name of which the whole when incorporated in one body being uncertain. The final separation of these tribes, he tells us took place at the straits of Michillimackinac from natural causes, and the partition has been more and more distinctly defined and perpetuated through locality and by each of the three divided sections assuming or receiving distinct appellations.

Of this division he continues to speak as follows: "The Ottawas remaining about the spot of their final separation and being thereby the most easterly section, were first discovered by the white race, who bartered with them their merchandise for furs. They for many years acted as a medium between the white traders and their more remote Western brethren. They thus obtained the name of Ot-tah-way, 'trader,' which they have retained as their tribal name to the present day. The Pottawattomies[1] moved up Lake Michigan, and by taking with them or for a time perpetuating the national fire, which, according to tradition, was sacredly kept alive in their more primitive days, they have obtained the name of those who make or keep the fire, and which is the literal meaning of their tribal cognomen.

"The Ojibways pressing northward and westward were soon known as an important or distinctive body or tribe, and meeting with fierce and inveterate enemies, the name Ojibways, 'to roast till puckered up,' they soon obtained through practicing the custom of torturing prisoners of war by fire. The original cause of their emigrating from the shores of the Atlantic westward to the area of Lake Superior is buried in uncertainty, and if pressed or driven back by more powerful tribes, which is a most probable conjecture, they are not willing to acknowledge it."

It is also stated as a well authenticated fact that after separating from the Ottawas and Pottawattomies this tribe remained for a considerable period at the falls of Sault Ste. Marie.[1] Here they occupied a large extent of ground, and from this point, also, large war parties went forth to the east and west against the Naudowessies and Dakotas respectively. Upon leaving this place, the Ojibwas separated into two divisions, one designated the northern, forming the least numerous body, consisting chiefly of the families claiming as Totem the reindeer, lynx and pike. This division proceeded in gradual stages to occupy the northern coast of Lake Superior until arriving as far as Pigeon River. From here they separated over the country, along the British and United States line, and a considerable distance north into the British possessions, a large band forming a village on the shores of Rainy Lake.[2] It was here that they met and formed a lasting alliance with the Assineboins (seceding Dakotas) and Knis-te-nos, and again joining with the southern division of the tribe, continued a stern and protracted war with the Dakotas.

After the tribe divided at Sault Ste. Marie, the main body passed gradually along the southern shores of Lake Superior, making temporary stops at Grand Island and L'Anse Bay. This party was composed of the Crane Totem family, the Bear, the Cat-fish, the Loon and the Marten and Moose clans. It was the Cranes who claimed[3] the honor, and still do so in fact, of having been the first of the Ojibways to pitch their wigwams and light their fires at Shaug-ah-waum-ik-ong, sandy point or peninsula lying some two miles immediately distant from the Island of La Pointe.

(1) As a matter of still further interest to the reader regarding this historic spot, we give the following extract from the report given by Jedidiah Morse to the Secretary of War of the United States in 1822: "The following tract of land, beginning at the Big Rock in the River St. Mary's on the boundary line between the United States and the British provinces of Upper Canada; and running thence down the said river in the middle thereof to the little rapids, and from those running back from the said river, so as to include sixteen square miles of land. This tract was ceded by treaty June 16, 1820, to the government of the United States. Lewis Cass, Governor of Michigan, being their Commissioner; and on the part of the tribe of Chippewa Indians present fifteen chiefs and warriors. In return for this grant the United States secure with the Indians a perpetual right of fishing at the Falls of St. Mary's, and also a place of encampment upon the tract ceded convenient to the fishing ground; which place shall not be used by the above Indians or any military work which may be erected by the United States, nor with any private rights."

(2) Speaking of this locality, Carver says: "Lac La Pluye, so-called by the French; in English Rainy Lake is supposed to have acquired this name from the first travelers who passed over it, meeting with an uncommon deal of rain; or as some have affirmed from a mist-like rain occasioned by the perpetual waterfall that empties itself into the river which lies to the southwest. This lake appears to be divided by an isthmus near the middle, into two parts; the west part is called the great Rainy Lake; the east the little Rainy Lake as being the least division. It lies a few miles farther to the eastward on the same branch of the Bourbon than the last mentioned lake. It is in general very shallow in depth; the broadest part of it is not more than twenty miles in length, including both, about three hundred miles. In the west part the water is very clear and good and some excellent fish are taken in it. A great many fowl resort here at the fall of the year. Moose deer are to be found in great plenty, and likewise the carriboo, whose skin for breeches or gloves exceeds by far any other to be met with in North America. The land on the borders of this lake is esteemed in some places very good, but rather too thickly covered with wood. Here reside a considerable band of the Chippewas."

(3) In illustration of this, Warren tells the following highly allegorical and characteristic tradition which emphatically marks the variance existing between several of the principal Totems as to which is hereditarily entitled to chief place in the tribe. The incident occurred at a council at which Mr. Warren acted as an interpreter, which was held several years ago at La Pointe between several of the chiefs of the Ojibways and the United States government agent. The allegory was delivered by an old chief, Tug-waug-aun-ay, in answer to the mooted question of "Who was the hereditary chief of La Pointe?" At this particular time great Buffalo Ke-che-wash-keenh, grandson of the celebrated chief, Au-daig-we-os, head of the Loon Totem clan, was at that time, though stricken with years, still in the prime of his great oratorical powers. He opened the council by delivering a most eloquent harangue in praise of his own immediate ancestors, and claiming with the Loon family his place and chieftainship among the Ojibways. After he had finished and again resumed his seat, Tug-waug-aun-ay, the head chief of the Crane family, a very modest and retiring man, seldom induced to speak in council, calmly arose and gracefully wrapping his blanket about his body, leaving but the right arm free, he pointed towards the Eastern skies, and exclaimed: "The Great Spirit once made a bird and he sent it from the skies to make its abode on earth. The bird came, and when it reached half way down among the clouds it sent forth a loud and far-sounding cry which was heard by all who resided on earth, and even by the spirits that make their abode within its bosom. When the bird reached within sight of the earth, it encircled about the great Fresh Water Lake and again it uttered its echoing cry. Nearer and nearer it circled, looking for a resting place till it lit on a hill overlooking the Boweting (Sault Ste. Marie); here it chose its first resting place, pleased with the numerous white fish that glanced and swam in the clear waters and sparkling foam of the rapids. Satisfied with its chosen seat, again the bird sent forth its loud but solitary cry, and Ko-kaig (Bear clan), A-waie-se-wug (Cat-fish), Ah-auh-tuh-wug (Loon) and Mus-co-des (Moose and Marten clan) gathered at its call. A large town was soon congregated and the bird, whom the Great Spirit sent, presided over it.

"Once again it took its flight and the bird flew above the waters of Lake Superior. Pleased with the sandy point of Shaug-ah-waum-ik-ong, it circled over it and viewed the numerous fish as they swam about in the clear depth of the great lake. It lit on Shaug-ah-waum-ik-ong, and from thence again it uttered its solitary cry. A voice came from the calm bosom of the lake to the bird, pleased with the musical sound of the voice, again sent forth its cry, and the answering bird made its appearance in the wampum-breasted Ah-auh-wauh (Loon). The bird spoke to it in articulate tone, 'Is it thou that gives answer to my cry?' The Loon answered 'It is I.' The bird then said to him, 'Thy voice is music—it is melody—it sounds sweet in my ear; from henceforth I appoint thee to act as my spokesman in council.'

"Thus" continued the chief, "the Loon became the first in council, but he who made him chief was Ma-sin-aw-e (echo maker or Crane). These are the words of my ancestors, who from generation to generation have repeated them in the ears of their children. I have done."

The old man took his seat, but a deep silence, not a word in that stricken and listening crowd arose to gainsay his words. All understood the allegory perfectly well, and as the curling smoke from their pipes arose from the lips and nostrils of the quiet listeners, there ascended with it the universal whisper, 'It is true, it is true.'"

Somewhat in explanation of the foregoing allegory, Mr. Warren adds: "that the Crane is commonly named in the Ojibway language Uj-ee-ak is the symbol or totem of a large section of the tribe. This bird loves to soar among the clouds, and its cry can be heard when flying above, beyond the orbit of human vision. From "this far-sounding cry" the family who claimed it as their totem derived their generic name of Bus-in-aw-wug (echo makers). This family is claimed by this allegory to have been the first discoverers and pioneer settlers at Sault Ste. Marie and Chequamegon Bay. The Loon is the totem also of a large clan. This is denominated by the Ojibways Mong, but the family who claimed it as their badge were known by the generic name of Ah-auh-wauh which is derived by imitating the peculiar cry. This family claim the hereditary first chieftainship in the tribe, but they cannot substantiate their pretentions farther back than their intercourse with the French discoverers and traders, who on a occasion painted some of their principal men as chiefs, and endowed them with flags and medals. Strictly confined to their own primitive tribal policy, the allegory of the Crane cannot be controverted, nor has it ever been attempted.

"To support their pretentions this family hold in their possession a circular plate of virgin copper, on which is rudely marked indentations and hieroglyphics, denoting the number of chiefs of the family who have passed away since they first pitched their lodges at Chequamegon and took possession of the adjacent country, including the Island of La Pointe. When I witnessed the coarse family register in 1842 it was exhibited by Tug-waug-aun-ay to my father. The old chief kept it carefully buried in the ground and never displayed it, but this occasion he only brought it to view on the entreaty of my father, whose maternal uncle he was. On this plate of copper was marked eight deep indentations, denoting the number of the ancestors who had passed away since they first lighted their fire at Chequamegon. They had all lived to a good old age. The rudely figure of a man with a hat on his head, placed opposite one of these indentations, was denoted the period when the white race first made its appearance among them. This was occurred in the third generation, leaving the five generations who has passed away since that important era in their history. Tug-waug-aun-ay was about sixty years of age at the time he showed this plate of copper to my father, which he stated descended to him through a long line of ancestors. He died two years since (that is, somewhere between 1840 and 1855), and his death has added the ninth indentation thereon, making at this period nine generations since the Ojibways first resided at La Pointe, and six generations since their first intercourse with the whites. From the manner in which they estimated their generations they may be counted as comprising a little over half the full term of years allotted to mankind, but which will materially exceed the white man's generation. The Ojibways never counted a generation as passed away till the oldest man in the family had died, and the writer assumes, from these and other facts obtained from observation and inquiry, forty years as the term of Indian generation. According to this estimate it is now three hundred and sixty years (now about three hundred and eighty), since the Ojibways first collected in one grand central town on the Island of La Pointe, and two hundred and forty years since they were first discovered by the white race."

Of this tribe of people[1] Father Verwyst says that they heard the first tidings of Christianity from Fathers Jogues and Raymbaut in 1642 at Sault Ste. Marie, at the great Feast of the Dead.

According to their traditions they came to La Pointe Island about four centuries ago, presumably 1492. They had a large, flourishing town on the southeast end of the island where they had cleared a large tract of land and raised a great deal of corn and pumpkins. In the early part of the seventeenth century (about the year 1612) they suddenly abandoned their island through a superstitious fear that it was haunted by ghosts. Many of them went back to the Sault (pronounced "Soo"); others settled at the west end of Lake Superior, where Father Allouez found them between 1665-67, probably near Superior City. After the various tribes whom the fear of the Iroquois had driven to Chequamegon Bay and the Apostle Islands had left in 1670-71, the Chippewas of the south shore gradually returned and settled on the mainland where Bayfield now stands; also at Pike's Bay and along the shore of Chequamegon Bay. Many also resided at Chequamegon Point, Odanah at the head of the bay and near Michael Dufault's place. At an early date, probably in 1695, the French built a fort on La Pointe Island. The location of the old fort is involved in obscurity. Hon. William W. Warren claims that it was built at Middlefort, near the old Indian cemetery. Tradition—the name "old fort"—seems to point to the southeastern end of the island as the site somewhere near the place where Michel Cadotte built his trading post and fort in 1782. For many years the American Fur Company had a flourishing trading post on the island, and La Pointe was then one of the largest towns of Wisconsin. It is now but an historic relic, a most beautiful place for a summer resort, a place intended by nature for quiet enjoyment, rest, meditation and prayer. We hope it will never be transformed into a modern town.

Here two treaties were made with the Chippewa Indians, one in 1842 and the last in 1854, by which they ceded all their remaining lands in Wisconsin, and also large tracts in Minnesota and Michigan, to the United States for a consideration perhaps not the one-thousandth part of their actual value. To give some idea of the wretched condition of the poor Indians which made them, so to say, give way for trifling annuities, large tracts of the most valuable agricultural, pine and mineral lands, the value of which they never knew or realized, but which was still comprehended by the grasping "Kitchi Mokoman"—"Big Knife,"—American, we append here the concluding remarks of two of their chiefs, Esh-ke-bug-e-coshe and Nay-naw-ong-gay-bee.

At a treaty made at the Mississippi in 1855 the Chief Esh-ke-bug-e-coshe, "Flat Mouth," made the following remarks in answer to the refusal of the government agents to accept a proposition of the chiefs to sell their lands at a price double that offered them by the agent: He said, "My father, I live away north on the headwaters of the Mississippi; my children (band) are poor and destitute, and, as it were, almost naked, while you, my father, are rich and well clothed When I left my home to come to this treaty to sell my lands—for we know that we must sell for what we can get—the whites must have them—my braves, young men, women and children held a council and begged of me to do the best I could in selling their homes; and now, my father, I beg of you to accept of the proposition I have made you, and to-morrow I will start for home; and then you can count the days which you know it will take me to reach there, and on the day of my arrival look north, and as you see the northern lights stream up in the sky imagine to yourself that it is the congratulation of joy of my children ascending to God that you have accepted of the proposition I have offered you,"

At the treaty made at La Pointe in 1854 Nay-naw-ong-gay-bee, the Dressing Bird, one of the head chiefs of the Courte Oreille band of Chippewas, made a speech expatiating on the destitute condition of his people, who were abjectly poor, many of the children being perfectly naked. Father Verwyst gives his closing remarks as follows: "My father, look around you, upon the faces of my poor children; sickness and hunger, whisky and war are killing us fast. We are dying and fading away; we drop to the ground like the trees before the ax of the white man; we are weak, you are strong. We are but foolish Indians—you have wisdom and knowledge in your head; we want your help and protection. We have no homes, no cattle, no lands and we will not need them long. A few short winters my people will be no more. The winds shall soon moan around the last lodge of your red children. I grieve, but cannot turn our fate away. The sun, the moon, the rivers, the forests we love so well, we must leave. We shall soon sleep in the ground—we will not awake again. I have no more to say to you, my father."

Crees and Sauteux.

The Crees and Sauteux were a people of British America who have for many years been closely and intimately related with the Chippewas; so long and close in fact has been this intimacy that their languages have become almost identical, while in the matter of usages, superstitions and other characteristics, they may be said to be as one. These people dwell on a large tract of territory in British America, their particular town of location being along both sides of the Saskadjiwan. The following account of what is known of their customs and habits is taken from the writings of Father Belcourt, which we take as found from the work some few years since by Father Verwyst: "Their principal religious meeting takes place every spring about the time that all the plants awaken from their long winter sleep, and renew their life, and commence to bud. The ticket of invitation is a piece of tobacco, sent by the oldest person of the nation indicating the place of rendezvous of the principal persons of the tribe. This is a national feast in which every individual is interested, it being the feast of medicines. Each head of the family is the physician of his children, but he cannot become so without having received a preliminary instruction and initiation into the secrets of medicine. It is at this feast that each one is received. All the ceremonies which they perform are emblematic, and signify the virtues of plants in the cure of various maladies of man.

(2) He also refers to them by the name of Outchibouec and Otchipweg, Saulteurs, Sauteurs and Sauteux, designating as their place of residence the territory lying both along the north and south shores of Lake Superior, British America, Michigan, Wisconsin and Eastern Minnesota.

"Another superstition proper to cure evils, which have place more in the imagination than the body, is the Nibikiwin. It consists in drawng out the evil directly, in drawing the breath and spitting in the eyes of the sick person. The pretended cause of suffering is sometimes a stone, a fruit, the point of an arrow, or even a medicine wrapped up in cotton. One cannot conceive how much these poor people submit with blind faith to these absurdities.

"Lastly, curiosity and the desire of knowing the future has invented the Tchissakiwin. It consists of certain formalities, songs, invocations of spirits and bodily agitations which are so energetic that you are carried back to the times of the ancient Sybils. They seem to say to you Deus, ecce, Deus, and then submitting to the questions of the spectators, they always have a reply whether it be to tell what passes at a distance or reveal the place where bodies which have been lost may be found. As the skill of the prophet consists in replying to ambiguous terms upon all subjects upon which he has not been able to procure information in advance, he is always sure of success either more or less striking.

"Dreams are for the Sauteux revelations; and the bird, animal, or even stone, or whatever it may be which is the principal subject of the dream, becomes a tutelary spirit for which the dreamer has a particular veneration. As dreams are more apt to visit sick persons when the brain is more subject to these aberrations, many such have a number of dreams, and consequently many tutelary spirits. They keep images and statues in their medicine bags, and never loose sight of them, but carry them about wherever they go. The faith of the Sauteux in their medicine is such that they believe that a disease can be thrown into an absent person, or that certain medicines can master the mental inclinations, such as love or hatred. Thus it is the interest of these old men to pander to the young.

"Their writings are composed of arbitrary hieroglyphics, and the best writer is he who is most skillful in using such signs as most fully represent his thoughts. Though this manner of writing is very defective, it is nevertheless ingenious and very useful, and has this advantage over all other languages, since it depicts the thought and not the word, just as figures represent numbers in all languages.

"Though the Sauteux have no idea of the state they shall find themselves in after death, they believe in the existence of a future life. They have very strange ideas on this subject; in consequence of some of these, they place near the deceased his arms, and the articles most necessary to life. Some have even gone so far as to have their horse killed at their death, in order, as they said, to use him in traveling to the country of the dead. It is the general belief that the spirit returns to visit the grave very often, so long as the body is not reduced to dust. During this space of time it is held a sacred duty on the part of the relatives of the deceased to make sacrifices and offerings, and celebrate festivals before the tomb. In the time of fruits they carry them in great abundance to the tomb, and he who nourishes himself with them after they have been deposited there, causes great joy to the friends and relatives of the deceased.

"The Sauteux have also some knowledge of astronomy; they have names for the most remarkable constellations; they have names also for the lunar months, but their calculations, as can be conceived, are very imperfect, and they often find themselves in great embarrassment, and have recourse to us to solve their difficulties. The electric fluid manifested in thunder, and the rays of light and the aurora borealis, are in their imagination animated beings. The thunders, according to them, are supernatural beings, and the rays of the aurora borealis are the dead who dance. Their idea of the creation of the world goes no farther back than the deluge, of which they have still a tradition the narration of which would fill volumes."

That which directly relates to the creation is as follows: "An immortal genius (demigod) seeing the water which covered the earth, and finding nowhere a resting-place for his foot, ordered a beaver, an otter and other amphibious animals to plunge by turns into the water and bring up a little earth to the surface. They were all drowned. A muskrat, however, succeeded in reaching the bottom, and took some earth in his paws, but he died before he got back. Yet his body rose to the surface of the water. The genius Nenabojou (Ma-nah-bo-sho), seeing that he had found earth, brought him to life, and employed him to continue the work. When there was a sufficient quantity of earth, he made a man whom he animated with his breath." This genius, says Father Belcourt, is not the Great Spirit (Kitchi Manitou) of whom they never speak except with respect, while Nenabojou is considered a buffoon of no gravity.

"The Sauteux have a great passion for gambling; they pass whole nights in play, staking all they have, even their guns and traps, and sometimes their horses; they have staked even their wives upon the play. Their love of intoxicating liquors is, as among all other savage tribes, invincible. A Sauteux who was convinced of religion wished to become a Christian, but he could not be admitted without renouncing indulgence in drinking to excess, which demand he considered exceedingly unreasonable.

"The Sauteux are one of the most warlike nations; from time immemorial they have had advantage over their numerous enemies and pushed them to the north. They treat their vanquished with most horrible barbarity; it is then that they are cannibals; for though we see sometimes among them cases of anthropophagy (cannibalism), they have such a horror of it that he who has committed this act is no longer sure of his life. They hold it a sacred duty to put him to death on the first favorable occasion. But during war they make a glory of cannibalism, and the feast of victory is very often composed of human flesh. One sees a trait of this barbarity in the names they give to their particular enemies, as for instance the Sioux, whom they call "Bwanak." In the word that I have mentioned bwan is put for abwan, which signifies a piece of flesh put on a spit. In their war parties after a victory, the Sauteux build a great fire, then plant all around spits laden with the thighs, heads, hearts, etc., of their enemies, after which they return home.

"What Father Belcourt says of the Sauteux and Crees of British America," continues Father Verwyst, "can be applied in a great measure to the other Indian tribes who resided in the St. Lawrence Valley, and in the country of the Great Lakes. More than one Catholic missionary and many a poor Frenchman have been burned to death at the stake, and their bodies devoured by the Iroquois of New York. Perrot tells that four Sioux were made soup of by the Ottawas in their village in Chequamegon Bay in the winter of 1670-71. The Chippewas of the south shore are more civilized than those of the north, and never indulge in the horrible practice of cannibalism, which they abhor and detest as much as the whites."

A few points regarding one other nation, and we shall have briefly noticed the principal tribes inhabiting that part of the country through which the Jesuit Fathers traveled, and among whom they labored so assiduously for the cause of religion for so many years. These are the Sioux or Bwalag, or warriors, as they were more generally spoken of in the Relations. Warren refers to them as the Ab-boin-ug or roasters, a title given by the Ojibways to the Dakotas or Sioux,[1] owing to the well-known propensity for roasting their captives. In the same manner it may be said the name Ojibway (to roast till puckered up) was obtained by that tribe, as may be inferred from the following legend, which is quoted as giving the true cause for its origin. "A noted warrior of the Ojibways was once taken prisoner by his own nephew, who was a young warrior of the Foxes, son of his own sister, who had been captured when young, adopted and married in this tribe. This young man, to show to the Foxes his utter contempt of any ties of blood existing between him and his Ojibway uncle, planted two stakes strongly in the ground, and taking his uncle by the arm, he remarked to him that he 'wished to warm him before a good fire.' He then deliberately tied his arms and legs to the two stakes as wide apart as they could be stretched, and the unnatural nephew built a huge fire in front of his uncle. When he had burned his naked body to a blister on this side, he turned him with his back towards the fire; and when this had also cruelly burned, he untied him, and turning him loose, he bade him to 'return home and tell the Ojibways how the Foxes treated their uncles.' The uncle finally recovered from his wounds, and in a subsequent excursion succeeded in capturing his unnatural and cruel nephew. He took him to the village of the Ojibways, where he tied him to a stake, and taking a fresh elk skin, on which a layer of fat had purposely been left, he placed it over the fire till it became a blaze, and then threw it over the naked shoulders of his nephew, remarking 'Nephew, when you took me to visit the village of your people, you warmed me before a good fire. I now in return give you a warm mantle for your back.' The elk

(1) These people called themselves Dakotas, while among the numerous writers by whom they have been mentioned they were called Sioux, Nadouessi, and Nadoessiouek. The Relations speak of them as being both powerful and warlike. Of their residence in the West Father Verwyst tells us that the Missionary Allouez first met with them at the "west end of Lake Superior near to Duluth or Superior. In 1671 they drove the Ottawas and the Hurons from the shores of Chequamegon Bay. They were almost continually at war with the Chippewas, by whom they were gradually driven out of Wisconsin and Eastern Minnesota beyond the Mississippi, and later occupied their fine hunting grounds near Red Lake, Leech Lake and vicinity, Minnesota. In 1862 the Sioux massacred about seven hundred whites, most of them industrious, inoffensive Germans. In 1876, led by Sitting Bull, they completely annihilated General Custer's forces. Since then they have been removed to Dakota, where missionaries are laboring at Christianizing them."

Of their language Carver tells us that it was spoken in a soft accent without any guttural sounds, so that it might be learned with facility, and was neither difficult to be pronounced nor written. He also refers to it as being nearly as copious and expressive as the Chippewa tongue, and the most prevailing language of any on the western banks of the Mississippi, being used to all accounts by a majority of the nations lying north of the Missouri and as far west as the shores of the Pacific Ocean.

skin covered with thick fat burned furiously, and 'puckering' it tightened around the naked body of his nephew, a dreadful 'mantle' which soon consumed him."

By the Ottawas the Sioux were called Naudowessies (little adder), which is supposed to truly express the sneaking, treacherous and cruel disposition of that people. Still another indication of their blood-thirsty and predatory natures is to be found in the fact that they were designated and generally recognized as the Iroquois of the West.

In somewhat explaining the manner of living among the Sioux, we have drawn briefly from the writings of Edward D. Neill, who tells thus interestingly of their customs and habits: "The heathens in their manner of life are essentially the same all over the world. They are all given to uncleanness. As you walk through a small village, in a Christian land, you notice many appearances of thrift and neatness. The day-laborer has his lot fenced and his rude cabin white-washed. The widow dependent upon her own exertion and alone in the world finds pleasure in training the honey suckle or morning glory to peep in at her windows. The poor seamstress, though obliged to lodge in some upper room, has a few flower pots upon her window sill, and perhaps a canary bird in a cage hanging outside. But in an Indian village all is filth and litter. There are no fences around their bark huts; whitewashing is a lost art, if it was ever known among them; worn-out moccasins, tattered blankets, old breech-cloths, and pieces of leggings, are strewn in confusion all over the ground. Water, except in very warm weather, seldom touches their bodies, and the pores of their skin become filled with grease and the paint with which they daub themselves. Neither Monday nor any other day is known as washing day. Their cooking utensils are encrusted with dirt and used for a variety of purposes. A year or two ago, a band of Indians, with their dogs, ponies, women and children, came on board a steamboat on the Upper Mississippi, on which the writer was traveling. Their evening meal, consisting of beans and wild meat, was prepared on the lower deck, beneath the windows of the ladies' cabin. After they had used their fingers in the place of forks and consumed the food, which they had cooked in a dirty pan, one of the mothers, removing the blanket of one of her children, stood it up in the same pan, and then, dipping some water out of the river, began to wash it from head to foot. The rest of the band looked on with Indian composure, and seemed to think that an iron stewpan was just as good for washing babies as for cooking beans! Where there is so much dirt, of course, vermin must abound. They are not much distressed by the presence of those insects which are so nauseating to the civilized man. Being without shame, a common sight of a summer's eve is a woman or child with her head in another's lap, who is kindly killing the fleas and other vermin that are burrowing in the low, matted and uncombed hair.

"The Dakotas have no regular time for eating. Dependent as they are upon hunting and fishing for subsistence, they vacillate from the proximity of starvation to gluttony. It is considered uncourteous to refuse an invitation to a feast, and a single man will sometimes attend six or seven in a day and eat intemperately. Before they came in contact with the whites, they subsisted upon venison, buffalo and dog meat. The latter animal has always been considered a delicacy for these epicures. In illustration of these remarks, I transcribe an extract from a journal of a missionary, who visited Lake Traverse, in April, 1839.

"Last evening at dark, our Indians returned, having eaten to the full of buffalo and dog meat. I asked one how many times they had feasted. He said, 'six, and if it had not become dark so soon we should have been called three or four times more!' This morning 'Burning Earth' (Chief of the Sissetonwan Dakotas) came again to our encampment, and moving, we accompanied him to his village at the southwestern end of the lake. In the afternoon, I visited the chief; found him just about to leave for a dog feast to which he had been called. When he had received some papers of medicine I had for him, he left, saying, 'The Sioux love dog meat as well as white people pork.'

"In this connection it should be stated that the Dakotas (Sioux) have no regular hour for retiring. They sleep whenever inclination prompts; some by day and some by night. If you were to enter the Dakota village four miles below St. Paul at midnight, you might, perhaps, see some few huddled around the fire of a tepee (as they call their wigwams), listening to the tale of an old Indian warrior who was often engaged in a bloody conflict with their ancient and present enemies, the Ojibways; or you might hear the unearthly chanting of some medicine-man endeavoring to exorcise some spirit from a sick man; or you might see some lounging about, whiffing out of their sacred red stone pipes the smoke of kinnikinnik, a species of willow bark; or, you might see some of the young men sneaking around a lodge, or, you might hear a low, wild drumming, and then see a group of men daubed with vermillion and other paints, all excited and engaged in some of their grotesque dances; or a portion may be firing their guns into the air, being alarmed by some imaginary evil, and supposing that some enemy is lurking about.

"Dakota females deserve the sympathy of every tender heart. From early childhood, they lead worse than a dog's life. On a winter's day, a Dakota mother is often obliged to travel five, eight or ten miles with the lodge, camp kettle, ax, child and small dogs upon her back. Arriving late in the afternoon at the appointed camping ground, she clears off the snow from the spot upon which she is to erect the tepee. She then, from the nearest marsh or grove, cuts down some poles about ten feet in length. With these she forms a frame work for the tent. Unstrapping her pack, she unfolds the tent cover, which is seven or eight buffalo skins stitched together, and brings the bottom part to the base of the frame. She now obtains a long pole and, fastening it to the skin covering, she raises it. The ends are drawn around the frame until they meet, and the edges of the covering are secured by wooded skewers or tent pins. The poles are then spread out on the ground, so as to make as large a circle inside as she desires. Then she or her children proceed to draw the skins down so as to make them fit tightly. An opening is left where the poles meet at the top, to allow the smoke to escape. The fire is built upon the ground in the center of the lodge. Buffalo skins are placed around, and from seven to fifteen lodge there through a winter's night with far more comfort than a child of luxury on a bed of down. Water is to be drawn and wood cut for the night. The camp kettle is suspended and preparations made for the evening meal. If her lord and master has not by this time arrived from the day's hunt, she is busy in mending moccasins. Such is a scene which has been enacted by hundreds of females this very winter in Minnesota. As a consequence of this hard treatment, the females of this nation are not possessed of very happy faces, and frequently resort to suicide to put an end to earthly troubles."

Here then, mentioned in as brief and concise a manner as commensurate with the undertaking, ends the section of this work devoted to the aborigines among whom the missionary fathers lived and labored for so many toilsome years. And here we leave them to follow for a while the wanderings of those patient and long suffering men, whose entire self-abnegation and devotion to the cause of Christianity did so much towards the enlightenment of the heathen.

"Suffering becomes beautiful when any one bears great calamities with cheerfulness, not through insensibility, but through greatness of mind." —ARISTOTLE.

TO those born in the true faith, who have spent their lives in devotion at its altars, and whose children have received its educational benefits and sacramental blessing, it must be a matter of no ordinary gratulation to witness the growth of the Catholic religion. They learn, too, through existing and unquestionable sources, how, from the midst of what might well have seemed to be inextricable chaos, was evolved a state of moral regeneration so marked in influence and powerful in effect as to become a dominating factor in the slow but certain spread of civilization. Nor is this to be wondered at, knowing, as we do, that neither power nor law enacted of man can effect or maintain a standard of moral excellence, without the vivifying influences of Christianity be coördinate with them. For the laws of God stand paramount and indubitable, strengthening the finite mind, subduing its intolerance and passionate resistance, and bringing the creature into the presence of the Creator in veneration, love and humble submission. But to the rude and savage offspring of the soil, such logic was at best a myth. The gods they worshiped were of their own divining; for years had they served these same masters, while Nature, in many capricious ways, had but led them to believe in their sovereignty over both body and soul. So strong was this conviction within them, that, unlettered as they were, they never doubted the existence of a hereafter, in which, according to their deeds in the flesh, they would receive a proportionate reward for good or evil. They believed, too, that the land of their birth should be maintained proprio vigore, and with savage instinct and brute force fought off the encroaching tide of civilization. To a wilderness, then, of almost impenetrable forest growths; where hidden precipice and fetid odors of innumerable swamps beset the way; the home of lawless savagery, the haunt of ravenous beast and deadly reptile, the Cross of Christ and of His true religion was born.

The inscrutable will of God which had ordained that the Gospel should be carried to the uttermost parts of the earth, was thus, in part at least, fulfilled by a few indomitable spirits, whose devoted lives had been given to the Master's work. No martial pomp was theirs, no loud acclaim or ringing shout of cheer; yet knowing well the dangers which beset their paths, unattended and unarmed, save for the grace and guidance vouchsafed of Heaven, they ventured forth. Of the result of those earnest and self-sacrificing labors, history has long since spoken in glowing and unmeasured terms. Alone, unaided, with naught but the Divine eye upon them, they fought the good fight, and planted the seed of a faith which is ever to be known and revered of man. The events accruing from such an undertaking were naturally of a manifold character, and trying to both physical and moral forces alike. Yet they never faltered, nor abated one whit their interest in the work, though tortured by a thousand disquieting emotions and worn by hunger, exposure and the insidious advances of disease. It was a veritable struggle between the spirit and the flesh, in which, although not a few succumbed to privation and those far more excrutiating agonies of the stake, the cause became triumphant, and Death, indeed, was swallowed up in victory. Thus many precious lives were lost, and many unnoticed graves hold fast those secrets of devotion which must thus ever so remain until the last great day. But if there be aught in prayers and tears, in oft-repeated blessings and the solemn rites of Requiem Mass, then indeed have the lives of those sainted ones not been given in vain.

According to previous arrangements, and in order that the will of the King might be observed, De Monts, the governor of Acadia,[1] made due and suitable provision for the spiritual enlightenment of the Indians dwelling in the territory of which he had acquired the general supervision and control. It was in the year 1608, as previously stated, that De Monts finally established his colony at Port Royal (Annapolis), which was thereby to become, not only the first permanent French settlement in the North, but also the center of Catholic fervor for the entire country round about.

To Port Royal, then, in the early summer of 1611 came the Missionary Fathers Peter Biard and Enemond Massé, who after some considerable period spent among the aborigines[2] of that portion of the country crossed over to the coast of Maine with the avowed intention of propagating the Gospel among the Abenaquis, the tribe who dwelt in that region. But here they met with a determined and violent opposition on the part of the English, which made it necessary for them to abandon any immediate attempt in that direction. Fortunately, however, for the cause of religion, there were other and more promising fields in which to carry forward the work, where, too, interference was limited to that created by the superstitions and ignorance of those whom the missionaries most desired to win, and not from a source of petulant intolerance and bigotry. For in the meantime the energetic Champlain had forced a passage of the St. Lawrence, proceeding up that river until arriving at a point a little beyond the Island of Orleans, where he finally established the settlement of Quebec.

One of the first acts of Champlain after locating this colony was to procure the coöperation and assistance of some members of the priesthood, whose presence could not fail in having a salutary effect among the colonists, while affording ample opportunity for the introduction of Christian customs and worship among the numerous tribes of idolatrous heathen who dwelt around them. Here he in 1615 obtained the assistance of three Recollects, an order but recently established in France, who with one lay brother came over to the new colony in that year. The field into which they were called to operate was both extensive and difficult, made so more particularly from the fact that the people among whom they had cast their lot were subdivided into a number of tribes whose nomadic tendencies and entire dependence on the chase for subsistence caused them to lead a restless and wandering existence. These more particularly were the Montagnais, who dwelt along the banks of the Saginaw and the Algonquins, whose home was on the Ottawa and St. Lawrence. Then, too, there were the Hurons[3] (so named by the French) on Lake Huron, who were destined to become so closely allied with the early history and settlement of the colony. To this latter tribe one of the Recollects immediately attached himself, while the others devoted their time and services to the other two; and in this manner were the religious affairs of the colony conducted until 1625, when three Jesuits came to their assistance. Thus, until the taking of Quebec by the English in 1629, representatives of these two great religious Orders associated together in their work of evangelization.

After the rights of France had been restored to her and she again came into possession of the colony, the Jesuit Order once more renewed their labor among the aborigines, establishing headquarters at Quebec, which place from that time forward became, as it were, the dis-

(1.) Acadia or Nova Scotia by which name it is more generally known, has the distinction of being the oldest French colony in North America. On many occasions for some considerable period subsequent to its discovery this peninsula changed hands, passing back and forth between the French and English governments. The final transfer of this territory was made to the British government by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, although the tenure for a long time following was of an extremely delicate and uncertain character. The bounds of this territory which were kept by contending parties for a long time in dispute were finally established by the English who located the boundary line as east from the mouth of the Kennebec to Quebec, including the southern shore and islands. The territory or province of Acadia lies between 43°25' and 47° north latitude, and 59° 40' and 66° 25' west longitude, and is composed of the peninsula proper, and the adjoining island of Cape Breton which is separated from the mainland by the gut of Canso. Its present boundaries are on the north by Northumberland strait (by which it is divided from Prince Edward Island) and the Gulf of St. Lawrence; north-east south-east and south by the Atlantic Ocean, and west by the Bay of Fundy and New Brunswick, the connecting link between Nova Scotia and the latter Province being an isthmus some thirteen and a half miles in width. The entire province is three hundred and fifty miles in length from southwest to north-east, one hundred and twenty miles in breadth, and occupies an area of 20,907 square miles, equivalent to 13,382,903 acres. The entire province is intersected by chains of lofty hills, which in a majority of instances run parallel with the coast line. Chief among these are the Cobequid Mountains, which stretch in an almost uninterrupted line from the eastern to the western extremity of the province, terminating in Cape Chigneeto. On either side of this range are extensive areas of arable land. The beauty spot of the province, known as the garden of Nova Scotia and Valley of Annapolis, is full of varied scenery, and unrivalled for its immense yield of fruits, flowers and cereals. Of mineral deposits the province has had a reasonable share, the production of iron ore—a most excellent quality—for 1882 having been 42,135 tons. Of other minerals found there have been sold in working quantities manganese ore, gypsum and baryte. One particularly valuable feature about this province is the remarkable facilities for harbor purposes, which are to be found along the entire length of the south-eastern coast. The climate of the province is similar to that of New Brunswick, there being extremes of heat and cold, and sudden changes of temperature, which sometimes vary in one day as much as fifty degrees.

tributing center or point to which all missionary forces were sent, and from whence they were distributed according to necessity throughout the land. In furthering and advancing the work, the religious met with much encouragement and support. Throughout the entire length and breadth of Europe people of all classes and conditions came forward unsolicited, and by generous gift or deed or word did their part in promulgating the interests of the cause and assisting in its furtherance among the people of New France. It was indeed a period of religious fervor and enthusiasm, when under the inspiration of an exalted ideality many a courtly youth left forever the splendors of the palace and camp to bestow unconditionally a life's labor and energies to the conversion of the Indians. Even women took an active interest in the work, aiding materially to its advancement and success.

To the ultimate triumph of this undertaking there were, however, two material drawbacks—the almost senseless inactivity and want of appreciation on the part of the Company to whose control the affairs of the colony had unfortunately been given, who failed in affording both moral and material aid when most needed, and the prolonged and sanguinary wars between the Indian nations, which not only devastated the land but materially retarded commercial relations between the colonists and France. These conditions have already been more or less thoroughly referred to in some of the foregoing chapters, and will consequently need no extended elucidation at the present time, or at least other than such reference as may of necessity be required in our discussion of the various missions,

Of these were established at some time within the limits of the seventeenth century, those of the Abenaquis in Maine, the Hurons in Upper Canada, Michigan and Ohio, the Iroquois in New York, the Illinois in Illinois and the Louisiana Mission. Of the latter we shall naturally have little if anything to say, the field in which we are more particularly interested ranging from the Atlantic coast through New York, westward along the shores and in the country contiguous to the Great Lakes and throughout the Dominion of Canada.

The first Jesuit Mission was established by Father Biard among the Abenaquis,[1] a powerful branch of the Algonquin family, who occupied the greater part of the State of Maine. At this particular time Port Royal was a newly established colony, and it was there that Fathers Peter Biard and Enemond Massé came as representatives of the Jesuit Provincial, Father Coton, who had selected them for such service in response to the urgent request of King Henry IV.

After experiencing many delays and disappointments they finally arrived at Port Royal June 12, 1614. Here they found Father Jessé Fléche, a French priest of Langres, who during a short residence there had confined himself strictly to administering to the spiritual requirements of the colonists. The first serious work undertaken by the newly arrived Fathers was to acquire some knowledge of the people and their language, in which none of the French were able to assist them. Undismayed, they continued to labor, being greatly assisted in their efforts by one Membertou, a converted savage who had acquired quite an intelligent understanding of the French. Unfortunately, however, he died but a short time after the coming of the missionaries to Port Royal, who were thus left entirely to their own resources[2]. It was a difficult task at best, their position being made more embarrassing owing to the unmerited harshness of the treatment experienced by them at the hands of the French Commandant Biencourt. Finally their condition became so unbearable that through the efforts of their friend and patron, the Marchioness de Guercheville, they obtained a patent from the King for a most desirable site near to the banks of the Kennebec.

To further this undertaking a vessel was thoroughly and properly equipped by members of the French court and sent without unnecessary delay to Port Royal, where it finally arrived in March, 1613. Here, according to instructions, the Commander, La Saussaye, took Fathers Biard, Massé, Quentin and Lalemant (the two latter having come with him from France), and Gilbert Du Thet, a lay brother, and with them sailed for Mount Desert Island, their point of destination, which lay near to the mouth of the Penobscot. Through some error in his calculations the pilot landed them on the east side of this island, where, however, they remained, and with due solemnity established the Mission of "the Holy Saviour." Here they built a fort and had about become comfortably settled when their vessel, then ready to sail, was attacked and captured by a number of English craft,

(1) Also called Taranteens by the English and by the people of New York Owenagungas. Biard described these Indians, for whom he expressed an unqualified dislike, as lazy, gluttonous, irreligious, treacherous, cruel and licentious. He makes one exception, however, in the person of the Indian Membertou, whom he refers to as the greatest, most renowned and most redoubtable savage that ever lived in the memory of man. Biard taught him to say the Lord's prayer, though when he came to the petition, "Give us this day our daily bread," he remonstrated, saying, "If I ask for nothing but bread, I shall get no fish or moose meat." Membertou is described as remarkable in person as in character, wearing a long beard like the French.

(2) After the death of Membertou, Biard's greatest difficulty seemed to be in acquiring some knowledge of the language. In this Parkman tells us "young Biencourt was his best interpreter, and on common occasions served him well; but the moment religion was in question, he was, as it were, dumb, the reason being that the language was totally without abstract terms. Biard resolutely set himself to the study of it—a hard and thorny path on which he made small progress and often went astray. Seated, pencil in hand, before some Indian squatting on the floor, whom with the bribe of a mouldy biscuit he had lured into the hut, he plied him with questions which he often neither would nor could answer. What was the Indian word for Faith, Hope, Charity, Sacrament, Baptism, Eucharist, Trinity, Incarnation? Biard's colleague, Masse, was equally zealous and less fortunate. He tried a forest life among the Indians with signal ill success. Hard fare, smoke, filth, the scolding of squaws and the cries of children reduced him to a forlorn condition of body and mind, wore him to a skeleton and sent him back to Port Royal without a single convert."

to whose commander, Argal,[1] the fort was also compelled to surrender. In the short engagement preceding the capture of the vessel Du Thet was mortally wounded. He died on the day following and was buried at the foot of the cross which had been planted as a symbol of their undertaking by the missionaries at the time of their landing.

Argal now assumed a most arrogant and domineering attitude toward his prisoners, and, treating them in an unwarrantable and impious manner, threatened the direst reprisals and some of them even with death. Finally, however, he thought better of it, allowing a number to depart, while the others, among whom were Father Biard and two other Jesuits, he took with him to Virginia, from whence he had promised to forward them to France. Here again, owing to the misrepresentation of Argal, they were on the point of being put to death. The Governor, Sir Thomas Dale, however, took another course, satisfying himself by sending Argal back again with instructions to destroy Port Royal. On this expedition he was accompanied by his Jesuit prisoner, who continued to meet with gross insult and ill-treatment at his hands. Fortunately for them, the vessels engaged in this undertaking were parted during the return journey by a storm, the one on which the Jesuits were confined being driven to a port in the Azores but finally reaching England in safety, from which country Father Biard returned to France. Here ended the first endeavor to establish a mission among the Abenaquis.

Of the leading spirit in the establishment of this mission there is but little of a personal character to give. Peter Biard, S. J., who wrote several of the early Acadian Relations, was born at Grenoble, France, in the year 1567, and died at Avignon November 17, 1622. In 1608 he was called from a chair of scholastic theology and Hebrew in Lyons by Father Coton, the King's confessor and preacher, to assume charge of the Jesuit Missions in Acadia.

Thus matters remained in an unsettled and unsatisfactory condition until the year 1619, when some reverend fathers established another mission in Acadia. At this time their principal point of location was at St. John's River, from whence they administered to those dwelling in the country round about. Of those in charge of this particular work but little remains to record; but it is known that one of the number, Father Sebastian, once visited Quebec, and at a later period is said to have died of starvation while traveling between Miscou and Port Royal. Then some five years later (1624), three[2] of the Order are said to have left the mission and associated themselves with the Recollects at Quebec. As somewhat of a recompense, however, we learn that three Recollects were sent to La Tour's colony by Tufet in 1630, and were still assisting the missionaries at that place in 1633. Then again there were some Capuchins who acted as chaplains to the French and maintained a convent on the Penobscot as well as a hospice on the Kennebec. These, however, had nothing whatever to do with the missions or labors connected with them. Some years later (1642) the Jesuits came again to that vicinity, the cause of their second advent being explained in the following incident which is supplied by the historian Shea:

"In 1642 there existed on the banks of the St. Lawrence a reduction or missionary station, St. Joseph's or Sylleri, founded by the pious and excellent Commander Noel Brulart de Sillery, where the Jesuits had gathered many Algonquins and Montagnais, who from their love of the faith gave up their wandering life to till the ground and reside near their pastors. Among the noblest of the neophytes who renewed at Sylleri all the purity and sanctity of the primitive church, and made it the Elysium of Canada, was Charles Meiaskwat. In 1642 some Abenaquis were taken by a party of pagan Algonquins, and though well known not to be enemies, and easily recognized by their language as members of the same great Algic family, were treated with every possible cruelty. To rescue them, Charles and Nicolet, an early explorer of the West, started in all haste from Sylleri; Nicolet perished in a rapid, and Meiaskwat reached his pagan countrymen in time to save their victims and brought them back in holy triumph to Sylleri, where then existed a hospital of the nuns, now at Quebec. Here the poor Abenaquis were received and soon cured of their wounds. When sufficiently recovered, one set out for his native village, armed, equipped and supplied with provisions, and, moreover, not alone, but attended by Charles Meiaskwat. That excellent man reached the Kennebec, visited the English at Coussinoc, now Augusta, and everywhere so extolled the greatness of the Christian doctrine and its sublime promises, that many were filled with a desire to know it thoroughly and see it in its practical workings. One Sagamo, or chief, accompanied Meiaskwat to Quebec, and after instruction embraced the faith.—(Relation 1642-3).

"Others followed his example, and in a few years each

(1) Samuel; also spelled Argall, was first known as the captain of an illicit trading vessel. Parkman describes him as a man of ability and force—one of those compounds of craft and daring in which the age was fruitful; for the rest unscrupulous and grasping. It was he who abducted Pocahontas, and carried her a prisoner to Jamestown, Virginia, where she met and married the Englishman Rolfe. One special mission given him by Governor Dale of Virginia was to expel the French from any settlement which came within the limits of what were known as King James' patents. It was on a cruise of this character that he happened to fall in with a French vessel, which finally resulted in the demolition of the mission of St. Saviour and settlement of Port Royal. Argal finally became Deputy Governor of Virginia, which colony under a military code he ruled with a rod of iron. For still further services he was knighted by King James in 1623.

Abenaqui village could count several Christians. At last two Sagamos came on Assumption Day to ask for Black-gowns to instruct the tribe. They were joyfully and graciously received by the Governor, Montmagny, a knight of Malta, and zealous for the spread of religion. As soon as the peace with the Iroquois in 1646 gave the Jesuits a breathing spell, Father Gabriel Dreuillettes was sent to the Kennebec at the same time that Father Isaac Jogues was sent to the Mohawk[1]. As this new mission had been asked for on the feast of that name, it attained the title of the 'Assumption.' The missionary set out on the 29th of August, attended by Noel Negabamat and a party of Indians, and soon reached Kennebec, though the journey was one of pain and hardship. All gathered around him with joyful welcomes, for the Abenaquis are a docile people, and quite susceptible of good impressions[2]. Further acquaintance confirmed their esteem; the missionary shared their hard fare without a sign of discontent; bore every hardship in traveling with gayety and cheerfulness, and in their hour of plenty took his own portion to the sick. To learn their dialect was his first care, and in two or three months he was better able to converse than Algonquins who had been long amongst them."

It would seem from the foregoing and much which followed that Father Dreuillettes was eminently successful in his missionary labors among these people. They turned out in fact to be great enthusiasts in all matters pertaining to religion, listening attentively to all he had to tell them about the wonderful belief, and anxiously seeking baptism at his hands. The Reverend Missionary selected as his place of residence a spot a short distance beyond the English post, where the natives erected him a crude chapel. Here prior to receiving them to pledge them as Catechumens,[3] he required them to pledge themselves to renounce entirely the use of intoxicating liquors, to live in peace with their neighbors and to give up their medicine bags and other superstitious paraphernalia. Thus he continued to do much good, and acquired an ascendancy over them, for which in particular he was recognized and highly approved of by the English settlers, as well as warmly commended for his zeal by Father Ignatius de Paris, at that time Superior of the Capuchins on the Kennebec. So he remained among the Abenaquis until the month of May, which had been the time appointed for his departure.

It was not until 1650, at which time the Capuchins were no longer residents of that locality, and after fervent and oft-repeated requests on the part of the Abenaquis, that Father Dreuillettes again visited that country, setting forth for that purpose on the last day of August. Of added duties on this occasion as representative of the Governor of Canada, he had a number, not the least important of these being to arrange an amicable understanding between the settlers of New England and New France, where both might be alike benefited and protected. In this mission, however, as elsewhere intimated, he was unsuccessful.

On this occasion having remained for a few days among the people of Honidgwalk,[4] a principal Abenaqui village, Father Dreuillettes descended to Coussinoc,[5] which place he left in the following November, and coasting along passed Cape Ann, at last arriving at Boston harbor. In June, 1651, he returned for a brief period to Quebec, thence back again to Boston, after which he continued to labor among the missions on the Kennebec until the early spring (March) of 1652, at which time he once more arrived at Quebec. Of this good man the Abenaquis had the highest opinion, ever "extolling his sanctity and devotedness." But although he may be said to have thus worked with great satisfaction and success among these people, the condition of the Huron missions and the reduction in the ranks of the missionaries from death and other causes, made it impossible for the immediate continuance of the Abenaqui mission in the appointment of a successor to Father Dreuillettes. As regards his immediate future, we learn that in 1655 he was sent with Father Garreau to found a mission at Lake Superior; but when that undertaking was discontinued owing to the murder of the latter near Montreal, he was again sent among the Indians of Maine, where he remained during the following winter. A few months later, however, he was recalled and sent to the distant missions of the West, where he remained in active service for many years following.

Being unable to continue a regular mission, and desiring to maintain their prestige among the Indians of Maine, the Jesuits endeavored to do so by inviting those of that nation who had already become Christians to establish themselves at Sylleri, the population of which place had been greatly reduced by war and disease. The proposition was received favorably, and as a result it

(2) This exhibits a wide difference of opinion from that given by Father Biard, which we have also quoted literally. Of course there is a possibility that subsequent associations with the whites had done something towards improving their character; yet it is hardly to be imagined that so great a change had been brought about as that which these two diametrically opposed opinions would certainly suggest.

(3) Undoubtedly the Capuchins referred to by Charlevoix as having a "hospice on the banks of the Kennebec and house at Pentagoet, who received the Jesuit Missionaries with great joy and all possible cordiality." It must be remembered, however, that while Father Ignatius welcomed him warmly, according to other authorities, he or his successor was, owing to stress of circumstances, compelled at a later date to request his permanent withdrawal from that territory.

(5) It was here that Dreuillettes, who was known throughout that section of the country as the "patriarch," met John Winslow, agent of the Plymouth colony on that coast, and brother of Edward, who had procured (July 27, 1649) the charter of the Corporation for Propagating the Gospel. It appears that a strong friendship must have sprung up between those two men, as the missionary refers to the occasion with much warmth and feeling.

was not long before that place became known as an Abenaqui mission. By this time, however, the site of Sylleri became objectionable, owing to the fact that the cultivation of the soil for a series of years had reduced its productive qualities to a minimum, as a result of which Father James Bigot, to whose care the affairs of this place were confided, looked out for a more suitable location. Of this new place the Marchioness de Bauche, a charitable lady of France, became the patroness. In the year 1683 an exceedingly desirable location was purchased at the Falls of Chaudiere, regarded as one of the most beautiful cataracts in Canada, where the mission of St. Francis de Sales was permanently established. This place was well settled from the start, although the entire evacuation of Sylleri did not occur until 1685, when the remaining residents of that place removed to the new mission in company with Fathers Bigot and Gassot.

It was about this time that a persistent effort was made by Father Bigot to re-establish the original Abenaqui mission, in the accomplishment of which he came in contact with stubborn opposition on the part of the Fishery Company, who monopolized the greater portion of the coast of Maine. Fortunately, however, Governor Denonville favored the enterprise, the result being that the mission was renewed in 1688 by Father Bigot, whose efforts were ably seconded by Father Thury, who established a similar organization at Panawinske on the Penobscot. In addition to this, the Recollect Father Simon also located a mission at Medoktek, near to the mouth of the St. John.

Thus matters progressed quite favorably, although occasional dissensions among the tribes occupying the territory so often disputed between the French and English, created many serious difficulties which might otherwise have been avoided. However, all things being taken into consideration, the condition was quite favorable, so that at the time of which we speak (1689), and during some considerable period subsequently, the missionary interests of that section were subserved by Fathers Julian Binneteau, Joseph Aubery, Peter de la Chasse, Sebastian Rale, Stephen Lauvergat and Loyard. Of the experience of Father Rale, who was best known among this coterie, Shea speaks as follows:

"Stationed first at the Chaudiére village, then in the Illinois country, we find him from 1695 at Honidgwalk engaged in duties which were his only thought till his death satisfied a political hatred. The site of his mission now called Indian Old Point is a sequestered spot on the Kennebec where nature in all her charms still arrests the attention of the traveler. Rale is not the apostle of the Kennebec. At his arrival the Abenaquis were almost if not quite all converted, and had a small but well-built church. For a part of the year the missionary and his flock remained at the village; but when the crops had been sown they repaired to the sea coast to fish, a traveling tent like Israel's tabernacle being their chapel on the way and a bark cabin receiving it on the shore. In like manner the winter was spent in hunting either on the coast or in the mountains.

"Soon after beginning his labors here, Rale beheld a new tribe approach his mission; the Amalingans came to ascertain the truth of what they had heard. Struck by all that they saw at the mission, they solicited instruction, listened to his teaching and embraced the faith when at the next season he visited their camp. Thenceforth they and the Abenaquis seemed to have coalesced."

It was during the month of June, 1699, that the energetic and devoted Thury passed into the hereafter amidst the scenes and surroundings to which he had devoted a considerable portion of his life. Peter Thury, we are told, was born at Bayeux and ordained to the priesthood at Quebec on the 21st day of December, 1677, soon after allying himself with the Seminary of the Foreign Missions. Disclosing an unwonted interest in the missionary affairs of the time, he was finally appointed by Bishop Laval to Acadia in 1684; and in the year following, having pretty thoroughly explored the country, he finally located a mission at St. Croix. Two years later, and at the earnest request of St. Castine, he was transferred to the Penobscot, where he remained with one temporary exception. He was succeeded at the Penobscot mission by Messrs. Gaulin and Rageot, both members of the Foreign Missions, and who remained there till 1703, in which year the mission was finally transferred to the Jesuits, who in accepting the same obtained control of the entire missionary field of Maine. Of the mission on the St, Lawrence during this same period, Shea tells us that it was "most flourishing; but as the location on the banks of the Chaudiére was found inconvenient, the Abenaquis, after a residence of ten or twelve years on that beautiful and most romantic spot, removed in 1700 to the place which they still occupy, giving it the name of their patron saint, Francis de Sales."

In 1703 fresh disturbances arose between the countries of England and France which naturally involved their different colonies. The people of New England became particularly aggressive, and endeavored at first to deprive the Jesuits of their personal freedom; then needing their help, in order that the Abenaquis might be persuaded to remain neutral, and failing in the same, they became still more blood-thirsty, even to the extent of seeking the lives of the missionaries. It was in 1705 that a party of them went to Honidgwalk, where they burned the Catholic church and profaned the sanctuary.

This was replaced by the Indians with a structure of bark which served the purpose, although it was far from being as satisfactory as the handsome church which met with such ruthless destruction at the hands of the enemy.

These difficulties, however, were at last settled, or at least overcome in 1713 by the peace of Utrecht, which ceded that particular territory to the British government. It was then, too, that the Abenaquis determined to emigrate, and for that purpose proceeded to Becancour on the St. Lawrence. Quite a number of them, however, decided to remain where they were, and having fully determined upon so doing, Father Rale made preparations for the erection of a new church.

With this in view, therefore, a number of the chiefs of the tribe went to Boston, it being more accessible than Quebec, in order that they might secure the necessary workmen to undertake the building. This came to the ears of the Governor, who at once made them most flattering offers of aid and assistance if they would defer to his wishes in ignoring the Jesuits, and accept a preacher of his selection. In answer to this request the spokesman of the deputation indignantly replied: "When you first came here, you saw me long before the French Governors, but neither your predecessors or your ministers ever spoke to me of prayer or the Great Spirit. They saw my furs, my beaver and moose skins, and of these alone they thought. These alone they sought, and so greedily that I have not been able to supply half enough. When I had much they were my friends, and only then. One day my canoe missed the route; I lost my path and wandered a long way at random, until at last I landed near Quebec in a great village of the Algonquins where the Black-gowns were teaching. Scarcely had I arrived when one of them came to see me. I was loaded with furs, but the Black-gown of France disdained to look at them; I heard him with pleasure, and was so delighted by his words that I remained in the village near him. At last the prayer pleased me, and I asked to be instructed; I solicited Baptism and received it, Then I returned to the lodges of my tribe, and related all that had happened. All envied my happiness, and wished to partake of it; they, too, went to the Black-gowns to be baptized. Thus have the French acted. Had you spoken to me of the prayer as soon as we met, I should now be so unhappy as to pray like you, for I could not have told whether your prayer was good or bad. Now I hold to the prayer of the French; I agreed to it; I shall be faithful to it even until the earth is burned and destroyed; keep your men, your gold and your minister; I will go to my French Father."

So Shea tells us the church was accordingly rebuilt by the French, though little chapels were subsequently raised by English workmen in 1721. The peace which followed the treaty of 1713 gave a much desired opportunity to the missionaries in which they might visit unrestrainedly among the numerous towns and tribes of Indians which dotted the territory of Maine and Canada. But this pleasing and profitable period was to last but for a while, the continued and oft-resented encroachment of the settlers creating a feeling of discontent and ill-will among the savages which more or less frequently broke out into open revolt with its attending sanguinary results. In this, however, it must with all fairness be said, the Indians were both patient and consistent, asking time and again that reservation lines might be adopted whereby they could appreciate the limit of their own territory, which rights also could thus be observed without unnecessary encroachments being made by the whites. It was an age of covetousness, in fact, in which the accumulation of worldly gear had a more telling effect upon the minds and consciences of the settlers than their duty to their fellowmen, as exhibited in the treatment meted out by them to the Indians; and as one writer pertinently puts it in referring to the action of Governor Shute at Georgetown in 1717, "they were wholly wanting in consistency in their treatment of public affairs and offered them a Bible with the same hand with which they grasped their lands."

And so the troubles multiplied and grew, until a sanguinary war seemed inevitable. It was at this time, in fighting the wars of his people and demanding a consideration of their interests, that Father Rale became personally obnoxious to the English, who soon after determined upon a concerted effort to capture him. In the fall of 1722, a party of over two thousand men, commanded by Colonel Westbrook, marched upon Honidgwalk, believing—it being during the height of the hunting season—that they would find him unprepared, and therefore an easy prey. They were seen, however, in time sufficient to warn the Missionary of his danger, and admit of his escape. They satiated their appetite for revenge by pillaging his church, and carrying off everything of a valuable and portable nature which came within their reach. Among these articles, and most valuable and prized of all, was the Reverend Father's Abenaqui Dictionary, which is at the present time regarded as one of the "most precious remains of the early philological labors on the Indian language." The original of this work is yet preserved with greatest care in the safe of the library of Harvard College.

Father Rale did not return to the town, but wandered on in a sad condition, amidst great suffering and privations, until at last he was reached by a relief party from Quebec. Speaking of his sufferings at that time, he was, upon the urgent request of those who sought him to return to Quebec, led to exclaim, "My measures are taken; God has committed this flock to my care and I will share its lot—too happy if permitted to sacrifice my life for it. I fear none of these things; neither do I count my life more precious than myself, so that I may consummate my course and the ministry of the Word which I received from the Lord Jesus."

In 1723 Father Loyard, who had succeeded in charge of the mission on the St. John's, made a visit to Europe for the purpose of obtaining aid to assist in carrying on the Abenaqui mission, and secure thereby some recognition of their faithfulness in standing so valiantly and consistently by the Catholic religion and French people. The request met with considerable favor, and as a result quite a little was done in order that they might be placed on a footing more commensurate with the general condition of affairs, and which enabled them to defend themselves in a manner altogether more satisfactory. In fact they continued the war with so much vigor and energy that in the following year the English expressed a strong desire for a discontinuance of hostilities, but prior to the final settlement determined to once more attempt the capture and destruction of Father Rale, towards whom they maintained a most persistent and bitter hatred. At last their opportunity came; for on the 23d of August, 1724, a small force of British in conjunction with some Mohawks came upon the village in which he was then residing and surrounded it. Hearing of the danger of his people, upon whom the invaders were even then indiscriminately firing, and realizing the fact that he and he alone was the cause of the trouble, he valiantly went forth to his death, struck dead by a volley of bullets at the very head of the mission cross, which symbol of redemption he had himself raised in the forest. "Thus," says Shea, "fell the greatest of the Abenaqui missionaries; by Catholics esteemed a martyr; by the Puritans a bloody inciter of Indian war. His position was a trying one, and in the iniquitous course pursued by the English towards his flock he certainly could not counsel the latter to submit; but while thus urging resistance to oppression, there is nothing to show that he excited his flock to cruelty. Among our Indian missionaries Father Rale will always rank as one of the greatest—learned, zealous, laborious, careful of the religious progress of his flock, and careless of his own comfort and life, desirous even of martyrdom. Tried on the Illinois mission, he spent most of his life in Maine, and dying at an advanced age when most men seek rest and quiet, he was still, though a cripple, an earnest laborer. Father Sebastian Rale was born in Franche Comté in 1658. After completing his education he taught Greek in the College of Nismes, remaining there until the year 1689, when he came to America, arriving at Quebec on October 13. He was first sent to the Abenaqui mission of St. Francis and from thence, about the year 1693, to one in Illinois. Two years later he was transferred to the Kennebec mission."

Thus fell the mission at Honigdwalk, those of the Abenaquis who remained there going over into Canada, where they joined the mission of St. Francis, at that time under the direction of Father Aubery. But in spite of the lapse of time and the evident desire of the French King to console them for their loss in ordering that the body of the dead missionary be properly "covered," the Abenaquis were restless and unsatisfied. They desired in fact to re-establish their former village and to once more return to the scenes which through long years of residence had become so necessary and familiar to them. To this end they earnestly sought the assistance of the Jesuit Superior at Quebec, whom they urgently petitioned to send them a missionary. The result was that Father James de Sirenne was appointed in 1730, at which time they returned to their former haunts and home.

And so matters continued to wear along, until the war of the Austrian Succession created another colonial outbreak, which resulted in the utter desolation of the province of Acadia.

Of the farther disturbances and irruptions which occurred, it is at this time unnecessary to speak, save to remark the immediate effects such conditions wrought upon the numerous missions which were scattered throughout the disaffected country. Thus, as Shea tells us, in the course of this contest, the old country of Acadia was crushed to the ground. The French settlers were carried off, their farms and villages burned, and the missionaries imprisoned or driven out. Manach of the foreign missions, the missionary of the Micmacs, was sent to France; Le Loutre was a prisoner in Jersey, and in 1760 there remained on the St. John's only Coquart, who soon after withdrew to France, and of the Jesuits one certainly, perhaps two; for as their popularity was waning in France, their missions in Canada declined. Father Germain was the last of the old Jesuit missionaries in Maine, his chief station being at the village of St. Anne, on an island in the St. John's, near the site of the present town of Fredericton, whence he visited the various tribes in Maine, leading a life of laborious usefulness amid general respect. Yet even he did not deem his life safe in the War, and withdrew to the mission of St. Francis on the St. Lawrence, where he remained until his death (1779).

From the period of the war, the various Abenaqui villages in Maine were deprived of pastors for several years; the mission of St. Francis in Canada was totally destroyed by the English partisan Rogers and his rangers, who killed many of the Abenaquis, burned the church, and left the survivors utterly destitute.

Throughout all of these tribulations, however, the Abenaquis remained faithful to their trust and the religion which had been taught them at the expense of so much moral as well as physical discomfort and endurance. They proved, in fact, faithful in all things, taking up the sword in defense of those who had done so much for their spiritual condition, fighting side by side with these friends, suffering with them in their defeats and enduring their martyrdom and exile. For be it remembered that while the English conceded to the Canadians their freedom and rights, they used every power at their command, both logical as well as physical, to suppress the Jesuits and Recollects. They in fact kept them out of the country as much as possible, and as it was these Orders which had formerly been looked to to supply all vacancies or necessary additions in and to the mission, much difficulty was at times experienced, and as a result the missions established in Maine were gradually deserted.

After the Revolutionary War, in which the Abenaquis took an active part on the side of the Americans the few and scattered Catholic residents of Maryland sought for and found a Bishop in the person of the Rt. Rev. John Carroll, a member of the suppressed Society of Jesus. To him also the Abenaquis went, imploring that a missionary be sent among them to teach and preach of the religion to which they had so steadfastly clung through all of their adversity.

Bearing a crucifix into his presence, the spokesman of the delegation said: "If I give it to thee, Father, it is as a pledge and promise that thou wilt send us a priest." So pleased was the Bishop with their evident earnestness, that although pressed for both means and material with which to supply his own extensive diocese, he gave the necessary promise, applying at once to the Superior of St. Sulpice, feeling confident that "France would not refuse a successor to her Rale." So the charge of these people was given into the hands of Mr. Ciquard, who, having learned the language, assumed the spiritual direction of the whole tribe, continuing actively engaged in that field of labor for a period of ten years, until 1794, when he was transferred to another place.

"Francis Ciquard[1] was born at Clermont in France, and ordained to the priesthood in 1779. He joined the Sulpitians, and when the Revolution broke out was director of the Theological Seminary of Bourges. He came to America in order to join the Sulpitians of Montreal, but was not permitted by the English Governor to enter Canada. After laboring many years in the United States and New Brunswick, he obtained the necessary authority, and was for some years missionary at St. Francis. He died at Montreal, leaving the reputation of a holy, humble and zealous priest."

In the meantime strenuous efforts were made to keep the Abenaqui Mission on the Penobscot in an active condition, for which purpose the Rev. John Cheverus, at that time in the missionary service, and residing at Boston, began to actively study the language of that people. Having accomplished the undertaking, he at once went among them, being received with intense delight by the entire settlement. For three months following he gave his whole time to confessing, catechising, baptising and visiting the sick and dying throughout the territory pertaining to the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy. He never forgot those days or the warmth and fervor of the spontaneous reception he met with on his coming, as is evidenced in the fact that after he had passed to a higher estate within the gift of the Church, he both as a priest and Bishop paid them regular visits annually, built for them a church and gave to them an excellent and kindly pastor in the person of the Rev. Mr. Romagné, who took up his abode at Point Pleasant on the Passamaquoddy, where for nearly twenty years he devoted his entire time to the labor of saving souls.

Of Father John Louis Lefebre de Cheverus we learn from his life, by Dubourg, that he was born at Mayenne on the 28th of January, 1768. He received the tonsure at an early age, and was ordained priest in December, 1790, at the last public ordination in Paris before the Revolution. In the persecution which succeeded the overthrow of the monarchy, Cheverus escaped to England in 1792, and three years after joined his friend, Mr. Mategnon, at Boston. His visit to the Penobscots was made soon after his arrival.

Appointed Bishop of Boston in 1808, he was transferred to the See of Montauban in 1823, and three years after created Bishop of Bordeaux. So great were his virtues that Leo XII., in February, 1836, proclaimed him Cardinal—a dignity he did not live long to enjoy, his death occurring on the 7th of July of the same year.

Of Father Romagné's further experience, it may be said that he continued to work with great devotion in this chosen field of labor, until, worn out by continued infirmities, he at length returned to France just a short time after Bishop Fenwick had been raised to the See of Boston. In his departure, therefore, the people of the two tribes were left without a pastor and spiritual advisor; this difficulty was somewhat overcome by Bishop Fenwick, who placed the Penobscots in charge of the Dominican Father Charles French, who permanently stationed at Eastport made frequent visits among them to celebrate the Mass and perform other duties in connection with his office as spiritual advisor.

The Passamaquoddys, however, were less fortunate in the one sent to them, receiving in the place of their former ardent and devoted pastor a teacher by the name of Kellogg, who, Shea says, did just enough work to enable him to draw from the Government his pay for teacher, and from the Society his stipend as missionary, for he made no converts, and not one of his pupils could spell a word of two syllables in 1827. In 1831, however, and immediately succeeding a personal visit of good Bishop Fenwick to these people, the Penobscots were furnished with a resident missionary, the result of which was the subsequent erection of a handsome church and neat parsonage, while the straggling and not-over-cleanly cabins of the Indians gave way, in many instances, to neatly painted and comfortably appointed cottages. This church was dedicated in honor of St. Anne, who was recognized as patroness of the tribe.

But the Passamaquoddys remained unfortunately as before in their relations, being still without a pastor, and much exposed, we are told, "to the influence of the corruption and proselytizing spirit of the whites." In 1833 Shea tells us, the Society of Picpus, the Congregation of the Third Order of St. Francis, sent out Messrs. Edmond Demilier and Petithomme, destined to restore the Franciscan Missions in Maine. They arrived at Boston, and at once began to study the Penobscot language, Demilier attaching himself to their villages and Petithomme to their winter camp. They in fact established a most successful mission, so that early in the year 1834 the Bishop already possessed of a manuscript Prayerbook, arranged and prepared by Father Romagné, felt warranted in having it printed, so as to further facilitate the labors in that direction. In the following spring Mr. Petithomme was transferred to another field of usefulness, but Demilier was left undisturbed, his knowledge of the language being so extensive that he was enabled to confess the people in their native tongue. In the conversion and instruction of these Indians, and their further advancement towards civilization, he labored arduously and successfully until the time of his death, which occurred July 23, 1843. The Mission then devolved upon Father John Bapst, a member of the Society of Jesus, to which Order the charge of the Mission was transferred by the Rt. Rev. John Fitzpatrick, who had succeeded Bishop Fenwick in the episcopate of Boston.

This was in 1848, since which time the Penobscots and Passamaquoddys have been continuously under the management of the priests of the Jesuit Order. On the 29th of August, 1833, one hundred and nine years after the fight at Honidgwalk, and on the spot where the venerable Father Rale had yielded up a fruitful and useful life to a glorious martyrdom, there were gathered together a large body of Penobscot and Passamaquoddy converts. The point at which they had congregated was an ideal one, as from the site of the former Indian village, and within easy range of the naked eye, the river could be noted in its devious windings through the broad and beautiful plain which lay beneath. It was to this spot that these people had been invited by Bishop Fenwick, to whom had occurred the pious and gracious idea of erecting a lasting monument and tribute to the memory of the man who had sacrificed his earthly career and even life to the instruction and evangelization of the heathen.

Here, then, in the midst of these scenes so fraught with pathetic memories, was raised a plain but massive shaft of granite, surmounted by a cross, the base being adorned by a simple Latin inscription, telling the traveler that that picturesque and lonely spot was "once the site of a house of God and a Christian village, and that the pastor was slain and the flock dispersed." Although but a silent and pulseless memento, it still remains an evidence of a great work, the breadth and momentous importance of which called forth this spontaneous expression of gratitude from the heart of Bishop Fenwick. At a later date, when the hands upon the dial plate of Time had already entered well upon the last half of the present century, there remained as evidences of the strenuous efforts and devotion of former days a settlement of the Penobscots on the island of Indian Old Town, while the Passamaquoddys awaited their doom at Pleasant Point and Louis Island in the St. Croix. Each village still maintained its belief in that faith, which had so long ago led their people[1] to the foot of the Cross, as an evidence of which they had also erected a neat, substantial and tasty church, dedicated to St. Anne, who has always been regarded as the patroness of the tribe.

(1) Of the present Indian population in the State of Maine we learn by consulting the reports of "Indians taxed and Indians not taxed in the United States," issued by the Department of the Interior in 1890, that there were altogether five hundred and fifty-nine; two hundred and ninety-nine males and two hundred and sixty females. The Penobscots have their headquarters at Old Town, dwelling chiefly along the Penobscot River in the county of the same name. These people are engaged to a certain extent in agriculture and also in the manufacture of baskets and other like articles, for which a market is found at the summer resorts, of which there are quite a number in that section of the country. The young men, however, departing from the usual traditions of their race, have for some years past followed the lumbering business, being esteemed excellent river drivers, at which they earn a considerable amount annually. These people elect a representative in the State Legislature; they are nearly all of the Roman Catholic faith, a large number of their children attending a school in charge of Sisters of Charity. There are some, however, who are in attendance at schools conducted and directed by town authorities.

AS previously stated, when the French founded Quebec the Hurons (Wendats or Wyandots) were occupying a rather limited territory on a peninsula on the southern extremity of Georgian Bay (Lake Huron), the entire area of which did not exceed seventy-five by twenty-four miles. Here within this narrow space dwelt the four tribes comprising the nation the entire population of which numbered in the neighborhood of thirty thousand souls. Directly west of the Huron country lay that of the Tionnontates, or Petuns, a different people, though closely allied with the Hurons, while south, in addition to numerous other tribes of less importance, lay the country of their hereditary foe—the fierce and vindictive Iroquois. Being a wandering people, the Hurons mixed much with adjoining and even far-distant tribes, from some of whom they first learned of the arrival of white men upon the continent, and their expressed desire and anxiety to barter for the valuable peltries of which the Indians were possessed. This but added to the interest of the Hurons in these strangers, and the outlines of the future settlement of Quebec were hardly to be discerned when a large number of them arrived at Three Rivers, having made the journey by way of French River and the Ottawa, at that time a dangerous as well as tedious undertaking. From this occasion also dated their first acquaintance with the missionary Fathers, then limited in number to three[1] Recollects who came to New France in 1615.

Arrived at the country of the Hurons, Father le Caron first established himself near to the village of Carragouha in a cabin built by the Hurons for his accommodation, who, pleased and flattered at his coming, had invited him to appropriate to his use their principal cabin, located within the stout and lofty palisades surrounding the village, and which might thus have afforded him every protection. Here he began his first labors in this new and untried field, offering up the sacrifice of the Mass in the presence of a large number of surprised and wondering natives. A little later, upon the return of Champlain to that neighborhood in the early part of the following year, he attached himself to the party, journeying with them into the country of the Tionnontates, to whom he also desired to announce the doctrine of Christianity. Here his reception was hardly as favorable as it had been among the Hurons, it being necessary for him to overcome a very considerable opposition and even persecution at the hands of the medicine men, who recognized in the establishment of this new religion the downfall of many, if not all of the privileges which had accrued to them through their idolatrous customs in times gone by. However, he was fortunate enough to establish somewhat of an understanding among these people, and succeeded in baptizing a number of children and adults.

After a brief stay in this locality he again returned to his home among the Hurons, where he worked with unabated energy until such time as a large party announced themselves in readiness to make the journey down to Three Rivers. This was the last seen of Father le Caron in that part of the country for a number of years, owing to the fact that more weighty and responsible duties fell to his lot and necessitated his remaining at Quebec, from which point he could superintend the missionary work rapidly accruing in importance among the tribes in that locality. Until 1622 the Huron mission was neglected, but in that year the work was partially revived by Father William Poulain, who made a visit of some considerable duration to that portion of the country. Then again the Hurons were left without the benefits to be acquired from the location of a spiritual adviser in their midst, until in the following year Father Nicolas Viel and Brother Gabriel Sagard were added to the missionary force at Quebec. In company with these two, le Caron again ventured the journey to the scene of his previous efforts, reaching the village of Carragouha, or St. Gabriel, on August 20, 1622, where he found his cabin still intact and awaiting his return, although somewhat in need of repairs. Here, then, dwelt these three zealous and energetic men, their time being devoted entirely in administering to the spiritual wants of the Frenchmen who had accompanied them and educating, to the best of their ability the natives in all matters pertaining to a true and thorough appreciation of the Catholic faith.

(1) Of these three, Father Dennis Jamay remained in Quebec; John d'Olbeau went to Tadoussac, while Father le Caron assumed charge of the Hurons and other Western tribes. To this end he set forth in the year of his arrival, accompanied by twelve Frenchmen, whose purpose was to establish more satisfactory trading relations with the Hurons. The missionaries soon became proficient in the Algonquin and Huron tongues, at that time the two principal languages of Canada, thus being enabled to bear the "glad tidings" both far and wide.

When the summer months arrived, finding the work had made quite satisfactory progress, Father le Caron, accompanied by Brother Sagard, returned to the settlements, leaving Father Viel in charge of the entire mission. Of the life experienced by the missionaries at that time, Father le Caron says: "Our ordinary food was that of the Indians, that is to say sagamity,[1] a kind of pottage made of bruised Indian corn, squashes and peas boiled in water, seasoned with marjoram[2]; purslane[3] and a kind of balsam with wild onions, which were found in the woods and fields. Our drink was the water of the stream which ran before the cabin, and if, when the trees were in sap, any one was unwell, we made an incision in the bark of a maple, whence flowed a sugary water, which, being gathered in bark trays, was drunk as a sovereign remedy. Our only candles were little rolls of bark which lasted but a moment, so that we were obliged to read and write by the light of the fire during the winter evenings, which was a great inconvenience."

Father Viel, though an earnest and ardent worker, can only be said to have been partially successful in his labors at this time. The first drawback experienced by him was in acquiring a reasonable knowledge of the language of the people, a difficult task in view of the fact of its great deficiency in abstract terms. Having succeeded, however, he at once applied himself to teaching the Indians to recite the ordinary prayers of the church, itself an undertaking of herculean proportions. Then followed discouragement and uncertainty, for it was next to impossible to arrive at any just or positive appreciation of the effect to be counted upon as having accrued as a direct result of all this labor, the stolidity and seeming indifference of the Indians making it almost impossible for one to measure the extent of the impression it had made upon them. In spite of this, however, and the general belief that the Indian could only be brought to a realizing sense of his condition by becoming thoroughly familiar with the customs and habits of people in Christian lands, the worthy Fathers continued to labor and hope, although this seemingly thankless task was at times made still more unendurable by the avarice and inconsistent conduct of those from whom should have come nothing but encouragement and aid.

Additional strength and interest, however, was lent to the undertaking in 1625, in which year Fathers Charles Lalemant and Enemond Massé, who had been actively conducting the Acadian mission, Father de Brebeuf and other Recollects came to Quebec. It was at this time that Father Viel met with his death,[4] the cause of which was attributed to the hatred of the Indian guide, to whose care he had entrusted himself on the way down to Three Rivers to consult with his Superior regarding matters pertaining to the mission. Of the place of birth, age or previous labors of this lamented missionary there is nothing extant, any knowledge of him, therefore, being limited to that acquired during his brief and somewhat eventful career among the Canadian missions. The untimely death of Father Viel proved a great loss to the missionaries, nearly all of whom were entirely ignorant of the language and manners of the people among whom they were called upon to labor. It was also detrimental to the interest and welfare of the Hurons, who were thus for a number of months deprived of the valuable services of a spiritual adviser. In about a year, however, when the time for the annual flotilla arrived, de Brebeuf, Dallion and Anne de Noue, having somewhat fitted themselves for the task, prepared to embark for the Huron country. At length, after experiencing the usual difficulties, the party arrived in safety at Carragouha.[5]

Among this company was Father de la Roche, who, having remained with the others for some time, set out in the following October on a journey of exploration, his object being a visit to the Neutrals.[6] Arriving at the country of these people, he was received with the greatest consideration, a special mark of favor being shown in his adoption by Soharissen, at that time chief of the nation. He remained with the Neutrals for a time, but finally, after having been subjected to most inhuman treatment at the hands of some of the tribes, he abandoned them and on the advice of Father de Brebeuf, returned to the Huron mission. Totally unable to grapple with the difficulties pertaining to a sufficient understanding of the language, de Noue finally returned to Quebec in 1627, to which place he was followed a year subsequently by Father de la Roche. De Brebeuf, however, remained, undismayed with the magnitude of the task he had determined to accomplish; and in this he was eminently successful, acquiring a liberal understanding of the language of the people, adapting himself quite readily to their customs and manners, and above all—a most necessary feature—gaining their entire confidence. Great was the feeling, then, aroused among the Hurons when the imperative demand of his Superior took this pastor from their midst. This was in 1629, in which year, though greatly against his own inclinations, he was compelled to sever his connection with those who had become so much endeared to him. Nor, as it turned out, was this sacrifice on his part of any avail, as but three days after his arrival at Quebec that settlement fell into the hands of the English, and for the time being the labors of the missionary[1] Fathers were brought to an end. The missionaries returned to their native country, where they devoted considerable time to preparing themselves for the return of that period when they would again be afforded an opportunity of continuing their labors among the heathen of Canada.

Canada was restored to the French in 1632, at which time immediate preparations were made for a reëstablishment of the missions among the natives of that country. But there were many at this time who were unfriendly to the Society of Jesus and those who wore the badge of that Order, as a result of which a concerted effort was made to keep them from taking any part in the reconstruction of the missions and continuation of their former labors. Fortunately for the good of the Cause, this effort proved an abortive one, the Jesuits who had so sturdily and faithfully fought for the advancement of religion in the new country being placed in control of its spiritual direction. In the year following the intrepid de Brebeuf returned to the field of his former labors, and had but barely arrived when informed of the welcome news that the annual flotilla from the Huron country was at hand. Their business being completed at the settlement, arrangements were quickly made with those in command, for the transfer of Fathers de Brebeuf, Daniel and Davost to their country. But this undertaking had to be deferred until the following year, owing to the aggressive attitude of those of the Algonquins who made their home along the banks of the Ottawa river. Even then the journey was made with the greatest difficulty, the missionaries being divided and each subjected to vigorous labor and untold hardships. In fact, it was by almost a miracle that they accomplished the journey in safety. Father Daniel was especially unfortunate, being abandoned by his party while en route, although fortunate enough to finally reach his destination. De Brebeuf had also an almost similar experience, being abandoned at the place of his old residence, Toanché; but persevering, finally reached a new village by the name of Ihonatiria, where he was received with every expression of satisfaction. Some time later both of his companions arrived at the same place, Father Davost having almost succumbed to the terrible hardships and privations of the journey. Here, then, having somewhat recovered, they established their mission, a log structure being erected for their accommodation, part of which was used by them as a dwelling and part as a chapel.

In the meantime Father de Brebeuf devoted what spare moments were at his command to the instruction of his associates in the language of the people, being amply repaid for this added duty in the assistance rendered him in the instruction of the natives. Thus the work progressed, giving every indication of the most fruitful results, which, however, were materially deterred by the actions of the medicine men of the tribe, who became alarmed at the evident and increasing interest shown in the new religion by the Hurons and consequent depreciation of their own power, and did everything within the limits of their understanding to arouse the suspicions and ill-will of the people against the missionaries. Thus, Shea tells us, they openly accused the Fathers of causing a drought which threatened their crops, while the cross was ever alluded to by them as an instrument of witchcraft and menace to the well-being of the nation. Fortunately a majority of the Hurons had become so thoroughly imbued with the truthfulness and evident good intent on the part of the missionaries that they lent but a reluctant ear to the soothful and vicious insinuations of the sorcerers. Then, too, the missionary force was strengthened and reinvigorated by the arrival of Fathers le Mercier and Peter Pijart, while de Brebeuf with determined energy offered a vigorous and persistent opposition to the infamous insinuations of the enemy.

It was now that the missionaries, having more than ever established themselves in the favor of the Hurons and realizing the goodness and power of that Providence which had enabled them to do so, to show in some slight measure their appreciation of this beneficence, dedicated the mission to the Immaculate Conception. They also at the same time determined to remain at this particular point for another year, in order that the work so well begun and ably and satisfactorily carried to its present condition might be established firmly and beyond the peradventure of a doubt. As an additional and zealous enterprise, they also established a Huron school at Quebec, where some of the youth of the nation might be sent to be trained in the ways of religion and amenities of civilized life, such acquirements to be thereafter devoted for the benefit and uplifting of their people throughout the land. Here again they met with an unexpected obstacle in the affectionate opposition of the parents; for when in 1636 twelve boys had been secured for this purpose, but three of them remained firm in their determination, the rest yielding to the resistless importunities of their parents. With this small but highly appreciated contingent Fathers Daniel and Davost set forth for Quebec, on the way thither meeting with Fathers Garnier and Chatelain, who were new arrivals in the colony, and shortly afterwards they also met with Father Isaac Jogues, whose life as already told was consecrated to a blessed martyrdom.

(1) This statement pertains particularly to the Jesuits, to whom Kertk exhibited a most pronounced dislike, their lives, in fact, being in imminent danger. The Recollects, however, were more fortunate, obtaining to a certain extent his good will, and consequently some slight consideration.

Now new and unexpected troubles arose in the presence of a terrible disease, which swept with irresistible fatality throughout the land. Once again the missionaries gave evidence of their great devotion to the Sacred Cause, caring with ceaseless and watchful solicitude for the afflicted, and administering to the spiritual wants of those who had passed to a condition beyond all earthly hope. Still the spirit of revenge rankled deep in the hearts of those whose rights the innovations of religion had jeopardized, and as a result the medicine men seized this opportunity as a most propitious one in which to carry out their ill-will towards the missionary Fathers. Thus they loudly proclaimed, attributing the epidemic to the anger of the gods, and accusing the Fathers of being the direct cause of the disease. The experience was a frightful one, the people being wrought up to such a pitch of fear and fury that at times the lives of these devoted men were in the utmost jeopardy. Still they persevered in their charitable work, overcoming not a little of the opposition thus met with, and inducing quite a few, among them being some noted chiefs, to pledge themselves to renounce their superstitions and yield implicit faith and confidence to the Christian belief.

At length the epidemic subsided, and in fact had almost spent its force, when, unfortunately for the cause of religion and safety of its exponents, it again appeared with renewed fury in the following year. Once more the medicine men sought an opportunity to forever break down the barrier which had been raised so successfully against them. Vindictively they applied every art known to their nefarious practices, called upon the gods most dreaded for thunders of denouncement upon those who still adhered to the Christian faith, and presaged the most terrible results were the missionaries allowed to continue among them. Thus they aroused the people to a condition of mind boding but little good for the well-being of the missionaries or enduring value of the labors which they had so faithfully devoted to the interest of the Church. None appreciated this condition more than those who veritably carried their lives in their hands, fully impressed with the belief that at any moment they might be called upon to yield them up as a sacrifice to the superstitious fears and passions of the people. "We are," said de Brebeuf in a letter to his Superior at Quebec, written at this time, "probably on the point of shedding our blood in the service of our blessed Master, Jesus Christ. His goodness apparently vouchsafes to accept this sacrifice in expiation of my great and countless sins, and to crown the past services and the great and burning desires of all our Fathers here."

Fortunately better feelings prevailed, the lives of these good men being spared at least for a while to carry on with indomitable perseverance the work which had been allotted to their care. At each of the two missions now established among the Hurons, one being at Ossossané and the other at Ihonatiria, there were four missionaries, an addition to the force already known being made in the persons of Jerome Lalement, Simon le Moyne and Francis du Perron. Besides these there were two others, whose services were devoted to visiting outlying towns. Of the general condition of affairs prevailing at this time, Shea says: "Garnier and Jogues, moreover, wintered among the Petuns, to begin amid every opposition a new mission among that tribe. Many converts now declared themselves, but a greater number were found in the Wenro, a tribe which sought refuge in the Huron territory from Iroquois cruelty. The labors of the missionaries soon created, too, the mission of St. Michel at the town of Scanonaenrat, while Taenhatentaron became the mission station of St. Ignatius. At the fixed missions all was now regularly conducted, and day by day instruction for young and old went on, while on Sunday a missionary in the Indian style traversed the streets to call all to prayer. The chapels were crowded and the Faith seemed about to take root in the land. Amid this smiling prospect a new storm arose which wellnigh crushed the mission. A squaw demanded that the missionaries should offer a blanket before a woman holding an infant in her arms who had appeared to her in a dream. The dream is a great deity of the Indians; it cannot be disobeyed; yet here the missionaries could not obey. Their lives were in danger, but they persisted, although the idea of the woman doubtless arose from some picture of the Virgin Mother, and might, perhaps, have been turned to advantage by less scrupulous men. But they resolved to grant nothing to the idolatry of dreams, and at last triumphed. These troubles gave them influence, and at this time (the spring of 1639) they had nearly fifty who had made their first communion, and the mission was founded never to perish."

A few months later a fresh installment of missionaries came to the Huron country, among them being Chaumonot and Poncet, the former outliving all his contemporaries, while the latter is referred to as a "martyr of mortification who after long sufferings and toils in Canada died in Martinique."

But there were other and severer trials in store for the missionaries, before which it would seem the most determined spirit might well be expected to falter and succumb. The returning flotilla (it had been to Quebec on the annual trading expedition) came to these waiting and expectant people at last, bringing with it, not only the proceeds of a year's successful hunt, but also, alas! the germs of another frightful disease. Now it was the small-pox, whose deadly ravages brought desolation and despair to almost every Indian home. Again the war against religion was renewed with the utmost determination, those infuriated demons of disaster and emissaries of idolatrous display, the medicine men, tuning the minds of this woe-racked and seemingly God-forgotten people to a pitch of frenzy and desire for blood which human sacrifice alone could satisfy. Still, here in the midst of this moral eruption, with the voice of hatred ringing in their ears, the glare of intolerable dislike meeting their gaze on every hand, these intrepid missionary Fathers calmly and undemonstratively performed the duties of their holy office; ministering to those sick in body and in mind; nursing with assiduous devotion the convalescent back to life and health; guiding the faltering spirit in its passage to eternity, and yielding to the dead those last and solemn rites to which alone true believers in Mother Church are entitled.

Of the actual condition of the Huron mission at this time, the historian Shea tells us that it was like the present Catholic missions in the United States—a few Catholics mingling in among those who opposed them, often with greatest virulence and hatred. (The towns called by the missionaries St. Gabriel, St. Louis and St. Ignatius were not Catholic towns or missionary settlements any more than New York, Boston or Philadelphia are now.) No town of neophytes gathered by the Jesuits existed, as is commonly supposed; nor was a single mission village ever formed in Huronia. The frequent persecutions now, however, induced the Superior to alter the plan of action which they had thus far pursued. It was resolved to build a residence in some convenient spot, apart from all the villages, but easily reached from all. This would be the general resort of the missionaries when the village was almost deserted by the absence of war, hunting and fishing parties, or when popular fury made it prudent to retire for a time.

For this purpose a site was located on the River Wye, the spot selected being at a point between two small lakes, where subsequently was erected the mission house of St. Mary's. It was to this place of refuge that the missionaries of the Immaculate Conception were wont to retire, as well as those from the mission of St. Joseph's at Tenanstayae, who followed them there in the spring of 1640. From this point of vantage the missionaries opened out new fields of labor, Fathers Daniel and le Moyne establishing the mission of St. John among the Ahrenda tribe, while the unresponsive Tionnontates were again visited by Fathers Garnier and Jogues. In the summer of 1640 this resort was strengthened by the advent of Fathers Charles Raymbaut and Claude Pijart. It was just then, too, that Jerome Lalemant succeeded de Brebeuf as Superior, the former making all haste in company with Father Chaumonot to the Neutral nation, where they purposed reviving the mission established by Father Dallion some years before. Thus, towards the latter part of the year, we find Jogues and Chatelain established at St. Mary's, from which they also visited five other towns contiguous to that point.

Lalemant and le Mercier devoted their energies to the mission of the Conception, while St. Joseph's and St. John's fell to the lot of the energetic Daniel and courageous le Moyne. In addition to these, Fathers Garnier and Pijart returned to the country of the Tionnontates, from which the latter had been unceremoniously expelled during the preceding year. The duties of these missionaries were performed under a condition of almost insurmountable difficulties, for besides suffering the many inconveniences so distasteful to those who have been brought up amidst civilized and refined surroundings, they were also subjected to the most terrible tests to both mental and physical endurance. In spite of this, they continued in the work, which gradually, though slowly, showed some appreciable improvement. It was now, too, that the Algonquin mission gave signs of betterment, and in fact so enthusiastic did Fathers Jogues and Raymbaut become over the success of their efforts, that they crossed Lake Huron, preaching the gospel to a large gathering of Chippewas at the rapids of St. Mary's[1] (Sault Ste. Marie).

It was soon after this that Father Jogues was captured by a band of Mohawks while on his way to Quebec for supplies. The journey, in fact, was a disastrous one, the sufferings of all connected with that undertaking being of the severest character, while many met with death on the way. It was but a little while after, too, that Father Raymbaut succumbed to the vicissitudes and hardships of the life he had undertaken. A bloody and never-ending conflict was also being carried on among the tribes, which added to the difficulties experienced by the missionaries; but in spite of this they continued to maintain their positions among these people, laboring conscientiously and vigorously at the different mission stations to which they had been appointed. Furthermore, they accentuated their zeal by erecting two additional churches. Then in 1645, for a brief period, peace spread her broad pinions over the land of the Hurons, causing renewed hope to spring up in the hearts of these patient and long-suffering men. But this comforting condition was but of short duration, war being renewed by the Mohawks, who celebrated the occurrence by the massacre of Father Jogues. This terrible loss was soon after followed by the loss of Father Daniel, who fell a victim to the insensate hatred of the common foe. The onslaught of the Iroquois was, in fact, irrepressible, the Hurons finally yielding before their continued advances, until at last, unable longer to devise or maintain a suitable defense, the remnant of this once proud nation became an insignificant and skulking rabble—homeless, wandering and despised.

Daniel died amidst a scene of carnage the like of which had never before been known. The news of this disaster was quickly heralded throughout the land, and soon the Hurons, in the extremity of their terror, fled in every direction, their apparent purpose being to place the longest distance possible between them and their blood-thirsty oppressors. It was at this juncture, when the spirit of redemption came upon them, that the cloud of ignorance and superstition became uplifted, and they began to appreciate the wonderful benefits of Christian faith and resignation. Said Father Bressani of this period: "The faith had now made the conquest of almost the whole country; it was everywhere publicly professed; and not merely the common people, but even the chiefs were alike its children and its protectors. The superstitious rites that at first were more frequent than the day, began to lose credit to such a degree that a heathen at Ossossane, man of rank though he was, could find none to perform them in his illness. The persecutions raised against us had now ceased; the curses heaped on the faith were changed into blessings. We might say that they were now ripe for heaven; that naught was wanting but the reaping-hook of death to lay the harvest up in the safe garner-house of paradise. This was our sole consolation amidst the desolation of the country.

"Misfortunes and affliction had begun with the faith; they grew with its growth, and when religion seemed at last the peaceful mistress of the land, 'the waters of tribulation entered in' so furiously that the stricken Church may well exclaim 'A tempest has overwhelmed me!' "

But the sacrifice of blood to be offered up in behalf of these people by their zealous pastors and preceptors had not yet been fulfilled. In the spring of 1649 a large force of the Iroquois fell upon the town of St. Ignatius and razed it to the ground. Among those taken prisoners on this occasion were the devoted Fathers de Brebeuf and Lalemant. In ignominy and agony, for they had already been most brutally treated, the missionaries, together with a few of the Hurons who had survived the slaughter and been spared for a more dreadful fate, were driven away to the country of the Iroquois. Upon entering the Iroquois town they were exposed to fresh indignities and ill-treatment, until their sufferings became almost unbearable. Of this incident, Shea speaks in the following language:

"A scaffold had been raised, according to custom, of poles lashed together and covered with bark; here they were exposed. De Brebeuf, seeing Christian captives near him, excited their courage by reminding them of the glory of Heaven now opening before them. There were among the Iroquois some Hurons now naturalized and old enemies of the missionaries. At these words of de Brebeuf they began the torture; each was soon bound to a stake; the hands of de Brebeuf were cut off, while Lalemant's flesh quivered with the awls and pointed irons thrust into every part of his body. This did not suffice; a fire kindled near soon reddened their hatchets; these they forced under the arm-pits and between the thighs of the sufferers while to de Brebeuf they gave a collar of these burning weapons; and there the missionaries stood, with those glowing irons seething their very vitals. Amid the din arose the voice of the old Huron missionary, consoling his converts, denouncing God's judgments on the unbeliever till his executioners crushed his mouth with a stone, cut off his nose and lips and thrust a brand into his mouth, so that his throat and tongue, burnt and swollen, refused their office.

"They had left Lalemant, and now stopped to devise some new plan of torture. Enemies of the faith, they had seen de Brebeuf in the very breach baptizing his neophytes. Often, too, in their villages had the apostate Hurons seen him pour the vivifying waters on the head of the dying. An infernal thought seized them. They resolved to baptize him. While the rest danced like fiends around him, slicing off his flesh to devour before his eyes, or cauterizing the wounds with stones or hatchets, these placed a cauldron on the fire. 'Echon,' cried the mockers, for such was his Huron name, 'Echon, thou hast told us that the more we suffer here, the greater will be our crown in heaven'; when the water was heated they tore off his scalp and thrice in derision of baptism poured the water over his head amid loud shouts of the unbelievers. The eye of the martyr was now dim, and the torturers, unable from first to last to ring from his lips one sigh of pain, were eager to close the scene. Hacking off his feet, they clove open his chest, took out his noble heart and devoured it."

Of the previous life of this great and good man, we gather from different sources the information that he was born at Bayeux, Normandy, on March 25, 1593, his family being of direct descent from the noble and ancient house of Arundel. He entered the Society of Jesus at Rouen on October 5, 1617, and was ordained to the priesthood five years later. He came to Canada on June 19, 1625, and was employed continuously among the Hurons from 1626, till 1629; from 1634, till 1641, and from 1641, till the time of his death, which occurred on March 16, 1649. His remains were buried at the cemetery of St. Mary's, but his head was taken to Quebec inclosed in a silver bust sent from France by his family.

Of the death of Lalemant we learn from the same authority that, having disposed of his Superior, they wrapped him in some pieces of bark, which they then set on fire. So acute became his sufferings in this additional torture, that he could not resist the pain, therefore raised his hands on high and invoked the aid of Heaven. Gratified by this expression of pain, his tormentors resolved to prolong his agony, adding what devilish ingenuity could conceive to his already terrible sufferings. Finally the end drew near, and when he had arrived at that condition in which he was no longer susceptible to what they said or did, they tomahawked him.

Gabriel Lalemant, a nephew of Charles and Jerome Lalemant, both distinguished missionaries, was born October 31, 1610, at Paris. When twenty years of age he entered the Society of Jesus, and after serving several years as a teacher in his native country removed to Canada and entered upon the life of a missionary. He arrived in Quebec September 20, 1646, but served on the Huron mission only from August 6, 1648, till the time of his death, which occurred March 17th of the following year.

These quickly succeeding events and the destruction or abandonment of fifteen towns threw the entire nation into a state of super-excitement bordering upon collapse. Some made overtures to the Iroquois, who readily accepted them as members of that family, while others fled to the countries of the Tionnontates, Attiwandaronk, Eries, and Conestogues, among whom they sought refuge, or pressed on still farther, locating among the islands or along the shores of Lake Huron. Still, however, the missionaries remained firm, following the fugitives to their new locations, and doing everything in their power to subdue the excitement and prevailing disorder.

At the other missions at this time the work was progressing as favorably as could be expected. Father Garnier labored on with varying success among the Tionnontates, receiving occasional assistance from other missionaries who happened to be traveling in that direction. That it was a dangerous locality he was fully aware, but absolutely ignoring that fact, refused even for a time to withdraw to a position of greater safety. As a result of this temerity he forfeited his life, being slain by a party of Iroquois while engaged in the performance of his duty in caring for the bodily and spiritual wants of those who had already fallen before their onslaught.

Charles Garnier was a native of Paris, having been born in that city in the year 1605, and was of an eminent and pious family. He entered the Society of Jesus September 5, 1624, and was sent by the Order to Canada in 1636, and remained at the Huron missions from September 11 of that year until the time of his death, December 7, 1649. It was but a short time subsequent to the consummation of this deed of blood that Father Chabanel also yielded up his life to the Cause, while others yet were compelled to suffer in a like manner.

Since the first visit then of Father le Caron in 1615, a period now of nearly thirty-five years, twenty-nine missionaries had suffered the penalty of their convictions in the peninsula of Lake Huron. Seven of these had met with cruel and tragic deaths, and eleven still remained. Thus their occupation, for the time at least, being gone, they wandered to different parts of the universe; Bressani went to Italy, Grelon to China, while le Mercier and Poncet visited among the people of the West Indies.

Of the Hurons who went to Quebec we have already spoken at some length, and as a consequence it would be unnecessary as well as irrelevant to refer to them again at this time. We, however, have every reason to believe that under the pious and judicious guidance of their pastors, Fathers Garreau and Chaumonot, they lived an unquestionably Christian life which reflected much credit on them as well as upon those who had devoted so many years to their instruction. It was the latter who composed a grammar of the language "long regarded," says Shea, "as a masterpiece by the missionaries of Canada. This," he continues, "was constantly placed in the hands of those who were publishing for the missions and formed the base of nearly all the grammars of Indian tongues compiled by the French missionaries. After remaining long in manuscript, copied from hand to hand, this admirable work was published by the Literary and Historical Society of Quebec in 1835."

It will also be remembered that Father Chaumonot founded the mission of Notre Dame de Foi, distant a few miles from Quebec; later, owing to the limited grounds in connection with it, he removed this mission to another site, where he erected the church and chapel modeled after the holy house of Lorette, by which name the mission was also always known. Shea tells us that when Charlevoix visited it in 1721 the mission was directed by Father Peter Daniel Richer, a man of eminent virtue. The mission had for some time during Chaumonot's later years and after his death been somewhat neglected, but its fervor was restored and Richer had only to maintain matters as they were. The earnestness of the Hurons was such as to call forth the highest eulogiums of the traveler who dwells on their patriarchal faith, their uprightness, their docility of heart, their innocence and sincere piety. Their fervor abated none of their valor; their chiefs figured in every war, and the defeat of Braddock was mainly due to the courage and skill of Anastasius, the chieftain of Lorette.

In speaking of the still later movements of these people we quote the same authority, who, after having briefly mentioned their removal to still another site designated Jeune Loretto, says: "When the Hurons left St. Joseph's Isle with the missionaries, several bands of the nation were still in various parts; one of these made a stand on Great Manitouline for a time, and under the gallant Stephen Annaotaha defeated the Iroquois, but finally removed to Quebec. Some, however, still clung to the West, and ere long a Huron colony existed on the Island of Michillimackinac, an island famous in the traditions of Western mythology. Bleak and exposed as was this little isle, it was safe, abounded in excellent places for fishing, was convenient to fertile lands and good hunting ground, and enabled them to carry on a lucrative trade.

"Attacked even here, they removed for a time to the Noquet Islands, then entered Green Bay, reaching the banks of the Mississippi by the Wisconsin, and commenced a friendly intercourse with the Illinois; but having incurred the anger of the Sioux, they retraced their steps to the Noquet Islands. This band numbered about five hundred, and were nearly all Christians. Deprived of pastors and instruction, surrounded by infidels, driven about by every wind of adversity, their faith was growing dim and the vices and superstitions of paganism were again reviving among them. Yet, when the veteran Father Menard, for nine years a missionary in the Huron country, reached the shores of Lake Superior in 1660 to plant the Cross among the Ottawas, the long-forsaken Hurons on Noquet Island or on the shore at the mouth of the Menominee River sent to implore him to visit them, as the pagans would all embrace Christianity. Despairing of doing any good among the Ottawas, Father Menard left Chequamegon in June, 1661, to traverse the forest. On his way want of food broke up the party; his Indians left him with a faithful Frenchman named Guerin; but soon after at a portage the aged Father lost his way or was taken by a roving band of Sioux.

"Shortly after this the Hurons removed to Chequamegon, and were there when Father Allouez began his mission at that place in 1665. Thus the poor wanderers were, of course, the first objects of his care, for he was not ignorant of their language. He endeavored to recall them; some listened to his words. One woman, whom Father Garnier had been about to baptize when death cut short his career, was now prepared for baptism by Allouez, and expired soon after receiving the Sacrament. The instructions of Garnier had sunk deep into their hearts, but long want of pastors had allowed vice and superstition to grow up. The effort of Allouez to root out these vices and superstitions failed. The Hurons proved so ungrateful to his toils that in 1669 they were deprived of the consolation they had once solicited. Allouez was summoned to other fields, and his successor, Father James Marquette, was then almost ignorant of the Huron tongue and unable to give them instruction. This produced an impression on them, and a change was soon visible; but new troubles arose. In their folly the Hurons and Ottawas had provoked the Dakotas to war, and both were compelled to fly before these formidable enemies; the Ottawas first launched their canoes on the lake and steered to Manitouline, leaving Father Marquette with the Hurons. That remnant of a mighty nation resolved also to commit themselves to the waves and seek a new home. With their faithful missionary they embarked in their frail canoes, and once more turned towards their ancient home. Fain would they have revisited the scenes of Huron power and the fur-lined graves of their ancestors. Fain, too, would the missionary have gone to spend his surviving years on the ground hallowed by the blood of Daniel de Brebeuf, Lalemant, Garnier and Chabanel. But the power of the Iroquois was still too great to justify the step, and the fugitives, remembering the rich fisheries of Mackinaw, resolved to return to that pebbly strand. A fort was raised and the northern shore inclosed their chapel and cabins. Separated now from other tribes, they listened to their devoted missionary and profited by his instruction; even when he was temporarily absent they were always regular in their attendance at chapel to chant their prayers. Some pagans in the band solicited baptism; dreams and superstitions were rejected, and there was every prospect of seeing this little remnant as fervent as their brethren at Lorette." It was here that Marquette left them to pursue his further investigations of the country, leaving them in charge of Fathers Nouvel and Pierson.

Following this immediate period, there were a series of general wars in which the Hurons took active part as allies of the French. Finally peace was restored and in or about the year 1702, at the time when Detroit was founded, the Hurons, leaving their home at Michillimackinac, settled near to that place. Here they remained under the direction of different missionaries for a number of years, although when Charlevoix visited the place in 1721 it was vacant. Some years later this mission was renewed, it being definitely known that a resident pastor was located among these people in 1728. Ten years later their spiritual wants were administered to by Father de la Richardie, who thirteen years after removed with a number of them to Sandusky, where, under the name of Wyandots, they took an active part in the affairs of the West.

During subsequent troubles the missionaries maintained the mission of the Assumption near Detroit, Father J. B. Salleneuve remaining there until 1760, and Father Peter Potier, the last Jesuit missionary of the Western Hurons, until the time of his death in 1781. From that time forth the Indians depended solely upon Fathers Hubert and Glapion, who were established at the French posts, and although often tempted by the encroachment of Protestantism, remained firm in the Catholic faith.

Mission of the Iroquois.

AT THE very earliest of their acquaintance with them, the French had recognized the Hurons and Iroquois by the name of Hiroquais, owing, undoubtedly, to the fact that in origin, manners and language there was much similarity between them. But a distinction was soon made, the latter acquiring the name by which they are now best known, while that of Iroquois was made to apply only to those belonging to the confederacy known as the Five Nations. The bitter feeling evidenced throughout the earlier years of the new settlement by these people for the French undoubtedly found its cause in the belligerent attitude assumed towards them by Champlain, who from the first showed a marked preference for, and leaning towards their hereditary foes. This state of absolute defiance, backed as it was by the prowess of a powerful confederacy, bid fair to crush out and overwhelm the original intent of the missionary Fathers—the spiritual enlightenment and upbuilding of the aborigines of North America. But fortunately for these misguided people, as well as for posterity itself, in spite of their most strenuous efforts to the contrary, the gospel triumphed, and while its victorious course was thickly strewn with evidences of danger, privation and unutterable devotion, and even martyrdom, most cruel and undeserved, these willing sacrifices were made in order that the Scriptures might be fulfilled and the Gospel of Jesus Christ in verity carried to the uttermost parts of the earth.

One of the first to suffer in this cause was Father William Poulain, a Recollect, who was captured by the Iroquois in 1621. Here—it was at the rapids of St. Louis that they kept him—he consoled himself for the excrutiating tortures and maltreatment to which he was subjected by urging others among the captive band, and even the Iroquois themselves, to the attainment of that knowledge and understanding which pertains to a better and purer life. At a somewhat later date an attempt was also made on the part of the Jesuits to establish a mission among the Iroquois. This, however, had to be abandoned for the time being, and, in fact, for a number of years following no further effort was made in that direction. Subsequent to the year 1640 the aggressive attitude of the Iroquois towards the French settlers became very pronounced, thus still further affecting the interests of these intrepid men, who, having foregone all of those pleasures and amenities attached to more civilized surroundings, had voluntarily surrendered themselves to this task of evangelization. Nor was this all; for the keenness with which the Iroquois followed on the trail of each succeeding victory made it impossible for the settlers to venture without the confines of their fortifications, and hence a state of privation supervened which became absolutely insupportable and appalling. In 1642, then, urged by the sufferings and want of those surrounding them, the devoted Jogues and Raymbaut, who had but recently planted the Cross in Michigan, set out for Quebec in quest of assistance. They reached the point of destination in safety, and having satisfactorily arranged for the necessary provisions and other details, started on their return to the country of the Hurons. Of their experience on that journey we have already exploited to a considerable extent, telling of the surprise and capture of Jogues and his immediate assistants, and the death of a number of the Indian guides and protectors who had accompanied them. The adoption of Couture, the murder of René Goupil, and the subsequent murder of Father Jogues, tells the entire story of this episode in missionary labors at that time.

Descriptions of such horrors have been only too frequently repeated in the years which followed. During the month of April, 1644, Father Francis Joseph Bressani accompanied a Huron flotilla on its way westward with provisions for the suffering missionaries and people in that section. The entire journey was one of danger, the way being lined with war parties of the Iroquois who were alert and on the watch for others of limited strength or those too negligent to show sufficient regard for their own safety. To one of these predatory bands the Reverend Father and his party fell easy victims, a majority of the Indians being killed and devoured, while the missionary, with a few others, was taken up the Sorrel River through Lake Champlain and across an almost impassable country to the land of the Mohawks. Of that journey Shea tells us: "When he reached a fishing village on the Upper Hudson his tortures began. He, too, ran the gauntlet; in that fearful race he was crushed beneath their blows; his hand was slit open beneath the fingers, and then, reaching the scaffold, he was handed over to be caressed, that is, tortured in every way. Pricked, burnt, mangled, he was soon one living wound. Several fingers were cut off, his hands and feet burnt and hacked twenty-six times. Condemned to death by unanimous cries, he was conducted to the first town on the Mohawk. Here his left hand was slit open, the gauntlet run again; his hands and feet were torn and mangled; himself hung up by the feet in chains; and to crown all, when tied down almost naked to the ground, they laid food on his body and set their hungry dogs upon it till he was all torn by their teeth. Unable to use his hands, he almost perished of hunger, for few would give him a morsel. He literally walked in living death." Strange as it may seem, however, after enduring all of this horrible torture, he survived, was rescued and finally returned to Europe. Soon after the escape of Father Bressani peace was concluded between the Mohawks and French, the same being ratified in July, 1649, when the chieftain Kiotsaeton came down to Three Rivers as emissary for his people. The peace, unfortunately, was not of an enduring nature, as shown in the ultimate fate of Father Jogues, who soon after returning to the colony met his death at the hand of a Mohawk brave. Once more the country was thrown into a state of endless turmoil, being devastated by the Mohawk and other kindred tribes. The Huron country already presented a desolate and forsaken appearance; that of the Tionnontates was fully as bad, while other smaller tribes were entirely annihilated or absorbed by the encroaching foe. "Upper Canada, too," says Shea, "was a desert, and along the Ottawa and St. Lawrence the dwindled fearful bands of Algonquins showed their losses in the struggle. The French had not been spared; their missionaries had fallen with their tawny converts, and in 1653 reverse after reverse dimmed the glory of France and heightened the boldness of the all-conquering Iroquois. Quebec was beleaguered; men durst not go forth to reap the yellow harvest, and want began to stare all in the face. A poor widow mourned over the prospect. Touched by her desolate situation, Father Joseph Anthony Poncet, with a few whom his devotedness drew around him, went forth to gather in her harvest." The ambushed Iroquois fell upon them, and he and one of his companions were taken prisoners and borne off to the Mohawk country. Father Poncet was also subjected to horrible tortures, but when the Mohawk nation again appealed for peace he was restored to his own. At about this time Father Simon le Moyne, who had long been identified with the Huron missions, was sent among the Onondagas, who had already made definite arrangements for peace with the French. It was also understood that this Father, who since the death of Jogues had assumed the name of Ondessonk, formerly borne by him, should subsequently visit for a while among the Mohawk towns. In the early part of July, 1653, Father le Moyne started on a journey to Quebec, and "toiling beyond Montreal, first passed through the Rapid River to the lake beyond, opening like a sea across the Thousand Isles." At last he reached the mouth of the Oswego, where a fishing village was located, and here he started his first mission. Le Moyne was an adopted Indian, and upon entering the town of Onondaga was received with great pomp and ceremony. Having transacted his business as emissary of the French Governor and delivered many valuable presents from that dignitary to the chiefs and sachems of the tribe, he proceeded to labor at once as spiritual director of the people, and to instruct and advise them as their priest. One incident in connection with these labors is given by Shea, as follows: "Among others, he baptized on the eve of his departure a chief, setting out against the Eries. In vain the prudent missionary sought to defer his baptism to his next visit. 'Ah! brother,' exclaimed the chief, 'if I have the faith, can I not be a Christian to-day? Art thou master of death, to prevent its striking me without thy order? Will the shafts of the foe be blunted for me? Must I at every step in battle dread hell rather than death? Unless thou baptize me, I shall be without courage and I shall not dare to meet the blows. Baptize me, for I will obey thee, and give thee my word to live and die a Christian.' Such an entreaty le Moyne could not resist, and finding the chieftain already possessed of the truths necessary for salvation, he instructed him more fully and baptized him by the name of John Baptist."

Once again Father le Moyne returned to Quebec, which settlement he reached on September 11th. His safe return and the report he made of the condition of the tribes caused many to anxiously await the setting out of the next expedition for the Onondaga country. They had become, in fact, firmly impressed with the belief that peace was now permanent, and this belief was strengthened and emphasized by the arrival soon after of John Baptist, who, having passed through numerous dangers without injury, had come to request the French to establish a colony among his people, offering in return a beautiful site in their canton in Onondaga to the Jesuits, whom they promised to conduct to their destination in comfort and security. This expedition started out from Quebec on September 19th under most favorable auspices, the missionaries beginning to labor among the members of the company before they had traveled but a short distance. Ten days later they landed at the mouth of the Othatangué (Oswego), where Father Chaumonot (he and Father Claude Dablon had been appointed by their Superior for this service) was received with great delight. After a brief respite they again resumed their journey to Onondaga, where they also met with a most enthusiastic reception. The sending of Chaumonot on this mission was particularly fortunate, as he was an adept in the Huron language, and could answer all of their speeches with ease and elegance. After numerous other ceremonies, which occupied considerable time, the missionaries were on November 11th conducted to the site selected for the mission-house. It was a beautiful spot, highly artistic, and in every way fitted for the purpose to which it had been devoted. Now followed an endless number of ceremonies and receptions, delegations coming from all parts of the nation to call upon the missionaries. One important council held by the Indians at this time established Christianity at Onondaga, the capital of the nation, so that for all time subsequently the missionaries could freely and uninterruptedly preach the Gospel by the great council-fire of the allied nations. November 18th of the same year was made memorable by the dedication of the first Catholic chapel in the present city of New York, by Fathers Chaumonot and Dablon. Of this structure the latter is quoted as saying: "For marble and precious stones we had but bark; but the path to Heaven is as open through a roof of bark as through fretted ceilings of silver and gold." Thus the work progressed bravely, the only danger to which the missionaries were exposed being on the occasion of the Honnonouaroria, a festival which took place regularly on each succeeding March. On the occasion of this festival the Indians, in obedience to their dreams, committed many extravagances. In the early part of the year following, Father Dablon returned to Quebec, having been sent there on matters of great importance to the well-being and safety of the mission.

While Fathers Chaumonot and Dablon were conducting their successful mission among the Onondagas, the Jesuits were endeavoring to carry out their original contract with the Mohawks. To this end Father le Moyne was sent among them, leaving Montreal for that purpose on August 16, 1655. On this occasion he was accompanied by two Frenchmen and twelve Mohawks, who after a month's uneventful journeying reached the first village of the nation in safety. During this visit he did not establish any permanent mission, but after laboring among the captive Hurons and visiting for a brief period Fort Orange and New Amsterdam, he returned to the Mohawk country, and thence shortly to Montreal, which settlement he reached in safety, although not without having passed through great danger.

In spite of the evident and carefully designed treachery on the part of the Iroquois, the condition of the French colony was such as to make it imperative for the well-being and safety of the people that everything within human power be done to appease the rancor of that nation, and to maintain a seemingly reliable, if spurious, understanding with them. It had been promised that a mission would be settled and a French colony planted among the Onondagas, and this now was made the subject of arbitrary discussion and a pretext for sufficient misunderstanding to create, if not carefully avoided, a disastrous irruption. In this predicament the missionaries, ever zealous in the cause which they had undertaken, fearless of danger and fervent even to the sacrifice of their own lives, came boldly to the rescue and asserted their unqualified willingness to undertake the venture which at that time was recognized as of a most dangerous character. Without farther or unnecessary delay, therefore, arrangements were perfected for the proper equipment of an expedition, of which Fathers Francis le Mercier, René Menard, Claude Dablon and James Fremin were the leading spirits, and Captain Depuys the Commandant.

A somewhat satisfactory footing established at Onondaga, the missionaries completed the necessary arrangements to distribute themselves among the towns and villages of the nations, as a result of which Fathers Chaumonot and Menard set out for the country of the Cayugas and Senecas, in August, 1656. Father Menard remained with the former. "Here," says Shea, "Menard, who was selected by the chief, erected a chapel, but was coldly received by the tribe and so little regarded that he never appeared without being attacked by the children.

To the day of his death, many years after, amidst the forests of Upper Michigan, he bore the scars with which these tormentors covered his face. Yet the simple guilelessness of Father René soon won their hearts; and when once he had converted a chief, his chapel was filled with admiring and listening crowds. On its wall of mats beside the altar hung pictures of our Lord and His Blessed Mother, and to explain these the missionary told the history of the Redemption Now, too, the children changed and became his helpers in the mission, leading him to the cabins of the sick and giving him the names of all, which some studiously concealed." In the meantime the good missionary had applied himself assiduously to acquiring the Cayuga dialect, which he accomplished to an eminent degree of satisfaction with the assistance of an excellent family in whose home he was frequently a guest. Father Chaumonot also had an edifying experience among the Senecas. Here his principal field of action was the town or village of Gandagare, where his eloquence and kindly nature acquired for him unusual consideration. He also found a responsive and interesting subject for his care and solicitude in another village, whose population was largely composed of survivors of the old missions of St. Michael's and St. John's, in Huronia. Subsequently, he returned to Onondaga, from which place, with Father Menard, he almost immediately set forth on a visit to Oneida, the express purpose and intent of this journey being the negotiation of a more friendly understanding with the people of that tribe. After a brief stay, they returned to St. Mary's, at Onondaga, which thus became head and center of the entire Iroquois mission. For some time following, the work progressed with eminent satisfaction; so much so, indeed, that the Jesuit Superior at Quebec deemed it advisable to strengthen the working forces of the mission by adding to its personnel. So Father Paul Rageneau and Joseph Imbert Duperon, a lay brother, and a number of colonists, were sent to swell the forces of the little settlement. This detachment encountered some unexpected dangers on the way, owing to the treachery of their Onondaga escort. First, they were deserted, being compelled to follow the flotilla in an old, leaky and almost unserviceable canoe. Then the Hurons of the party were massacred to a man, while the missionaries found themselves in the utmost danger. They were, in fact, condemned to death, and would undoubtedly have fallen victims to the ungovernable rage of their escorts had it not been deemed by the chiefs or leaders of the party a better as well as safer policy to wait. They at length reached St. Mary's in safety, as soon as possible sending word from that place of their condition and danger to Quebec.

With the murder of Father Garreau in the year preceding, the daring and almost sacrificial effort of le Moyne to maintain a spiritual ascendency among the tribes, and the general precarious condition of the missionaries, ends the history of the mission at Onondaga for the year 1657, while the aggressive attitude assumed by the Mohawks was anything but encouraging, boding but little for the good of the cause or the reliability of that mission. Soon matters became desperate, it being evident that the safety of the missionaries hung on the slenderest thread. The only avenue left to them, in fact, seemed to be in making their escape, and that all believed well-nigh impossible. They remained hopeful, however, in secrecy preparing, through the dreary days of winter, for the opportunity which they hoped and prayed would come with the spring. Of the scheme involved, and its ultimate success, the historian Shea gives the following account: "Silently and rapidly in the residence of St. Mary's skillful hands were constructing two swift, light boats, each large enough to carry fourteen or fifteen individuals, and the weight of one thousand pounds. They also concealed in the house their canoes, four of Algonquin, five of Iroquois make. The great difficulty now remained; this was to embark unseen, for the slightest suspicion of their intent would draw the whole force of the canton upon them. At last a favorable moment arrived. A young Frenchman was adopted into the tribe; and in accordance with their customs, he gave a banquet. Availing himself of one of their usages, he proclaimed it to be one where everything must be eaten and nothing left, immense as might be the mass of eatables placed before the guests; to this feast every neighbor was invited; the plenteous board groaned beneath the weight of viands; and as none could refuse his portion, the overloaded guests, excited by the dances and games which the French kept up in quick succession, or lulled by the music, were insensible to all but the festivities before them. Amid the uproar and noise the boats were silently borne to the water's edge, and as silently loaded. Gradually, as night closed in, the weary guests began to drop away, the music and dance being still kept up by the French. When these ceased, all the Onondagas departed and were soon after buried in sleep. Silence reigned around.

"The whole French colony hurried to their flotilla and pushed off about midnight on the 20th of March, 1658. The water of the lake froze around them as they advanced, and fear almost froze their blood, yet on they went all night long and all the next day; hand succeeded hand at the oar and the paddle, till on the second evening, without having met a single living soul, they saw Ontario spread its sea-like expanse before them. Their greatest danger was now past, and the distance between them and their treacherous hosts gave them time to breathe.

"When the Onondagas had slept off their revel, they strolled from their huts, and as they rambled towards St. Mary's of Ganentaa were surprised at the silence that reigned around it. Supposing the inmates at prayer or in council, they awaited the result calmly, for an Indian never betrays curiosity. Of their presence there they had no doubt. The cocks were crowing, the dog answered the knock at the door. Yet, as the afternoon waned, their patience was exhausted, and scaling the side of the house, they entered. No sound echoed through the building but that of their own cautious steps; in fright and trouble they stole through and opened the main door. The sagest chiefs enter: from garret to cellar, every spot is examined; not a Frenchman can be found. Fear and terror seize them; gazing at each other in silence, they fled from the house. No trace betrayed the flight of the French. 'They have become invisible,' cried the Onondagas, 'and flown or walked upon the waters, for canoes they had not.'

"They, meanwhile, amid a thousand dangers in an unknown route, through lake and river, and rapid, and fall, reached Montreal, after seeing one of their canoes and three of their party engulfed in the St. Lawrence. In the colony they were received as men from beyond the grave.

"Thus ended, after a brief existence, the mission of St. Mary's of Ganentaa in the Onondaga country, with its dependent missions, among the Oneidas, Cayugas and Senecas. It had been founded and conducted with great toil and at great expense; it was now crushed, but its effect was not lost; many had been brought to the Faith and more convinced of the truth and beauty of Christianity who for motives of policy still held back.

"Among the Mohawks le Moyne was in no less danger than his brethren had been at Onondaga. On the 25th of March he wrote from the Dutch Settlement a letter which was supposed to give the last tidings of his labors; but soon after the Sachems, remembering their promise, appointed envoys to convey him to Montreal, and an embassy headed by the wily Atogwaekwan brought him safely to his countrymen in the latter part of May, 1658. Not a missionary now remained in the territory of the Iroquois, and the war which immediately broke out precluded for a time any hope of return."

And what of those to whose indefatigable zeal and patient, uncomplaining natures was due the honor of this well-meant, though futile attempt to instill the spirit of Christianity into the Iroquois? Naturally, we assume, they would be so disheartened, so wrought-up with fear for this treacherous people, that they would gladly yield to the inevitable and no longer tempt Providence in their endeavor to accomplish such a thankless and impossible task. Not at all. On the contrary, they seemed but spurred on to further and still more determined efforts by which they hoped to secure an abundant harvest wherewith to crown the labor of their lives. Of the number, then, whose services in the original Iroquois mission made them conspicuous figures in the religious history of their century, there was Father Claudius Dablon, who had come to Canada in 1655, served his novitiate in the mission of Onondaga, went with Dreuillettes to Hudson's Bay in 1661, with Marquette to Superior in 1668, and "after founding Sault Ste. Mary's, became Superior of all the missions in 1670." It was during his incumbency of this position, which he is known to have occupied until 1693, that he edited the Relation of 1671-2, besides compiling others, and writing an interesting narrative account of the travels and discoveries of Father Marquette. Another of the noted members of this band of early missionaries was Father Francis le Mercier, who came to Canada in 1635 and almost immediately associated himself with the Huron mission. He was Superior of the Order from 1653 to 1656, and from 1665 until 1670. During his residence in Canada, he published six volumes of the Relations, besides rendering valuable services to the cause of religion. Yet another of this coterie was Father Paul Rageneau, who was born at Paris in 1605. He came to Canada in 1636, where he labored among the Hurons almost continuously until the close of that mission. He, also, was Superior of the Order at Quebec from 1650 to 1653. In 1666 he returned to France, where he remained until the date of his death, September 3, 1680. Father Rageneau also contributed considerably to the literary productions of his time, writing four volumes of the Relations, as well as a work entitled, "Life of Mother Catharine of St. Augustine, an Ursuline Nun." Of Father Menard much more will be said in our subsequent account of the missions.

HOW often has it been said, how often proved that truth is stranger than fiction; how often, too, have many lived to learn that the hour of deepest travail foreshadowed a day of g'adness; for all unkenned of finite eye—ofttimes when least expected—Providence weaves out its beautiful and mysterious designs upon the most darksome and forbiding back-ground. None perhaps have ever appreciated this more fully than the missionary Fathers, who, subjects of the basest ingratitude, victims of the vulgar and uncontrolled passions of the savage, sat in the gloom of their own awful surroundings, and awaited uncomplainingly, almost cheerfully, the development of God's will. In this particular the Iroquois mission was no exception to the general rule; for at the moment of its greatest hopelessness, when necessarily deserted by the missionaries, and left to a terrible and impending fate, the needed assistance was forthcoming whereby the nation was saved from an irretrievable lapse into moral degradation.

The man of the hour was a nephew of Tododaho, the greatest Sachem of the League, who, though neither warrior nor chief, was an orator of surpassing eloquence. He, it seems, had long been favorable to the cause of Christianity, and after the French were compelled to seek safety in flight, though formerly entirely undemonstrative and non-committal, stepped forward to the front as a champion of those among his people who had announced their adherence to the Catholic faith. Naturally he could do but little to stem the torrent of vindictiveness and ferocity with which the Iroquois assailed their whilom friends and associates, although he was a persistent and ardent advocate of peace, for which he continuously pleaded though by so doing he ofttimes endangered his life. So for a time at least his efforts were fruitless, his every endeavor being shrouded in a cloak of seething flame, his hopes engulfed in a very sepulchre of blood. Yet, through all these scenes of hopelessness and despair, a divine and approving eye rested upon him, a helping hand was stretched forth to guide his faltering steps and finally to lift him from the depths of an overwhelming despondency and infinite peril to a height of happy and expectant security.

At last his wise and generous counsels prevailed, as a result of which the Onondagas sent a peace embassy to Quebec, which journey they also made the occasion of returning a number of captives to the French. Of the coming of this embassy, Shea tells us: "In July, 1660, the beleaguered townsmen of Montreal beheld an Iroquois canoe shoot out above the town with a white flag fluttering in the breeze. Men crowded in anxiety to the wall; but the canoe came silently on, and on reaching the bank in front of the town gate the warriors stepped ashore as calmly as if they were friendly guests, and, followed by four Frenchmen, advanced into the town. An audience was soon given. There the spokesman, the Cayuga, Saonchiogwa, the warm friend of Garacontie (the subject of our previous remarks) and sharer of his thoughts, broke in public the bonds of the four prisoners and promised the freedom of the rest, assuring the French of the friendly disposition of the tribe. Beginning his address he explained the various presents; at the fifth he said: 'This is to draw the Frenchman to us, that he may return to his mat, which we have still preserved at Ganentaa, where the house is yet standing that he had when he dwelt among us. His fire has not been extinguished since his departure, and his fields which we have tilled wait but his hand to gather in the harvest; he will make peace flourish again in our midst by his stay, as he had banished all the evils of war; and to cement this alliance and unite us so closely together that the demon jealous of our happiness may no longer be able to traverse our good designs, we beg that the holy women (nuns) may come to us, both those who take care of the sick and those that instruct the young. We will build them fine cabins, and the fairest mats in the country are destined for them. Let them not fear the currents or rapids. We have banished them all, and rendered the river so smooth that they could themselves, without pain or fear, ply the light paddles.'

"Here he paused, and his tone of compliment gave way to one of stern resolve. Raising his last belt, he exclaimed: 'A Black-gown must come with me, otherwise no peace; and on his coming depend the lives of the twenty Frenchmen at Onondaga;' and with these words he placed in the Governor's hands a leaf of the book on the margin of which the captives had written their names.

"The councils of the French were divided. It seemed blind temerity to yield to this demand; but influenced by the accounts of the returned captives, who declared that the women were unanimous in favor of Christianity, that Garacontié was entirely on their side, and had now remained to prevent any counter movement in his absence, the council left the final determination to the Viscount d'Argenson, who asked that Father le Moyne should meet the wishes of the Indians. That intrepid missionary for the fifth time girt himself to visit the homes of the Iroquois. It was, he declared, the happiest day of his life. Now, at last, he seemed to go, never to return; for his steps would be in a land still reeking with the blood of the French, where the fires were scarce extinguished around which the Onondagas had danced in savage triumph over their expiring prisoners."

On this mission bent, he left Montreal on the 21st of July, and after a tedious, difficult and extremely dangerous journey, at last reached the mouth of the Oswego, where he encountered a war party on its way to Montreal. Finally he reached Onondaga, where he was met and cared for by Garacontié, who, after introducing him to the principal Sachems of the tribe, led him to his own cabin, a part of which had already been fitted up as a chapel. The peace mission on which le Moyne was sent as emissary was ratified by the chiefs of Onondaga, Cayuga and Seneca on August 12. But throughout all of these negotiations there seemed to be a decided lack of sincerity on the part of the Indians, as evidenced in the fact that, instead of returning the entire number of captives held by them, upon the arrangements for peace being completed, but nine were allowed to return to the settlement, the remainder being held until the following spring, when le Moyne was assured they would be also set at liberty.

In the meantime, the war party which he had met with on his way up had committed numerous depredations at the island of Montreal, completing their atrocities with the murder of the Sulpitian, James le Maitre, while a few months later the Rev. William Vignal, secular priest of the same congregation, also met with a violent death at the hands of a band of Mohawks. In spite of this want of honor on the part of the Indians, however, their emissary was received with due respect and consideration, a number of the Indian prisoners being released and turned over to him as promised in the preliminary arrangements.

During this time Father le Moyne continued to labor in Western New York, being ably abetted in his efforts to advance the interests of religion and maintain peace by Garacontié. Soon after he left Onondaga for the settlements, arriving at Sault St. Louis on the last day of August, from which point he subsequently went to Montreal. "Thus," says Shea, "ended the Iroquois missions of Father le Moyne. Though named once more to his old post, he never visited the tribes of Central New York. Companion of Brebeuf, Jogues, Garnier and Daniel at the Huron mission as early as 1638, he had ever and justly been dear to the Indian and the white man for his firmness, intrepidity and zeal. Successor to Jogues, whose name he bore, he founded the Iroquois mission planned by the former, visited almost every village in the cantons, and was known and respected in all. Now, worn out by his long missionary labors, he sunk under the weight of years and toil, and after an illness of nine days expired by a most holy death at the Cape de la Madeleine, November 24, 1665, having just completed his sixty-first year."

And now let it briefly be noted that, although far from having carried to completion his good intentions, Garacontié still labored assiduously for the welfare of his people. Numerous other dissensions sprung up, however, which continued to arouse and keep alive those revengeful sentiments by which, unfortunately, the Indians were all too readily governed. Another reason for this was found in the fact that the Mohawks and Oneidas had recently met with a signal defeat at the hands of the Chippewas, of whom they had heretofore been wont to speak in the utmost derision. Then, too, the Conestogues (Andastes) were creating considerable alarm among these people, ravaging their Western cantons and scalping numbers of their braves. It was in this condition, when surrounded by aggressive and victorious enemies, that they at last turned to the French with longing eyes and sought from them that assistance of which they were so greatly in need. But they were too late, for the French Governor, whose patience finally became exhausted by the many outrages perpetrated by these people and their almost absolute lack of honesty, and general treachery, had determined to humble them and bring them to a thorough and appreciative realization of the power of the arms of France when raised in just indignation against them.

In the meantime Garacontié had labored assiduously for a peaceful understanding, in which he had so far succeeded as to be enabled to guarantee the good intentions of a majority of the tribes. But the French were already in the field, and so actively aggressive had they become that soon none were left to oppose them but the Mohawks. These people de Tracy, who was in charge of the French forces, determined to punish severely, and for that purpose started immediately for their country with a large force, consisting of twelve hundred whites and one hundred Indians. Having arrived in the Mohawk country, he immediately carried matters with a high hand, burning villages, taking off and destroying stores, until, thoroughly cowed and disheartened, this haughty nation was compelled to sue for peace, which was subsequently granted by the Governor, de Courcelles. Thus for a brief period a general peace supervened throughout the entire country.

As on numerous previous occasions of a similar character, the missionaries at once took advantage of the prevailing conditions to carry forward their labors and increase their force in evangelizing the natives. Desirous of avoiding all delays, therefore, and eager to bring the Iroquois to a sense of their moral shortcomings, they took keen delight in the establishment of a colony among the Cayugas at Quinte Bay, north of Lake Ontario, to which, in 1666, a number of missionaries, among them Father Fremin, was sent. This mission, however, they soon resigned to the Sulpitians, two priests of that Order, Claude Trouvé and Francis de Salegnac de Fenelon, arriving there October 28, 1668.

In the meantime the Jesuits were fast completing arrangements for the renewal of the missions in New York, their first objective point being the Mohawk valley, where Father Jogues had labored so devotedly, for which purpose Fathers James Fremin, James Bruyas and John Pierron were selected. They set forth on this undertaking in July, 1667, and after numerous delays, owing to the still somewhat unsettled condition of the country, arrived in the land of the Mohawks[1], where they were received with every evidence of satisfaction. From the place of their first labors the missionaries moved to Gandawague and thence to other towns, at last reaching Tionnontoguen, the capital, where they also met with most gratifying success. The work of Father Fremin was particularly efficacious, owing perhaps to his familiarity with the different dialects, to the study of which his associates also devoted considerable time. There were occasions, however, when their treatment savored of that experienced by their predecessors in less promising times, particularly when the Indians were under the influence of liquor, surreptitiously secured by them from neighboring traders. Then they became utterly irresponsible, on some occasions abusing and illtreating the missionaries and burning and destroying their papers and numerous utensils used in the performance of their sacred duties.

In spite of these occasional unpleasantnesses, however, the effort progressed, and finally the mission of St. Mary's was established. This much accomplished, the work of extension began, Father Bruyas going to Oneida and Pierron to Albany, the former being accompanied by a Frenchman named Boquet, who also acted as interpreter for him. After a brief visit at Albany, Pierron left for Quebec, where he arrived in the month of February. In the following May, Father Julian Garnier, to whom belongs the distinction of being the first Jesuit ordained in Canada, set out for Oneida. From thence, after a brief visit with Father Bruyas, he went to Onondaga, where he was received with the most lively demonstrations. Here he was urged to remain, but steadfastly refused to do so unless they were willing to show their fervor and anxiety for spiritual instruction by the erection of a chapel. To aid in the carrying-out of this project, Garacontié, still active in his labors in behalf of the missions, went to Quebec in order that he might bring back with him an associate for Father Garnier, as well as a missionary for the Cayugas, who had not as yet been supplied with one. This mission was altogether satisfactory, the request being granted, and on his return he was accompanied by Fathers Stephen de Carheil and Peter Milet. These missionaries arrived safely at their destination in the following October, and almost immediately after having established Milet in his place he proceeded with Carheil to the Cayuga country, where soon after a chapel was erected and dedicated to St. Joseph, the "patron of the Jesuit missions of North America." In the same month, also, Father Fremin left the Mohawk valley for the country of the Senecas, where he erected a chapel. Thus, says Shea, by the close of 1668 there were missions founded in all the Iroquois cantons.

Of all the Mohawk towns brought under the influences of Christianity at this time, Gandawague, we are told, took the lead in piety, fervor and constancy. There was a chapel in this village, which had been erected by the native converts who came there with great regularity each Sunday for worship. But the general condition for the better, which prevailed throughout the entire country at this time, had not been brought about without the most indefatigable and unceasing labor, the idolatrous beliefs pertaining to the aborigines not infrequently creating disturbances and misunderstandings which at times bade fair to overwhelm much if not all of the good which had been accomplished.

(1) Although the Mohawks were noted for their extreme cruelty to prisoners, two-thirds of the village first visited by the missionaries consisted of Huron and Algonquin captives, many of whom had been instructed in the Christian faith, to which, in spite of a long period of enforced separation, they still remained steadfast.

Gradually, however, the missionaries won upon the confidence of the people, until at last they gained an absolute ascendency. Then rites hitherto held sacred were disavowed, concessions extraordinary and unexpected were made, while even in many instances the medicine men cast their instruments of office into the fire and yielded themselves as willing captives to the new belief. From this time, in fact, idolatry entirely ceased among the people of the Mohawk nation, and with great frequency considerable additions were made to the Christian ranks.

Of the other missions it may be said that Father Boniface was accomplishing the most gratifying results at Gandawague, where an advanced state of spiritual understanding was quite noticeable. At this place, in 1673, prayers were publicly said at the mission of St. Peter's as regular as in any Christian community in Europe. A chorus of men and women with the tiny voices of the children honored the solemnity of Sunday, and after the sacrifice of the Mass bread was blessed according to the customs of the churches of France. Unfortunately, the life of Father Boniface was not to be spared much longer to continue the labors in which he had proved so eminently successful. Worn out by the privations and hardships of a long and eventful missionary career, he was in 1674 recalled to Quebec, where on the 17th of December, "in sentiments of the most tender piety," he yielded up his life.

In the mean time Father James Lamberville was placed in charge at Caughnawaga, arriving there in 1675, while four years later Father Bruyas was succeeded at Tionnontoguen by Father Francis Viallant du Gueslis, who remained there till the latter part of 1681, when a hostile spirit began to evince itself, attributable in some degree to English influence.

It was at this time, most of the Christians having already departed to other localities, that the missions in this section of the country were discontinued. Father James Bruyas, who was one of the most prominently active among the missionaries sent to the country of the Iroquois, came to Canada in 1666, arriving at Quebec on August 3 of that year. After serving among the various missions from July 14 of the following year until 1679, he was for some time stationed at Sault St. Louis. He was also Superior of all the missions from 1693 to 1699, envoy to Boston in 1700 and to Onondaga in 1701-2. As the most accomplished of Mohawk philologists, he compiled a number of valuable works on that language. His death occurred in 1703. Of his labors among the missions, it may be said that the one established by him at Oneida neither paid for the energy spent by him upon it nor the subsequent laborious efforts of his successors to maintain it. The people of this mission, in fact, were always opposed to Christianity, and may be said to have accepted the advances of the missionaries under protest, undoubtedly impelled to do so by the fact that they were almost helpless from the effects of famine and the incursions of neighboring and unfriendly tribes. Then, too, they were the victims of the habit of intemperance to such an extent that there were occasions when it became absolutely necessary for the missionaries to suspend their work and retire to some place of safety until their appetites had been satiated and the orgies were at an end.

When Father Bruyas was appointed Superior of the Iroquois missions in 1671, he placed Father Milet at the head of that of the Oneidas, where he remained for a period of fourteen years, when, owing to the unsettled condition of the country, he was recalled in July, 1684, and the Oneida mission may to all intents and purposes be said to have ceased to exist. Father Milet was also instrumental in accomplishing much good among the people of the Onondaga mission, which was considered one of the most promising of those established in the country of the Iroquois. This mission was in charge of Father Garnier, to whose assistance Milet came, his presence being of unusual advantage, owing to his ability and the rapidity with which he acquired a thorough knowledge of the language. A year after arriving at this station, Father Milet was left in charge, Garnier having been called to the country of the Senecas, to assist Father Fremin in his work among that extensive tribe. Father Milet's life was a very active one among the Onondagas, and he spared himself in nothing, that the work might be carried along most thoroughly and aggressively. In this he was greatly aided by Garacontié, whose friendship and advice proved invaluable. So successful was he that by the Christmas following his arrival there he was obliged to enlarge his chapel, which building he also adorned with a bell, the same having formerly belonged to the old mission at Ganentaa, where it was used to call the people to worship.

Additional zest was added to the work of the missionaries through a meeting called by the Superior of the Missions in August, 1669, on which occasion Fathers Fremin, Garnier, Bruyas, Pierron, de Carheil and Milet all met at Onondaga. Here, besides enjoying a renewed acquaintance with one another, they perfected a uniform plan for the carrying on of the work which aided greatly in their future undertaking. A notable event of this period transpired at this time at Quebec, when in the presence of "the descendants of the crusaders, men of noble lineage in the Old World, Hurons from Montmorency, Tionnontates from Mackinaw, Mohicans from the Hudson, Algonquins from the St. Lawrence, Chippewas from Lake Superior, and Iroquois from every tribe along the Mohawk and Genesee, stood Garacontié to receive Baptism at the hands of Laval, as the chieftain Clovis did centuries before at the hands of Remy. With calm attention, he followed the rite. Clear and distinct were his responses as to the doctrines he would embrace; positive to sternness itself, his declaration of adherence to Christianity. Then, amid the thunder of the canon from Fort St. Louis, with the Governor standing by as his sponsor, the waters of baptism flowed on his head, and the greatest Iroquois of the epoch, the virtual head of the league, was now the Christian Daniel Garacontié."

From that time forward he worked with utmost energy and faithfulness in behalf of the Christian religion, thus forming a welcome and valuable auxiliary to the missionary Fathers, who through his influence effected many notable conversions. His death, which occurred soon after, was recognized as an unparalleled misfortune by the missionaries and the entire French colony, while even the Indians deplored the loss of so good and worthy a man.

It was not long after this sad occurrence that Father Bruyas, then Superior, assumed the duties of Father John de Lamberville at Onondaga, where, however, his residence was brief, as the former missionary, accompanied by his brother James, soon after returned and remained actively in the field until compelled by stress of circumstances to take his departure from the country of the Iroquois.

The Cayuga mission, it will be remembered, was established by Father de Carheil, who left Father Milet at Onondaga in 1668, and at once proceeded into the country of those people. The first visit of any missionary to this nation was made by Father Menard, who was there a number of years prior to this time, the period, in fact, when St. Mary's of Ganentaa was first established. Of the work accomplished by him, however, but little if any evidence remains, except perhaps as it was shown in a very few who adhered to the doctrines inculcated by him at that time. That de Carheil was eminently fitted for the position, besides being an earnest worker, there was no question, although unfortunately his efforts were but poorly repaid. He arrived in that country on the 6th of November, 1668, and immediately proceeded to erect a little chapel, which was completed, and dedicated in honor of St. Joseph three days later. What mortal man could do he did to ingratiate himself with these people, going so far as to watch at the palisades in time of danger, and even accompanying their war parties when they went forth to repel the attacks made by the Conestogues (Andastes) and other tribes with whom they were at enmity. As missionary to these people, he had charge of three distinct villages—Goiogouen, Kiohero and Onnontare—in all of which he found quite a number of Hurons, a few of whom had adopted the Christian faith and were eager to avail themselves of his services as pastor. He also worked zealously among the pagans of that nation with whom he came in contact, but with very little success. One instance which fully illustrates the perversity of these people is given in the story of a warrior whose daughter lay at the point of death. Carheil endeavored to baptize the child, but her father, sternly refusing all advances made by him, said: "You speak as Echon did in our country; he killed men by water, and you wish to do the same." That night the child died, and he became inconsolable. "All that night," he writes, "my heart was full of bitterness; I could not sleep, having constantly before me the loss of that soul, which I loved and would have saved, but which was now lost. Then better than ever I realized the affliction of the heart of Jesus, Who loved all men and wished to save them, yet knew the prodigious multitude of those who should be lost." But he continued zealously in the work, as a result of which the church showed a perceptible increase in numbers, people of all ages and positions joining the classes which he held for their instruction. Then an aggravating illness attacked him, compelling his return to Canada, and he was replaced at the mission by Father Peter Raffeix.

Recovering from his illness, Father de Carheil again returned to his mission, while his substitute went to the country of the Senecas. Once more he proceeded with the laborious undertaking of converting these people and bringing them to a somewhat realizing sense of their morally destitute condition. Occasionally he was rewarded for these efforts, although in a great many instances he found prejudice so deeply rooted in their minds that it was an almost impossible task to convince them. He had, however, a warm friend and supporter in the person of the chief Soanchiogwan, who ably and generously abetted him in the work, the benefit of which he had learned to appreciate under the instruction of Menard and Chaumonot.

Thus matters continued in this mission until 1684, when de Carheil was compelled to leave. This noble-minded man and remarkable acquisition to the missionary forces of Canada arrived in that colony on the 6th of August, 1666, when he was immediately sent among the Hurons, by whom he was known by the name of Aondechété. After virtually being driven from the Cayuga mission, he was transferred to the country of the Ottawas, among whom he labored for many years (he was for more than sixty years in the missionary field of Canada, where by both French and Indians he was regarded as a Saint and genius of the highest order). Finally he returned to Quebec, where he died at a very advanced age in July, 1726.

The mission of the Senecas offered many advantages to the missionaries, being located in one of the most populous cantons of the nation. One town, Gandougarae, was made up principally of Hurons, Neutrals and Onnontiogas, the former, as elsewhere stated, being sole survivors of the missions of St. Michel and St. John Baptist, located at the towns of Kontarea and Huronia. In the convocation of missionaries referred to, held at Onondaga in 1669, Father Fremin felt it incumbent upon him to call for assistance in conducting these missions, and so sent for Father Garnier, to whom he assigned the town of Gandachiragou. Here a chapel was built in which Mass was said daily, while the presence of a resident missionary among them added much to the zealous energy of those of the people who had previously adopted the Christian religion.

Garnier found the task allotted to him anything but a sinecure, and in fact, soon after coming there, almost fell a victim to the fury of an inebriate. However, he remained at the mission, studying assiduously through the winter months in order that he might acquire a more thorough knowledge of the language of the people. During the year following his duties were still increased, owing to the fact that Father Fremin was compelled to return to St. Lawrence, thus leaving him alone in charge of the entire mission. Other difficulties also arose; the village of St. Michel's was consumed by fire, and with it, of course, the chapel went also. However, this was remedied by the zealousness of the Christians, who shortly after the disaster erected another building. Then his opportunities were badly curtailed, owing to slanderous rumors which were sent abroad, so that he lost caste, as it were, among the people to such an extent that his life was in great danger. During this episode the Christians stood gallantly by him. Fortunately, at about this time he was still further reinforced by the coming of Father Raffeix, who arrived at the mission of the Conception in July. There was still another town, by the name of St. James, where dwelt quite a number of Christians who were exceedingly anxious that a missionary be sent to them, as a result of which Father John Pierron was relegated to that charge. In spite of their increased forces, however, there was still much danger to contend with, from which the missionaries were providentially enabled to escape. Aside from the enmity of the pagans, they were still further embarrassed by the hostility of La Salle, under whose command the French occupation of Niagara transpired in 1678. Still they labored on for a number of years through the perils and tribulations attending their precarious condition, hoping almost against hope, building and maintaining chapels and evincing a devotedness and singleness of purpose which was truly admirable. Thus matters continued until fresh difficulties arose in the dispute between England and France as to the rightful ownership of the valleys of the Mohawk and Oswego, as a direct result of which the missions were sacrificed.

Of the three men most prominently identified with the missionary work among the Senecas, Father Fremin takes precedence. The date of his first coming to Canada is unknown, although it is an assumed fact that he was sent to Onondaga in 1656, remaining there until the close of the first mission in March, 1658. For two years following he was located at Miscou and subsequently at Three Rivers and Cape de la Madeleine. He then served, as already stated, in the Cayuga and Mohawk missions, remaining in the latter until 1671, when he was located at La Prairie, and made several voyages from there to France in behalf of that settlement. Latterly he is referred to as having again taken an active part in the conduct of the Iroquois missions. His death occurred at Quebec on July 2, 1691.

Father Julian Garnier was born at Connerai, diocese of Mans, in 1643, and was a brother of the celebrated Benedictine of that name. Of his ordination at Quebec and subsequent services in the missions of Canada, considerable mention has already been made. Of Father Peter Raffeix, who founded La Prairie, we learn that he arrived at Quebec in 1663, was chaplain of an expedition against the Mohawks in 1665, appointed to the Cayuga mission in 1666, and the year following at Isle Percée. Subsequent to founding La Prairie, he labored among the Cayugas and Senecas till 1680. In 1703 he was living in Quebec, although giving marked physical evidences of the toil and privations he had undergone.

"Opposite Montreal," Shea writes, "lay a fine open tract extending for several miles, which early obtained the name of La Prairie. It was at first allotted to de la Ferté, Abbe de la Madeleine, a member of the Society of One Hundred, who for a time controlled the destinies of Canada. Deeply interested in the success of the missions, he subsequently bestowed this tract on the Jesuit Fathers, in whose name it still stands, though actually seized by the British government."

He then substantially tells us that, owing to the troublous times, the position was too exposed to be desirable for settlement, and therefore that it was not until about the year 1669 that the Fathers concluded to build a home there as a resort for the missionaries on the Upper Lakes, to which they could, when so desired, retire in comfort and quiet. At the time when Father Raffeix came to this place for the purpose of establishing a village there, La Prairie acquired a new interest.

The Indians, as shown on many previous occasions, had become lax in their duties to the Church, superinduced, perhaps, to some extent by their proximity to the traders of New York, who supplied them liberally with liquor, for which it is known the aborigines always had a remarkable predilection. The establishment of the missions had the effect of arousing their fervor, and in fact created a desire within them for the rites of Baptism as well as for other privileges pertaining to a proper acknowledgment of the Church's authority and some evident efforts on their part to fulfill the instructions of the missionaries. In order to do this successfully, however, it was apparent that they must relieve themselves of the evil influences by which they were surrounded, and which maintained a material effect upon their conduct generally. It was therefore deemed advisable that they seek another and more suitable home farther away from the influence of prevailing dissipation, where amidst the quiet and peaceful surroundings of a serene and holy life, they might be brought more thoroughly to a realizing sense of their extreme condition of moral degradation. At this time Lorette, the Huron colony near Quebec, of which already considerable mention has been made, was the point which seemed to offer the most inviting location for this purpose. To this place, therefore, the first of a large number of those who had willingly acceded to the demands of the missionaries, were sent, but on the way, as they passed La Prairie, where a little chapel had already been erected by Father Raffeix, it suddenly suggested itself to those in charge of the undertaking that this was the most fitting spot in which to establish a new settlement. This was accomplished, and thus "the first Iroquois reduction" was founded, the same being denominated St. Francis Xavier des prés. This new settlement, which it is generally understood was established towards the end of the year 1669, was placed in charge of Catharine Ganneaktena, who had acted as hostess to Bruyas at Oneida; she was an Erie girl adopted by that tribe. In this undertaking she was exceedingly successful, so that in 1670 the little settlement contained some eighteen or twenty families. The importance of this community demanded that it have some official head, and thus, we are told, a government was organized and two chiefs elected, one for prayer and one for government. When in the following year Father Fremin returned to that locality, he was greatly astonished and highly gratified at what had been accomplished; so much so, in fact, that as soon as practicable he made a journey to France with a view to obtaining what aid was possible towards the maintenance of the colony and furtherance of the entire plan. While he was absent, the spiritual charge of these people was given into the hands of Father Peter Cholonek, who spoke afterwards in most emphatic terms of the fervor and interest exhibited by them in all matters pertaining to the affairs of the Church. The strength of this settlement was not drawn from one tribe in particular, but from a number of them, so that in 1674 there were representatives from five of the Iroquois tribes in the village. As the settlement grew, the number of chiefs forming the governmental head was increased to five, from which number no change was subsequently made. One of the principal requisites to become a member of this colony was an absolute willingness on the part of the applicant to foreswear, among other things, the idolatrous observance of dreams, change of wives and drunkenness. Here the missionaries began to labor most assiduously, instructing by means of personal example, reiterated statements and sermons. They also gained much assistance from the use of symbolical pictures, which, in fact, had been found a most valuable accessory in all of the missions. Then, too, they were ably seconded by a number of the chiefs and elders, who had been thoroughly grounded and well instructed in all of the points of Christian doctrine. Thus matters progressed with the utmost satisfaction, so much so that, having come to the knowledge of Mgr. Laval, then Bishop of Quebec, he decided to visit the settlement in person, leaving there on May 26, 1675. At the time of his coming among them, the settlement numbered in the neighborhood of two hundred inhabitants, all of whom were actively enthusiastic over the honor conferred upon them. In the year following it became evident that the lowlands surrounding their present location were not altogether suited to the purpose to which they were necessarily intended, and therefore it was decided to move to the neighborhood of a small stream, called Portage River, where a number of cabins were hurriedly thrown together and a temporary chapel built. This point was within view of the rapids of St. Lawrence (Sault St. Louis), and owing to its close proximity to that place, the new mission was named St. Francis Xavier du Sault. On this point, some time subsequently, a substantial stone church was erected, which, when completed (in the spring of 1678), was regarded as one of the finest edifices in that portion of Canada. Some years later the site of this mission was visited by a terrific hurricane, which entirely demolished the church as well as everything else of a structural character in that vicinity. Immediately after this disaster one of the chiefs offered a new cabin as a place of worship, which kindly proffer was gratefully accepted, and as the people soon after removed to a location farther up the river, the former church was never rebuilt. In fact, of that structure as well as of the village no evidence whatever remained, save and alone for a solitary cross which marked the last resting-place of Catharine Ganneaktena, who had died and was buried there in 1680.

"The mission of Quinte Bay was founded with means furnished by one of the Order of Sulpitians, and was established," says Shea, "among the few tribes of Cayugas, where Messrs. Fénélon and Trouvé began, in 1668, the first Sulpitian Mission among the Iroquois. They were succeeded in this work by Messrs. d'Urfe, de Cicé, and others who had succeeded them, and for ten years struggled in vain, and they concluded that only by a 'reduction' could real good be done." When, therefore, a number of Iroquois and others petitioned for rights of residence on the island of Montreal, in 1676, their proposition was gladly accepted, a site being assigned to them for that purpose. Here, then, the Mission of the Mountain was begun. In addition to this, the idea was promulgated and recommended to open a school for the instruction of both boys and girls. This most essential point having been decided upon, the Sulpitians closed the Quinte mission, and having turned over all of their rights in the premises to the Recollects, gave their undivided attention to the new settlement. The first Recollects to take charge of the deserted mission were Fathers Louis Hennepin and Luke Buisset. The former visited extensively among the cantons in New York, whence he returned to Fort Frontenac, from which place he started on an expedition in charge of La Salle. Father Luke, however, a pious and zealous man, wandered for two seasons among the Indians. He was succeeded, it is supposed, in 1681, by Father Francis, of whom le Clerq speaks in terms of eulogy, and who remained in his capacity as missionary among the Iroquois for a period of six years. The extent of his success, however, is somewhat questionable, for it appears that "when Denonville required an interpreter at the place, he was compelled to substitute Father Milet as chaplain, a step which would have been unnecessary had Father Wasson spoken the Cayuga dialect." The mission, it is believed, was finally abandoned in 1687.

At the Mountain Mission a village was soon erected and a chapel built, the latter work being accomplished at the expense of Francis de Belmont. The population at this time consisted of about one hundred and sixty Indians, fully half of whom were Christians, who were apportioned among a number of bark cabins which had been systematically built and arranged. The school for boys, already projected, was opened in 1679, being in charge of Mr. de Belmont, while two of the Congregation Sisters were sent by Margaret Bourgeois, foundress of the community, to open the school for girls. Here the work prospered beyond reasonable expectation, the schools being in a particularly promising condition. Of the boys, of whom from the first there were twenty-three, all had learned to read, write and chant, besides acquiring devious other accomplishments of value to the peculiar condition surrounding the settlement. The girls also showed a noticeable change in their appearance, adopting entirely the European style of dress.

"Among the earliest fruits of the care of Sister Bourgeois," says Shea, "was an Onondaga girl, Attontinon, who took in baptism the name of Mary Barbara. She was one of the earliest converts of the mission, and after displaying great fervor, was after repeated requests received into the community in 1679, making the promises by which alone the Sisters were then bound. So great a change had been made in her Indian character, that she lived for twelve years as a Sister, eminent for her regular observance of the rules and all the little virtues of a community life." Still another case was that of Gannensagwas, granddaughter of a venerable slave of the Senecas, noted for his great piety, who had removed to the Mountain Mission in 1677. She also was placed with the Sisters, under whose direction, having obtained a suitable knowledge of religion, she was finally baptized by the name of Mary Theresa. This convert was particularly noticeable for her extreme modesty and many other virtues which endeared her to the entire community. Others, too, there were who became ardent and consistent Christians, so that the mission, though poor in material belongings, bid fair, from the evident sincerity of its members, to vie with the most advanced in spiritual progression and religious fervor.

It was at this particular juncture that a change came athwart the general condition of affairs, owing to the position taken by the new Commandant of the British Provinces, who sought under one pretext or another to wean, not only the Confederacy, but other tribes as well, over to the support of, and alliance with, British interests. It was a bold effort, made doubly effective from the fact that a number of incidents transpired at that time which had a tendency towards opening up a breach between the French and a number of the nations. For instance, a party of Iroquois assaulted a French post in Illinois; a Seneca chief was murdered at Mackinaw, and other depredations were committed, creating a feeling of excitement so intense, as well as general, as to make a longer stay of the French missionaries among the tribes a most dangerous and ill-advised undertaking. So, in 1682, Fathers Fremin and Pierron withdrew from that locality, being followed within a year by Father Garnier. This left the Senecas without a mission. In the mean time, Father de Carheil was experiencing like difficulties among the Cayugas, who robbed and abused him until, overcome with the indignities put upon him, he withdrew, and the mission practically came to an end. So alarming had the condition of affairs become in 1684, that the French Commandant de la Barre decided upon giving the Senecas a practical illustration of French authority. Accompanied, then, by a considerable body of men, among whom were a number of Christianized Iroquois, he started forth towards the country of the enemy. On the way there, he was met by Father Milet and representatives of the Iroquois cantons, the latter bringing with them proposals for peace, which were finally accepted. Milet returned with this expedition to the settlement, leaving but two representatives of the missionary interests, the de Lambervilles at Onondaga, to whose charge thus fell the spiritual interests of the entire Iroquois country. In the meantime, Colonel Dongan, of the British Provinces, had obtained the services, or assistance, of three English Jesuits, with whom he proposed to entice the Indians from their allegiance to the French Government. He also employed other and more emphatic measures, but to no purpose, as John de Lamberville remained steadfastly by his post, and the people absolutely refused to concede the points requested by Dongan, which were requisite to the success of his undertaking. But the Iroquois Mission was nearing its end, bound at length to succumb to a combination of treachery and broken faith, which in the enormity of its vile conception overshadowed the most brutal treatment conceived of savage mind. Here is what Shea says: "Yet not Dongan, but Denonville, was to give the last blow to the Iroquois Mission, and it soon after closed, as it had begun, in the captivity of a missionary. Although Dongan had failed to induce the Onondagas to surrender Father James, he persuaded them that his brother would appear only as a guide to the French army. War parties were actually in the field when de Lamberville arrived alone with presents from the Governor, and was soon able by his frank address and insinuating manner to change the opinion so unfavorably formed. Having thus quieted the storm, he hastened back to Quebec, to announce the good disposition of the Onondagas and the hostility of the Senecas. Then, his political career ended, he set out in September for his mission, whence his brother was now to depart. Yet, to be deprived of that consolation, with life in constant danger from the drunken braves who staggered to his door, an object of jealousy and suspicion to the authorities of New York, fearless, unbroken and undismayed, the gallant John de Lamberville, the last of the missionaries, alone in the heart of New York with enemies on every side, clung to his desperate mission.

"Will it be credited that a Catholic Governor could sport with the life of such a devoted man? Yet so it was. Father John de Lamberville little knew, as he bent his way to Onondaga, that he was the dupe of an act of treachery as savage as any by which the faithless Iroquois had sullied their name. In his instruction to de la Barre, the French King had ordered some Iroquois captives to be sent to the galleys in France. Unable to take them in war, Denonville resolved to employ treachery; and now, through Father de Lamberville, invited the Iroquois chiefs to a council at Cataraqui in the following spring, intending to seize them all; and at the same time he sent Father Milet to that fort, to act as chaplain, and, when necessary, as interpreter. When the deputies arrived in the spring of 1687, they were seized and sent in chains to France. This news came like a thunder-clap on the cantons. All rose in war. De Lamberville's life was forfeited; but the Sachems of Onondaga knew Teiorhensere (the name by which de Lamberville was known among them) too well, and resolved to save his life. Summoning him before them, they exclaimed, after bitter reproaches to the Governor: 'Every consideration, Teiorhensere, would justify our treating thee as an enemy; but we cannot bring ourselves to do so. We know thee too well not to be convinced that thy heart had no part in the active treachery which thou hast done us; and we are not so unjust as to punish thee for a crime of which we believe thee innocent; which doubtless thou dost detest no less than we, and of which thou art horrified to have been an instrument. Yet it will not do for thee to tarry here; all will not perhaps do thee the same justice as ourselves; and when our young braves have once chanted the war song, they will behold in thee only a traitor who has delivered our chiefs to a harsh and unworthy slavery. They will hearken only to their fury, from which we could not save thee. Fly, then, Teiorhensere, fly!'

"Nor did they allow the Missionary to depart alone; guides and guards led him in safety to the nearest French post, and returned to dance the war dance of vengeance.

"Thus closed in the spring of 1687 the Iroquois Mission founded in 1667, having thus lasted just twenty years, a period illustrious for the labors of those zealous men employed in an ungrateful task, subject to reproach and calumny even in Canada, and misrepresented in many writings of the time. Of the purity of their motives and of their conduct, time and freedom from the passions then awakened enables us to form a calm and unprejudiced judgment."

Thus, too, ended a period of effort which, in point of self-abnegation, unfaltering zeal, and magnificent courage, had never been surpassed, if equaled, in the history of the world's greatest achievements. And there had been triumph, too, although not such as might be counted proportionate with the sufferings endured and the wonderful amount of good accomplished. Hundreds of little children had been received into the Church, the aged had found relief in the new belief, while the dying had obtained that consolation born only of the implicit confidence in the goodness of God and the wisdom of His teachings. Churches had been built throughout the country of these people, who thus had been afforded an opportunity of familiarizing themselves with the ways and manners of civilized people in conducting their meetings for public worship, while the young were instructed in many of the amenities of refined life. But at this moment, "when the labors of the missionaries seemed destined to gain gradually the great end of the entire conversion of the tribes, the jar of statesmen and human avarice was to drive them from the cantons." From this time forth, many prominent villages of the Iroquois were established along the banks of the St. Lawrence, most of the people thus effecting a permanent residence having been received into the Church as members and believers in the Christian Faith.

It was now that Denonville, whose duplicity had so nearly proved disastrous to de Lamberville, safely set forth with a formidable body of men for the country of the Senecas, the Indians connected with Iroquois "reductions" and Hurons of Lorette promptly allying themselves with these forces. Denonville first halted at Irondequoit Bay, where he erected a fort at the mouth of the des Sables River (Genesee), naming it after that stream. He then passed onward, considerably strengthened in numbers by the addition of a party of Ottawas, who, with Father Enjalran as their missionary, had come to join him. Further along the way, he marched through a number of defiles, finally falling into an ambush of Senecas some eight hundred strong. In the engagement which followed, the noted chief and Christian convert, Garonhiagué, was one of the first to fall. His last words were in keeping with the heroic character of the man: "God wills it, and I do not regret to die, since Christ died for me." From the scene of this conflict, Denonville passed along the southern shore of Lake Ontario to Niagara, where he reared another fort, of which de Lamberville became first chaplain. From this point the Governor returned, de Lamberville remaining there from September, 1687, until compelled by continued illness to resign. His successor was Father Milet, who remained until September of the following year, when the fort was abandoned.

It was not long before Denonville awakened to a realization of the grave error of which he had been guilty in breaking faith with the Indians; and this conviction became more firmly rooted when he discovered that even the missionaries upon whom he had so firmly relied as intermediaries in endeavoring to effect peace relations were impotent and no longer able to do so. On the contrary, by that overt act on his part, the French lost ground, the Onondagas and Oneidas refusing frequently to consider any further negotiations, while the Iroquois at the Rapids and Mountain not only released their prisoners, but quite a number of them left the missions and went directly to the cantons. Then Father Milet, at that time chaplain of the residents at Fort Frontenac, fell into the hands of the Oneidas, and would have been burnt at the stake had not a woman of the tribe adopted him. Soon after, a large party of Iroquois fell upon the Canadians of Lachine (La Chine), slaughtering two hundred of them, and carrying away as many more as prisoners. Rescue parties were promptly sent in pursuit of the marauders, only, however, to meet with death and disaster, the opposing party outmaneuvering as well as outnumbering them. It was while suffering from this deplorable condition, for which their leader was in a great measure, if not altogether, accountable, that the French decided to retaliate upon the English, whom they deemed responsible for the Indian uprising and massacre which followed. So, a party of French and Indians, some two hundred altogether, started for New York, the latter being under leadership of the Mohawk Chief Kryn. The result of this expedition was the utter destruction of Schenectady, and the slaughter of more than sixty innocent people, who, being surprised, were thoroughly unprepared for so vehement an assault as that which was made upon them. The next real disaster to the missionary cause was the unfortunate, it might be accidental, death of the Mohawk chieftain, Kryn, who, through mistake, fell by the hand of a friend. His death proved a severe loss to the missionaries, who had recognized in him a faithful friend and coadjutor.

In the meantime, active hostilities were maintained, the Mohawks continuing their depredations among the Caughnawagas, and even attacking the Mountain Mission. In the latter undertaking, they were also successful, slaying the Chief Tondiharon, and carrying away with them as prisoners between thirty and forty women and children. At about this time, Frontenac returned as Governor of the Colony, and peace having been somewhat restored, and Sir William Phipps, Commander of the British fleet, defeated before Quebec, the missionaries began an attempt to reorganize or reëstablish their old missions, unfortunately with but little effect, while the result of a firm religious training was strongly evidenced in a number of cases, as witnessed in the following one of Stephen te Ganonakoa, as described by Shea: "Surprised while hunting, in September, 1690, by a Cayuga party, he, his wife and a companion were conducted to Onondaga, and there received with fiendish joy. Stephen was forced to run the gauntlet, and undergo the usual tortures; but be avowed himself a Christian, happy to suffer as such even to the loss of life. In the torture, while they were tearing out his nails and cutting off his fingers, one of his tormentors cried, 'Pray'; 'Yes,' said Stephen, 'I will'; and, raising his hands, he blessed himself in a loud voice. A shout of rage burst from the crowd, and rushing on him, they cut off his remaining fingers. 'Pray now,' yelled the infuriated savages, and again he raised his hand to his forehead; and again rushing on him, they hacked off all his fingers, leaving only the mangled palm. Blows, insults, taunts, all were showered upon him, and again they dared him to pray. As this true lover of the Christ again raised his hand, it was entirely cut off, while, as if to efface the hated sign wherever his hand touched, forehead, shoulders or breast, was slashed with their knives. He next underwent the torture of fire; and triumphing over all, was at last bound to the stake. 'Enjoy,' he exclaimed— 'Enjoy, my brethren, the savage delight you take in burning me. Spare not! My sins deserve far more than thy cruelty can inflict, and the more you torment me, the richer my crown in Heaven shall be.' Nor did they spare him. Yet all their cruelty could not wring a sigh from the hero, who stood motionless there with his eyes raised to Heaven and his soul wrapt in prayer. At last, feeling the dew of death on his brow, he asked a moment's calm, and chanted aloud his prayer—a prayer for his torturers, who in a few moments completed their work.

"He had been ever distinguished at the Mission for his fervor and regularity, and especially for his careful education of his children. His wife escaped, as he had predicted, and returned to the Mission."

The early autumn of 1691 found the colonists and mission Indians in the most uncomfortable state of mind, owing to a report that the English were again about to attack them. A large force was, therefore, gathered at La Prairie, to better resist this anticipated onslaught, but so negligent were they that the English-Mohawk force was upon them before they realized their danger, or the presence of an enemy in the neighborhood. The attack was repulsed, though it cost them dear enough, their commander, Saint Cryque, and a number of others falling in the engagement. Other enterprises of a similar character followed, resulting in the loss of many good and useful lives without any benefit accruing to either side. Here another instance of remarkable Christian fortitude occurred in the case of Frances Gonanhatenha, a convert of Father Fremin, which efficiently testifies to the wonderful effect of Christian education upon some of these people, and is well worth repeating: "Frances heard one day of the approach of a hostile party towards the spot where her husband was hunting; she instantly started in her canoe, with two others, to go and warn him; but alas! arrived only to see him slain, and become, with her companions, prisoners in the hands of the enemy, Their torments began on the first evening; their nails were torn out, their fingers burnt. When they reached Onondaga, the native place of Frances, she was given to her own sister, who, dead to all the ties of blood and the cries of nature, gave her up to die. On the scaffold she loudly professed her faith and her happiness in dying for such a cause. A relative used every entreaty to induce her to renounce the Faith, until, furious at her resistance, he tore her crucifix from her neck, and with his knife slashed her a cross on her uncovered breast. 'I thank thee, brother,' she exclaimed; 'it was possible to lose the cross of which thou hast despoiled me, but thou hast given me one I can lose only with my life.' She then spoke to all present with great force and unction, exhorting them to embrace the Faith as the only means of escaping eternal torments, infinitely more frightful than those she was to suffer.

"Their hearts, however, were untouched; she was tortured for three successive nights; then tied to the stake, and after being burnt for a considerable time, was scalped and forced to run till she fell beneath a shower of stones, which she received on her knees, for after running for some distance, she knelt to offer her life to God. Such is the account of her heroic death, given by the French prisoners, one of whom did all to alleviate her sufferings during her long martyrdom."

Among the Oneidas Father Milet, who, it will be remembered, had almost miraculously escaped a martyr's death, labored with increasing success. The people, in fact, began to like him, so much so that, though repeatedly requested to, they as often refused to turn him over to the mercies of the English. Negotiations, however, were successfully carried out with the French, the result being that Milet was returned to the settlement after having served a term of imprisonment extending over a period of five years. This transfer, or release, occurred in October, 1694, when also a term of peace was again concluded.

Less than a year of quiet was once more followed by renewed hostilities, during which the French, though overwhelming Onondaga and Oneida, and forcing from those people a definite treaty, lost a valuable ally in the death of the Iroquois chief, Totathiron. This sad event was followed by the death of Oureouharé, a Cayuga chief and another valuable friend to the cause of Christianity. On September 11, 1698, as a direct result of drunken passion and incendiarism, the Mission of the Mountain was totally destroyed, including fifty cabins, fifteen French residences or more, substantial and pretentious, and the beautiful and artistic church which had proved such an object of pride to the entire community. The palisades guarding all avenues of approach to the missions which had been carefully constructed of wood, were also a total loss. Notwithstanding the disheartening cause of this severe and most unnecessary misfortune, the projector of the original scheme, the philanthropic de Belmont, at once set to work to remedy it, building in place of the original structure a stone fort which was completed in 1698 at a cost of not less than 100,000 livres. One section of this structure was given for occupancy to the Congregation Sisters for school and residence purposes, who occupied the same as such until the removal of the Mission to Sault au Recollet. Within a year after its rebuilding, the Mission suffered a severe loss in the death of Sister Mary Theresa Ganneneagawas, grand-daughter of Francis Tehoronhiongo and one of Sister Burguoys' earliest and most promising pupils. This sad event occurred on September 25, 1695.

The year following, it was deemed advisable to divide this Mission, some sixty of the members having become addicted to an excessive use of liquor being sent to Sault au Recollet, where the Mission of Lorette was established. Another and similar installment was sent a few years later to the same place, so that there were not to exceed one hundred and twenty remaining at the Mountain Mission. In 1701 the Sisters removed to Sault au Recollet, where they took up work of a similar character to that which they had inaugurated at every former home. Three years later, the Mountain Mission was abandoned, the new one from that time being known as the Mission of the Annunciation.

The peace of Ryswyck, which was effected between France, England, the Netherlands and Spain in 1697, had the effect of ending all existing difficulties of an absolutely hostile character, and thereby gave rise to a hope in the breasts of the Jesuit Fathers that their labors might again be renewed among the Indian missions. But in endeavoring to carry out this most laudable desire, they met with many and most unexpected difficulties. The new Governor of the British Colonies, a haughty, arrogant, Irish peer, was a fanatic, and opposed to them, and, therefore, did all in his power to enforce a disaffection between the Indians and their former spiritual advisers. He even went so far as to secure the office of the Dutch pastor of Albany, who made occasional visits to the Mohawk country, but utterly failed in carrying out the pledges of Dongan as made, in which he agreed to furnish resident pastors at the missions in lieu of those he desired discarded.

But such indifference as that shown by Dellius but poorly comported with the vigorous and laboricus efforts of such men as Fremin, Bruyas and Boniface, to whom the Indians had long been accustomed. They were dissatisfied with the arrangements, and, therefore, turned to Canada for their remedy. At best, the new Governor Bellamont was a prejudiced, truculent, fanatic, and this very natural act on the part of the Indians warmed his ardor to such an extent that it absolutely became an ambition with him to oppress the Jesuits, to which end he drafted a bill for the Assembly intended to expel them from that territory, and thus deprive them of all those rights and privileges for which they had fought with such zealous persistency. By what in all decency may be designated as unlawful means, the bill was carried through, Bellamont making as a lame excuse for his unmanly attitude the statement that "Jesuit priests and Popish missionaries had lately come into, and for some time had had their residence in remote parts of the Province, to excite hostility against the English Government." This infamous bill enacted that any of that Order or calling found in the colony "after the first of November, 1700, be deemed an incendiary, disturber of the peace, and enemy of the Christian religion," condemning him to imprisonment for life, or, should he escape, to death, if again captured. Other ominous threats were made, heavy fines, and even the pillory, being awarded to such as should shelter one of the Order.

But in spite of this, and the continuous efforts of Bellamont to prevent, if possible, the arrangements of a peace understanding between the French and Iroquois, the latter after the death of Frontenac sent emissaries to St. Lawrence, requesting the return of Fathers Bruyas and de Lamberville (the older one), the latter at that time being in France. No immediate action was taken regarding this request, but on the arrival of a second embassy it was decided to send Father Bruyas, who, therefore, soon after departed for Onondaga, accompanied by Joncaire and Maricourt, who had already been adopted by the Iroquois.

This deputation arrived in safety at its destination, and after all the preliminary arrangements having been completed, a treaty of peace (the first written one) was duly signed on September 8, 1700, by representatives of all of the nations. Then Father Bruyas returned to the colony, but again visited Onondaga in 1701. At this time additional arrangements were effected so that upon his return to Montreal, accompanied by a number of French prisoners, a new treaty was signed, embracing as parties to it, not only the French and Iroquois, but the Abenaquis, Hurons, Illinois, Algonquins and Ottawas as well.

Thus matters rested until 1702, when an invitation was again extended to the missionaries and accepted, Fathers James de Lamberville and C. Valliant going out among the people of the Senecas and Onondagas. A subsequent war between France and England had no effect upon these missions, all remaining neutral, and thus avoiding the necessity of becoming belligerents on one side or the other. A little later they were strengthened by the arrival of Fathers James d'Heu and Peter de Mareuil, the good work continuing until the British finally succeeded in securing the allegiance of all but the Senecas in 1708. With the exception of de Mareuil, all of the missionaries went to Canada, while he, being unable to do so, was taken to Albany, where he received the most considerate treatment. The departure of the Missionary marked the downfall of a work which had been carried on at the cost of unparalleled sacrifice and suffering for nearly three quarters of a century, the almost initial effort in this direction being marked, as Shea puts it, "by Jogues in his blood."

"From time to time," Shea writes, "the Iroquois would join the sedentary missions, some of high rank. Teganissoren, whose eloquence charmed alike French, English and Indian, the upright and clear-headed chief, one of the noblest orators that the country had ever produced, came at last to embrace the Faith at Caughnawaga. Like Garacontié, he had ever been friendly to the French, for he easily saw that the power of religion was greater in Canada than in New York. Warned once against the Jesuits, he retorted: 'We know that the Black-gown favors his nation; but it is not in our power to change our affection for our brethren. We wish that you would bury all misunderstanding conceived on his account, and we, likewise, wish that you would give less credit to rum-carriers."

Some twenty years after the mission at Sault au Recollet had been established, naturally enough the country round about became dearth of game as well as unproductive, so that it was necessary as well as advisable for the people to look around for another location. At last they came upon and selected an admirable spot, the site being at a point along the St. Lawrence, situated at the extremity of the island of Montreal, where the river broadens to a very perceptible degree. It was even designated a lake—Lake of the Two Mountains—owing to a couple of elevations to which that dignity was ascribed. Near to this place, the new mission was established in 1720, the people at first erecting a large number of temporary bark cabins, not having definitely settled upon the permanent location of the fort. Finally, however, the original site[1] was decided upon.

Now followed a period of peace, the result of which was not altogether in keeping with what might have been expected. This peace was recognized in the treaty which was signed at Utrecht on April 11, 1713. In this treaty the pledge of France was given that the "crowns of France and Spain should at no time be united, and that no part of the Spanish Netherlands should ever be transferred to her; she also ceded to England Nova Scotia, New Foundland, Hudson Bay, and St. Kitt's, and agreed to destroy the fortifications of Dunkirk. Spain gave up her possessions in the Netherlands and in Italy to Austria (who on her part renounced her claim to the Spanish succession), and ceded Gibraltar and Minorca to England." But the effects of this peace upon the Catholic Indians was anything but gratifying, their principal danger ever consisting in indolence, which always brought in its train those coeval productions of its most improvident state, intoxication and immorality.

Under these conditions the missions were almost paralyzed by the actions of the people, many of whom plunged into one continuous round of dissipation and excess; not a few of them left their villages and removed to a new and distant one on the banks of the Muskingum, where amidst other associations they lapsed into their former condition of paganism. Still the missionaries labored on with unabated zeal, effecting many wonderful results from their tireless efforts. Among this number of heroic spirits to whose powerful physical endurance and absolute unselfishness was due much of the success accruing at this time, were the Sulpitian Fathers de Belmont and Francis Picquet.

The former, who had already become particularly noticeable for his tireless energy and unconquerable and indomitable will, was only in deacon's orders when he first arrived and opened his school at the Mountain Mission. To this work and that of converting the heathen of Canada he devoted his life, renouncing the world with its honors and pleasures to devote both talent and means to a cause affording little recompense other than the knowledge that he had done his duty according to the doctrines of his Faith and the needs of his fellowman. After serving for a number of years as a missionary, he became Superior of the Seminary of Montreal in 1699, remaining as such until the time of his death, which occurred on May 22, 1732.

(1) This was deemed by all so excellent a location that the original mission received a somewhat unexpected addition in a Nipissing and Algonquin settlement, which had already been partially located on the Isle aux Tortes by the Sulpitian Missionary René Charles de Breslay.

It may be said, further, in regard to this additional complement, that a grant of lands was made to the Sulpitian Order by the French King in 1718, the sole condition being that they build a church and a fort upon it. This work was delayed for one reason or another for some considerable period, in fact until 1733, when on the occasion of the Bishop's visit to the colony work was actually begun. Two years later a large church and fort, as well as a dwelling for the Sisters, were built, evidences of which remain to the present time.

Father Picquet was located at the Lake of the Two Mountains in 1740, where he carried on and completed the work on the fortification and other buildings of which something has already been said. Matters continued to run along in very nearly the same manner until 1744, when renewed difficulties broke out again between France and England, which were, and undoubtedly will at this time be better recognized under the name of the "Old French War."

Once the warlike spirit of the people was aroused, many of the men were anxious to take the field and show their capacity for hard and vigorous service. Thus they went forth, being attended in person by Father Picquet, this particular body serving under Marlin at the time when he attacked Fort Edward in 1745; and in fact through the entire campaign, as far as can be learned, until the signing of the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. After this Father Picquet, who was greatly interested in his work, and absorbed with a desire for the ultimate conversion of his people, proposed the idea of establishing a new Iroquois reduction further up the country towards the neighborhood of Lake Ontario, which might prove a central point of interest to the people of many of the cantons which abound in that vicinity. This plan he presented to the government, and it being acquiesced in by that arbitrary power, he started out in May of the last-named year, accompanied by Governor de la Jonquiere, for the purpose of locating a site. This was finally found at a point near to the mouth of the Soegatzy, or Oswegatchie, the present location of Ogdensburg.

Here, with everything necessary to their success, with a soil of great fertility, boundless expanses of magnificent timber land, and a beautiful and navigable harbor, they determined to establish themselves, and for that purpose constructed a rough stone house around which they built a crude fort to which the name of Fort Presentation was given. Quite a number of people gathered at this mission, but, unfortunate to relate, the buildings had hardly been completed when, in October, 1749, a party of Mohawk warriors swept down upon it, destroying everything in the settlement but Picquet's house. It was a most overwhelming loss, as the good Father had already invested over thirty thousand livres in the undertaking, nearly all of which was necessarily a total loss. But, undaunted even by such disaster, he immediately began to repair the damage, and so far succeeded that by the end of the same year he had six families residing there. This number was increased during the following twelve months to eighty-seven, gradually increasing until within a year or so the entire population numbered some three thousand souls, most of whom came from the country of the Cayugas and the Onondagas.

The month of May in the year 1752 was made noticeable by the arrival at this mission of the Bishop of Quebec, who on that occasion spent a number of days among these people, instructing them, and also baptizing one hundred and twenty. So the mission grew and prospered, obtaining an envious reputation for the great good which had been accomplished there, most of the credit for which very properly was given to the instigator of the undertaking, Father Picquet. Preceding the coming of the Bishop to this Mission, the reverend Missionary had made a tour of the cantons, in every instance being heartily welcomed; especially was this evidenced in the reception afforded him by the Senecas. Such an influence did this missionary obtain over the people, that some of them were even induced to forego their allegiance to the British authorities and associate themselves entirely with the French. None recognized this fact better than did Sir William Johnson, the English Commandant, who endeavored by every means in his power to thwart the effort of Father Picquet. To this end he, at a meeting of the six nations held at Onondaga in 1752, called openly upon the chiefs there assembled to "extinguish the fire at Oswegatchie," or, in other words, to disperse the Mission. To this they replied, "We do not conceive that we did much amiss in going thither when we observe that you white people pray; and we have no nearer place to learn to pray and have our children baptized."

Father Picquet had the distinction of being the very last of those missionary laborers who visited among the cantons from Canada. His way in this undertaking was made still more difficult by the contending passions then becoming so evident throughout Europe, and which ultimately, for the time at least, crushed out all hope of further effort being made on their part. Feeling this as he must have, yet he did not falter; but, on the contrary, in 1753 made a journey to France in order that he might obtain more assistance by which means he could still better attend to the large number of Christian Indians who were then looking to him for spiritual admonition and support. In the same year, then, he returned to Canada, two clergymen accompanying him.

The year following brought about renewed hostilities between France and England, which at last resulted in the loss of Canada to the former country. Throughout this conflict, the Catholic Iroquois stood steadfastly by the French and Canadian soldiery, aiding and assisting them by every means in their power to combat the victorious advance of the British foe. In stimulating the people to make desperate and obstinate resistance to these encroachments upon the French territory, Father Picquet was undoubtedly quite successful; probably the English had an inkling of this fact, as when the English officer offered a reward for his head the Indians of the Mission sent out a war party which stole upon the British camp, seized the officer, and led him in triumph to the Mission, where his life depended upon the mere say-so of the one he had desired to destroy.

"During this last contest," Shea says, "the Jesuits resolved to divide the Caughnawaga Mission, and remove some of the flock further from the dangers of Montreal. Karekowa, one of the Tarbells, had long been viewed with envy and jealousy by some of the native Caughnawagas. After many annoyances, he and his brother, with their families, resolved to remove, and headed the party sent from the Mission of the Rapids. Choosing Aquasasne—'the place where the partridge drums'—a plain east of a slight hill, at one of the few spots where the rapid-vexed river glides calmly by, they began the Mission of St. Francis Regis, and threw up a log cabin for the Jesuit Father Mark Anthony Gordon, who accompanied them, bearing as a precious treasure part of the relics of Catharine Tehgahkwita."

It was not long after this time, according to the same authority, that the end of the Mission came; Quebec having fallen. Picquet, whom we have already intimated had become non personae grata with the English, left the country somewhere about the 13th of May, 1760, and a month, at least, previous to the coming of the English and taking possession of the fort by them. Thus ended the laborious efforts of twelve years, during which period he had remained uninterruptedly among these people with singleness of purpose and greatest devotion, yielding his entire interests and time, his comforts and associations, in order that this great work might be fulfilled. This good man was born at Bourg, in Bresse, on the 6th of December, 1708. His powers of oratory were discovered at an early age, so that, having completed his divinity course at St. Sulpice, Paris, he at once joined the Congregation. He was first sent to Canada in 1733, his entire career, after a brief period spent in Montreal, being devoted to the Iroquois missions. He was regarded with greatest esteem by authorities both civil and ecclesiastical. On leaving the Mission to return to France, he was employed in active duties pertaining to his Order until the time of his death, which occurred at Verjon on the 15th of July, 1781.

Succeeding Father Picquet, came Peter Paul F. de la Garde, also a Sulpitian. This Mission, however, did not remain long under his care, as, being worried and wrought up in the active belligerency which followed, the Indians soon after joined forces with the English, and removed over into Canada. The Mission of St. Regis was at this time conducted by Father Gordon, who hereabouts had the misfortune to lose both chapel and contents by fire. However, he immediately set to work, and had the gratification of seeing a new frame structure, in which he continued to hold services until the time of his death, which occurred during the year 1777.

For some time subsequent to the death of its founder, the Mission remained without a resident pastor, having to depend entirely upon the attendance volunteered by neighboring priests. In December, 1785, however, a Scotch priest, the Rev. Roderic McDonnell, took up his home among the people of Aquasasne, and six years later erected a massive stone church at the mission. Here he remained administering to the spiritual wants of these people until 1806, in which year he died. It was not long after the death of Father McDonnell that his place and duties were assumed by the Rev. John Baptiste Roupe, during whose pastorship, writes Shea, war broke out between the United States and England; and as his flock lay on both sides of the line, he had the affliction of beholding them arrayed in two hostile parties. As the war advanced, his Indians were reduced to starvation, and subsisted only on the rations doled out to them by the American Comissariat. In these Roupé shared, but was condemned in Canada, and soon after made prisoner by the Americans, who attacked the village and seized him in his house.

The peace of 1673 had a disastrous effect upon many of the missions, as at its completion the annuities granted to them by the French Court became nullified, and they were thrown entirely upon their own resources. That of the Lake, it is said, "owed its preservation mainly to the generosity of the Sulpitian Margon de Terlaye, who gave ten thousand livres to the Sisters, and maintained them until his Congregation undertook their support." The work accomplished by these women was highly edifying, as under the inspiration of their own noble lives the Indians at the missions became urgent in their efforts to excel one another in deeds of zeal and charity. For instance, we are told that when, in the year 1765, the settlement of Montreal was laid in ashes by the disastrous conflagration leaving hundreds of people in absolute destitute circumstances, the Indians round about came to their assistance, selling their own, and in many instances highly-prized, belongings in order that they might afford some relief to the sufferers.

Since the time of the American War, there has been little of the eventful in these missions; Presentation Mission, having been utterly demoralized by the British stationed there, was located at Johnstown and lately at Indian Point (Lisbon), on the American side. Here a small village was established, consisting of some twenty-four families, which, however, separated in 1806-7, the people finally locating at Onondaga and St. Regis. At the same time the missions[1] of Caughnawaga, Canasadaga and St. Regis were in a most satisfactory condition, giving every evidence of the progressive methods under which they had been directed. Of the former of these three, it may be said that it advanced and prospered to such an extent that the old church, ill fitted for the demands put upon it, was replaced by a new and substantial building in 1845.

In 1843 a new cross was erected over the tomb of Catharine Tehgahkwita, in which were encased numerous relics of the holy Virgin of Caughnawaga. Of the incidents connected with the erection of this cross, our same authority tells us that "on Sunday, the 23d July, 1843, the Caughnawagas, headed by their missionary and chiefs, repaired to the little river portage near which their former church and village had stood, on a bluff between that little stream and the lordly St. Lawrence. The space on the left was soon filled by whites drawn thither by necessity or curiosity, alike of French and English origin. The banner of La Prairie and the pennons of the Sault floated above the crowd on either side of the highly adorned cross, at the foot of which was a painting of the Christian heroine. At the signal given by the discharge of artillery on the right and left, the clergy in procession advanced into the center, chanting the 'Vexilla Regis.' At another discharge, Father Felix Martin, one of the Jesuits to whom it was given to return to the land enriched by the sweat and blood of his Society, rose to address the assembled throng in French. Then, after a hymn in Iroquois, the Rev. Joseph Marcoux, the pastor of the tribe, pronounced a discourse in the guttural language of his flock, and gave place to the Rev. Hyacinth Hudon, Vicar-General of Montreal, who delivered a third address in English, and then performed the ceremony of blessing the cross. That sign of faith was then slowly raised amid the chants of the church, the thunder of the cannon and the mingled shouts of men of many climes and races, who, differing in language, bowed to the symbol of a common faith.

"Such is the history of the Iroquois Mission, on which we have dwelt longer because its annals have reached us in a more complete form, and because of all the early missions it presents at this day the most numerous and thriving communities.

"Sault St. Louis or Caughnawaga, formerly a seigniory in the hands of the Jesuits, now contains about twelve hundred souls, many of them half-breeds, and some whites taken captive long years ago. They support themselves by tillage, raising chiefly maize, by the manufacture of baskets, mats, sleds, moccasins, and other Indian articles, and by the pilotage of vessels, and essentially of rafts, over the rapids. Their village is irregular, unpaved, and not indeed very tidy, though some of the houses are well built and comfortable. They have a fine church, built a few years ago on the site of the former one; the old parsonage still remains, with the chamber where Charlevoix and Lafitau wrote, and many books and manuscripts of Bruyas and his companions. They have also a capacious school-house, and possess indeed every advantage enjoyed by the whites. The present pastor, the Rev. Joseph Marcoux, has been for forty years attached to the Iroquois missions, and since 1819 established at Sault St. Louis. This long intercourse with the tribe has rendered him the most thorough master of their language that ever lived; and Tharonhiakanere, mindful of his successors, had composed a full and clear grammar of the language, and two dictionaries—one in French with Iroquois interpretations, the other giving the French of the Iroquois words —as well as catechisms and prayer-books. These noble works rank with Chaumonot, Bruyas, de Carheil and Zeisberger, who had previously composed similar but less complete works on the same language or its dialects. His missionary labors, at first checkered with much opposition and difficulty, have succeeded to his wishes, and the people of his parish are now sober, moral and not ungrateful for his care."

The somewhat peculiar location of the Mission of St. Regis, or Aquasasne, was such that part of it rested on American and part on British soil. This often created an untoward condition of affairs, as not a few, taking advantage of the situation, endeavored to introduce new and unauthorized notions among the people. One instance will prove sufficient: Eleazer Williams, son of Thomas Williams, having been educated in the schools of New England, returned to Caughnawaga in 1812 as a member of the American Board of Missions, and three years later endeavored to establish an Episcopal church and school at St. Regis. Having made a dismal failure of the effort, he then went as a missionary among the Oneidas at Green Bay, but at a later date returned, making further pretentious efforts of a most absurd character. A church and pastoral residence were also built at St. Regis by the Methodists, who thus endeavored to break through the bonds of Catholicity with which the Indians had been most thoroughly imbued through the efforts and example of the martyr Jogues and his successors. But the undertaking was not successful. This was in 1847, at which time the pastor in charge of the mission was the Rev. Francis Marcoux, the entire settlement under his spiritual dominion numbering eleven hundred souls.

(1) These missions have even attracted attention abroad. In 1826 Joseph Torakaron, one of the Tarbells, visited Europe, and was presented to Charles X., king of France, and to his Holiness Pope Leo XII., who then occupied the See of St. Peter. Both received most kindly the descendant of the Puritans, the descendant, too, of the Iroquois Catholics, who had never swerved in their fidelity to their religion, nor, indeed, in their fidelity to France, so long as France was true to herself.

The King bestowed on the Church three paintings for the churches —one of St. Louis, now at Caughnawaga, and the others at St. Francis Xavier and St. Francis Regis, still at St. Regis. His Holiness added a collection of books, a silver service for the altar, and a jeweled rosary. With these valuable presents, the chief returned to America, but at New York was robbed by his companion and interpreter of all the money of which he was the bearer, and indeed of everything but the paintings and rosary.—Shea.

The Lake of the Two Mountains Mission, or Canasadaga, as it was also known, was at this time represented by two villages occupied respectively by the Algonquins and Iroquois, who are still, we are told, "as distinct in language and manners as their ancestors were in the days of Cartier or Champlain." Towards the middle of the present century, there were then in the neighborhood of three thousand Catholic Iroquois, the remainder, with the exception of a few Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Methodists, being pagans.

Of other tribes at this time Shea says: "Some Oneidas and Onondagas, with a considerable number of Senecas and Tuscaroras, remained in New York; the Mohawks, with many of the cantons, are in Upper Canada; some Oneidas in Wisconsin, and some Senecas in Indian Territory. When the Catholic missionaries were expelled, some effort was made by the authorities in New York to convert the Mohawks to Anglicanism, and many, led by Brant, became members of the Church of England. The Moravian Zeisberger attempted in vain a mission at Onondaga, and Pyrlaeus another at the Mohawk. The civilized Oneidas were visited by New England missionaries, and were finally gained by the Methodists, while some of the same tribe at Green Bay are Episcopalians; missions of various sects were begun among the Senecas and Tuscaroras, but a powerful party here and at Onondaga are still pagans, and celebrate their heathen rites amid the city-studded realm of New York."

Here, then, we will refrain from further reference to the Iroquois mission, which has been hastily, though we hope intelligently, outlined from the settlement of Canada by the French down to a period within the distinct recollection of many who are still living.

BEFORE proceeding to a brief review of the early Missions in Michigan and Wisconsin, there is still another to which, though of subsequent origin, it will be necessary in this instance at least to give the precedence. Illinois, the territory here referred to, was at the time of which we write populated by two kindred nations, each of which consisted of numerous clans, all of whom spoke the Algonquin tongue. These nations were the Illinois and Miamis, the former being represented in the Peorias, Cahokias, Tamaroas, Kaskaskias and Monigwena, while the latter had for their lesser organizations the Piankeshaw, Pepikokia, Kilatak and Wea tribes. These nations, though once powerful and populous, have since become merged into others or almost entirely disappeared, the cause for such noticeable depreciation being undoubtedly more due to the radical change in environment than anything else, as their personal differences with the whites were but few and immaterial.

Among these Indians the missionaries labored faithfully and well, winning a large majority of them to a consistent and enduring faith in the Christian religion. When first these people were mentioned in connection with the labors of the missionary fathers, the Illinois are said to have occupied both sides of the Mississippi River, while the Miamis dwelt in the territory immediately contiguous to the southern shore of Lake Michigan and reaching also eastward to those of Lake Erie. Of the first meeting of the Illinois with one of these zealous emissaries of the true faith, Shea says: "The Illinois first met the missionary of Christ at Chequamegon, where Father Allouez planted in 1667 his first Ottawa Mission. Here, too, his successor, the illustrious Marquette, received visits from straggling parties, projected a mission, and from one of the tribe learned the language of the Illinois. War defeated his design, and drove him to Mackinaw. When Allouez at a later date ascended the Fox River and passed the Kakalin Rapid, he came to the motley town of the Mascoutins, where a number of Illinois and Miamis resided with the Mascoutins and Kickapoos, all gathered in the same village, although the Illinois were about to remove to the banks of their own river. Later still, Marquette was enabled to realize his fond project of exploring the great river of the West and founding the Illinois Mission. Following the track of the adventurous Allouez, he reached the Mascoutins, but there were no Illinois there. Crossing a short portage, he embarked on the Wisconsin in the name of the blessed Virgin Immaculate. His canoe glided on and at last, on the 17th of June, 1673, shot into the calm transparent waters of the Mississippi, to which, as he had promised, he gave the name of Conception River. His wish was not realized there—the Indian name prevails—but Mary, under the title of her Immaculate Conception, is the patroness of our whole wide republic. Long sailed he on, with no witness to his way but the birds and the beasts of the plains, till he at last descried a trail on the shore leading to the Illinois towns of Peoria and Moingwena. These he visited, meeting a kindly welcome, and promising them to return. As is well known, he then pursued his voyage, passing the Missouri and Ohio till he reached the Arkansas, when, convinced that the river emptied into the Gulf of Mexico, he returned in consequence of an Indian report that the Spaniards were not far off. Ascending, he passed the Missouri, and entering the Illinois, met the Peorias on its bank and spent three days preaching in all their cabins. After baptizing a child among them, he reached the Kaskaskias, not far from Rockfort. Like all of the other Illinois clans, they received him joyfully, and earnestly entreated him to remain. He promised to return and begin a mission, and after a short stay, doubtless spent in announcing the Word of God, he returned to Green Bay by way of Lake Michigan.

"Such was the first incidental mission among the Illinois, of which the only result was the preparation of the field for the Gospel, passing instructions, and the baptism of a single child, whose soul ere the good missionary embarked had soared regenerate on high to open in the realms of bliss the place of the elect of the Illinois."

On his return Marquette is said to have arrived at Green Bay towards the end of September, 1673, from which place some writers insist he went to Mackinaw. However, from the facts in our possession, it is unquestionably true that the summer of the following year was spent by him at Green Bay, where he experienced much exhaustion and suffering, the result of his arduous and protracted labors. Still inspired to fulfill his pledge, he obtained permission to return to the country of the Illinois, embarking for that purpose on the 30th of March and arriving at the settlement of the Kaskaskias on the 8th of April following. Here he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy by these poor people, who vied with one another in their efforts to show their great appreciation of his return.

Here his life immediately became a busy one, a momentary cessation of pain or seeming renewal of physical vigor enabling him to actively pursue the work he had undertaken. One of the first things he did was to raise an altar, and Shea remarks, "as true a Knight to Mary as chivalry ever produced displayed on every side pictures of that mother of all purity who was to purify and elevate a land sunk in all horrid vice. At least two thousand men with women and children," continues this writer, "were grouped around, and with the breathless attention of the Indian, all listened to the pale and wasted missionary, who spoke his heart to them on the mystery of the Cross. And still their wonder grew as they beheld him offer up on his sylvan altar the holy sacrifice of the Mass on the very day when, more than sixteen centuries before, the God he preached had instituted it in the upper room at Jerusalem. Thus, on Maunday Thursday was possession taken of Illinois in the name of Catholicity, of Jesus and Mary."

Father Marquette remained working industriously among these people until about the middle of April, when, feeling his strength fast failing him, he prepared to return to the mission at Mackinaw, where he might receive the solace of the Church and kindly attention of the brethren. It is needless, perhaps, to dwell upon the sadness of a parting the eternal duration of which was made manifest to the people by the noticeably weakened and deplorable physical condition of the missionary. Fortunately, however, the mission, though receiving a severe shock at his loss, was not destined to succumb. A wise and all-seeing Providence had seemingly provided for the necessity in the person of Father Allouez, an earnest and ardent laborer in the missionary field, and founder of many of the Western missions, who was chosen as the proper successor of Marquette. On this duty bent, he started forth during the month of October, 1676, managing, after a somewhat difficult passage and protracted rest in winter quarters on the way, to reach Chicago in the following spring. There he fell in with a band of Illinois, some eighty in number, who acted as his guides and guard to Kaskaskia, where he arrived April 27th. Here, surrounded by those who had loved, honored and obeyed his predecessor, he made immediate preparations to carry on the work already so successfully begun. In this he was eminently successful, extending, in fact, the jurisdiction already obtained by Father Marquette.

Here for some time he labored with evident and gratifying success, so much so, in fact, that when urgently requested by the natives to do so, he finally concluded to yield to their demands and establish a permanent mission in their midst. "In this," says Shea, "he acted unwisely, as events prove. His mission was never to be permanently established in his life-time. He himself was driven from the Illinois and his enemies who called the cross[1] a stick, boasted that those whom he had baptized[2] were growing up in idolatry."

After remaining for a short time at Kaskaskia, Allouez returned to Mackinaw with a view to completing arrangements for his return and permanent establishment among the Illinois. The journey accomplished and plans all satisfactorily perfected, he again set forth for his chosen field of labor, in 1678, his intention being to remain with these people for two years. Unfortunately, however, incidents transpired which made it impossible to carry out the scheme as proposed. Not only did the ferocious and all-conquering Iroquois begin to infest this country, committing numerous depredations among the cantons and placing the mission in momentary danger, but in the year following his return to that country the explorer La Salle,[3]

(1) It was on the feast of the Invention of the Holy Cross, May 3, that he reared a cross some twenty-five feet in height in the center of the village.

(2) At the time of establishing this Mission Allouez baptized thirty-five infants and one adult.

(3) He also refused to form any relation with the Senecas until they had dismissed their resident missionary, Father Garnier, from the council lodge.

Of the further progress of discovery in this vicinity Shea says: "Meanwhile La Salle reached the village in December, but it was empty—all had gone some distance down the river to hunt buffalo. He came to colonize the West and accumulate wealth by a monopoly of the fur trade. The Illinois River was to see the first of his posts arise. Possessed of great influence with Indian tribes, he now sought to win the Illinois. Descending with the current, his flotilla arrayed for battle, came by a turn in the river into the midst of the Illinois camp at the head of Peoria Lake on the first day in the year 1680. As soon as confidence was restored La Salle entered into friendly relations with the tribe, and began a fort on a rising ground. Misfortunes had meanwhile checquered his who bore a bitter personal animosity to the Jesuits, also came, making it impossible for the Missionary to longer remain in that locality. So he withdrew to the country of the Mascoutins, where he awaited the proper time and fitting opportunity to return to his original labors.

As previously stated, although particularly given to speculation, La Salle had a proper consideration for religious observances, and hence numbered among his associates and followers several members of the Order of St. Francis, Father Gabriel de la Ribourde[1], first Superior of the Order upon their return to the colony, and Fathers Zenobius Membre and Louis Hennepin. Of these the first two immediately started a mission among the Indians, but Hennepin,[2] who preceded La Salle to the West, never again returned to that country.

Ribourde and Membre were received with much satisfaction by the people, the former, in spite of his advanced age, entering readily upon a thorough study of their language. To both of these zealous men the surroundings were entirely new, this, in fact, being the first missionary work attempted by them. Nor did they enter upon this undertaking without many misgivings, being somewhat discouraged with the general condition of affairs which they imagined, or had been prompted to believe, were of an entirely different and more advanced character. Father Membre, who was entirely devoted to the cause, at once took up his residence in the cabin of the chief Oumahouha, that he might the more readily obtain a knowledge of the ways and customs of the aborigines as well as perfect himself in the language, with which he was almost entirely unacquainted.

The work was slow and laborious, the good missionary becoming disgusted as well as disheartened with the evidences of brutality and paganism by which he was surrounded. Possibly the words of those who had preceded him, whose measure of success he had gauged by the enthusiasm exhibited in their reports, had mislead him into the belief that he was about to enter upon his priestly duties among a people not only thoroughly Christianized, but also alive to many of the amenities of civilized life. Here, on the contrary, however, as Shea expressed it, he had to learn by experience that one or two conversions a year were really a splendid triumph. His actual success in meeting the general circumstances was, in fact, so limited that he lost heart and began to doubt his own capacity for the work, and ability to carry out the scheme to which he had devoted himself entirely. Having, therefore, baptized a few infants and two or three adults, he went to a Miami village with the hope of finding a more fruitful field in which to operate, but again met with disappointment. Then additional troubles came upon him; for in the fall the Iroquois again descended upon the Illinois, who, unprepared to make suitable defense, made a precipitate flight, leaving the missionaries to manage as best they could for themselves. In company with Tonty, who had also been deserted by a large number of his men, Fathers Ribourde and Membre made a desperate attempt to reach Green Bay. So they embarked in a dilapidated canoe in which, without provisions, they endeavored to make the perilous voyage. On the second day of the journey their canoe became so badly injured that they were compelled to land, in order that the necessary repairs to it might be made. It was here that Father Gabriel met with an untimely death.

Leaving the others busily employed in repairing the damaged craft, he went to a neighboring grove to say his breviary, and while thus engaged was set upon by a number of Kickapoos, who killed him and threw his body into a convenient hole near by, not, however, before they stripped him of whatever seemed to them of value upon his person. Noticing his protracted absence, the others soon after made an extended search, but being unable to discover the slightest trace of him, proceeded sadly on their way, and after experiencing much suffering and many dangers, finally reached the mission at Green Bay, where they were received with the utmost kindness and consideration. At a somewhat later date, Father Membre was accompanied by Father Enjalron, then located at Green Bay, to Michillimackinac, at which place Father Hennepin preceded them.

Of the martyred Ribourde it is further known that he had, when quite advanced in years, renounced the comforts and refinements of his European home for a life in the new colony. He came to that country in 1670, and soon after his arrival was made Superior of the Order. At a later date he was sent by his successor to Fort Frontenac, from whence he was induced path. His vessel, the first to ply the waters of Erie, Huron and Michigan, had foundered; faithless agents had plundered his stores; and he now set out for Niagara across the unknown region on Lake Erie, leaving the Chevalier de Tonty, his lieutenant, in command of the new fort.

Although La Salle's object was purely a mercantile speculation, he was not indifferent to religion."

It was the purpose of La Salle to follow up the discoveries of Joliet and Marquette in their Mississippi voyage, and to ascertain by descending to the mouth whether that stream disembogued into the Vermillion Sea (Gulf of California), Gulf of Mexico, or was indeed the long-sought medium of communication with Japan and China—the Cipango and Cathay of Marco Polo. In the ship that bore the adventurer to New France were the materials for building a vessel to navigate the lakes. Artisans skilled in such construction had also been brought along.—Henry E. Legler.

It was de Tonty, whom he had left in charge of his new fort, upon whose shoulders also fell the responsibility of completing the new vessel, a work of unusual magnitude, when taking into consideration the fact that, besides internal dissensions of unpromising and even dangerous nature, the Senecas also watched with a vigilant and unfavorable eye the progress of a work which meant a loss to the Western fur trade, an industry heretofore monopolized by them.

(1) This aged priest was the last of an old Burgundian family.

(2) Father Hennepin left the fort with two men in a canoe, intending to ascend the Mississippi River. He descended the Illinois River to its mouth, and then, after traveling for several weeks along the Mississippi, at last, in the spring of the year, was captured by a large war party of the Sioux. He and his companions were held prisoners by these people for several months, but finally rescued by Daniel Greysolon du Lhut, under whose protection he finally reached Green Bay in safety. Hennepin is also supposed to have been in the neighborhood of Albany in 1677, at which place he was invited to take up his residence as spiritual adviser to a number of Catholics who had located there.

by Father Hennepin to join La Salle. His death occurred in September, 1680, in the seventieth year of his age and fortieth of his religious career.

The incident related virtually closed the Recollect Mission in the Illinois country, although some two years later Father Zenobius again passed through there with La Salle, but without making any effort to reorganize the mission. In 1683 the fort, which in the meantime had gone into disuse, was restored by Tonty, who, void of the unjust suspicions which had hampered the judgment of La Salle, welcomed the return of the zealous Allouez to that section of the country. This energetic and faithful worker returned to his former field of labor accompanied by Durantays in 1684, remaining there in active service until 1687, when upon the return of a portion of La Salle's expedition he again retired to Wisconsin. It was in the same year that Father James Gravier came and conducted a short mission among the Illinois.

The actual successor of Allouez in this particular field was Father Sebastian Rale, who left Quebec for that purpose in August, 1691, reaching his destination in the spring of the following year. Of the spiritual condition of these people at this time the reverend missionary did not seem to have the most exalted opinion; for in spite of the warmth and affectionate regard with which he was received by them he was led to exclaim: "There would have been less difficulty in converting the Illinois if the prayer had permitted polygamy among them. They acknowledged that the prayer was good, and were delighted to have their wives and children instructed; but when we broached the subject to the men, we found how difficult it was to overcome their inconstancy, and induce them to adhere to a single wife. There are none, even of the medicine men, of course the worst enemies of religion, who do not send their children to be instructed and baptized."

After remaining for a couple of years at this mission, during which time religious services were held with the greatest regularity, Father Rale returned to his home among the Abenaquis, being succeeded among the Illinois by his erstwhile predecessor, Father Gravier. To this Missionary belongs the credit of having been the first to thoroughly analyze the language of these people and compile a grammar, thus firmly establishing a literary basis, as it were, from which all future developments accrued. In his actual work as a missionary, however, Father Gravier was less successful, meeting with considerable opposition at the hands of the medicine men. In spite of the danger, he manfully remained at his post doing as best he could, and actually accomplishing much for the spiritual enlightenment of those placed in his care.

The mission in which Father Gravier's most active operations were conducted was in the vicinity of the French fort, within which structure the first Catholic chapel had been erected. Some time after, however, he built a new chapel elsewhere, and at a point more convenient for the Indians to attend. Of those under his immediate charge the Peorias were noticeably fervent, conducting with persistent vigor the services of the church when the pastor was unavoidably absent or otherwise detained. This most satisfactory condition, however, was not accomplished without much opposition on the part of the principal chief of the tribe, who also, as a medicine man, and with the aid of numerous associates, did everything possible to alienate the Christians from their pledges to the new faith. "During the same year, however," Shea tells us, "Ako, apparently the companion of Father Hennepin in his voyage on the Mississippi, married Mary, the daughter of the chief of the Kaskaskias, and this, although at first the source of great persecution to Father Gravier, became in the end a great help to the Mission." The story of the incident is given by this authority as follows:

"When Ako sought her in marriage, far from being flattered with the prospect of a union with a Frenchman, she told her parents that she did not wish to marry; that she had already given her heart to God, and could not share it with another. This she repeated when they all proceeded to the chapel, and there Gravier told her that she was free to marry or not as she chose. Deeming Gravier her adviser, Ako and the chief resolved to drive him to perform the ceremony or leave the place. The chief stripped his daughter and drove her from his cabin; then convening a council of the chiefs of the four nearest villages, he declared against the Missionary, and easily induced them to issue an order forbidding the women and children to go to the chapel. Regardless of this order, fifty Peorias and some Kaskaskias came to prayers, and the intrepid missionary, as usual, traversed the village to summon them at the accustomed hour. Finding this first step useless, the chiefs next blocked up the paths to prevent all from going; but as even then some by a circuitous path reached the chapel, the chief, tomahawk in hand, marched into the chapel during prayers, and in a menacing tone ordered all to leave. Gravier ordered him in turn to retire; and as the faithful Christians remained firm, the intruder was compelled to withdraw. Such an outrage in the house of God was, the Missionary deemed, too grave to let pass; he applied to the Commandant of the French fort, but was himself overwhelmed with reports and accusations in the very presence of the Indians. Thus left exposed to every violence, the Missionary could but mourn in secret over the blindness which had aroused such a storm. Meanwhile, the poor Illinois maiden, finding that her father had threatened to use all his efforts against religion if she persisted, repaired to Gravier. Earnest as was her desire to lead a life of virginity, she trembled to see herself and her tribe deprived of a pastor. 'Father!' she exclaimed, 'I have a thought, and I know not whether it is good. I believe that if I consent to the marriage, my father will listen to you, and induce all to do so. I desire to please God, and would wish to remain as I am to be agreeable to Christ; but I have thought of consenting against my inclination for love of Him. Will this be right?' The missionary, moved at her piety, approved her thought; but bade her tell her parents distinctly that she did not yield to their menaces, but simply because she hoped that by marrying a Christian she could more easily gain them to Christ.

"This she did, and consented to become the wife of Michel Ako (also d'Acau, the prefix being granted by the king on account of his having been a member of La Salle's expedition), more a victim than a bride. On this her father submitted, and publicly disavowed all that he had said against the Black-gown. After her marriage her life was of the greatest purity and virtue. By her example and exhortations she soon converted her husband, whose profligacy had been notorious. Reverses overtook him, and his only consolation in the general odium raised against him was the practice of his religion and the society of his devoted wife."

Of this remarkable character it has further been said that her great virtue had a powerful influence with the members of the tribe, while even her father's position as chief was beautified and strengthened through the same means. In addition to this, we are told that her zealous efforts finally resulted in the conversion of both of her parents, the Sachem in the presence of the Missionary and assembled chiefs of the nation openly renouncing all pagan beliefs and superstitions, and urging them also to embrace the new faith. Thus assisted by those most in authority and opposed by but few, the work of the Missionary progressed with the utmost fervor and satisfaction. This story of success, of course, pertains more particularly to the Kaskaskias, the Peorias being more obdurate as a rule. This perhaps may have been largely due to the fact that he was unable to give them as much of his time as was needful for more pronounced and successful results. He was alone, in fact, with these numerous and somewhat widely scattered people, and although a majority of those among whom he had worked were faithful to the new religion, there were but few of them in a condition fitted to render him material assistance in the conversion of their fellows.

It was either in the beginning of the year 1699 or soon after that Father Gravier was recalled to Mackinaw, being succeeded in charge of the Illinois mission by Father Julian Binneteau, who some six years previously was engaged in missionary work in Maine, and in 1694 was located at the St. Lawrence. He was accompanied by Father Francis Pinet, founder of the Tamaroa mission. Of Father Gravier's further connection with the Illinois we learn that in the year 1700 he was somewhere near the mouth of the Mississippi River, anxiously awaiting the arrival of vessels from France, by which he expected a supply of articles necessary for the continuance of his work.

Meantime a route had been opened between Fort Biloxi and the country of the Illinois, which brought into closer communication the missionaries in charge of the various settlements throughout that section of the country. Of these Father Lymoges, at that time with the Omahas in the Lower Mississippi country, in all probability made a journey up in company with Gravier. Then there were Fathers Pinet, Bovie and Marest. Of these Pinet died in 1704, while Bovie, and it is believed Lymoges, were called to other fields of action. Gravier, however, returned to his mission, laboring with unabated vigor, until in a disturbance aroused by the medicine-men of the Peorias, who were ill-disposed towards him, he was dangerously wounded. Here his services virtually ended, as suffering intensely from the aggravated condition of his wound, he left the mission for Mobile, at which place he arrived on January 17, 1706. The additional strain caused in the tedious journey thus necessitated had a most exasperating effect upon a constitution already weakened by privation and exposure, so that in spite of all precautions and the kindly services of those among whom he had come, he finally succumbed, dying but a short time after arriving there.

The active missionary force among the Illinois had now from one cause or another been reduced to two, Fathers Marest and James Mermet, and with the extensive field already opened before them, it is almost superfluous to remark that they found themselves entirely inadequate to the occasion. But they were by no means to be left in this condition for any considerable period, the tenets of the order to which they belonged forbidding any such undesirable lapse in the work to which had already been devoted the lives of so many Christian and scholarly men. The means to this end found its origin in the Seminary of Foreign Missions at Paris, and was originally inaugurated from a Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

A shining light among the earlier members of this original Order was the Vicar-General of Quebec, Francis J. de Montigny, who in 1699, accompanied by Antoine Davion, arrived at Biloxi. It was not long before others followed, and soon the work once more assumed a condition of prosperity and hopefulness, commensurate with the efforts of the many noble minds who had preceded in the conduct of these missions. The first to take active part in this regenerative movement was Mr. John Bergier, a priest of the Seminary of the Foreign Missions, who arrived at the country of the Illinois somewhere about the year 1704. The life undertaken was entirely new to him, and it was not long before he found himself face to face with conditions of the most perplexing character. Fortunately, however, he was a man of both sensible and aggressive methods, so that, although an effort was made to materially injure the interest of the Church under his dominion, he at last succeeded in obtaining a grasp upon the situation, and restoring peace and content to the community which had been placed in his charge. Unfortunately at about this time he was attacked with a serious illness, so that, unable to properly conduct the business of the mission, he was compelled to call for assistance, which came in the person of Father Marest, at that time located at Kaskaskia. Having somewhat recovered, he again took charge of the work, but so enfeebled had he become that it was not long before he suffered from a relapse which resulted in his death on July 16, 1710.

There were at this time two principal missions in the Illinois country, one being located at Kaskaskia Tamaroa. In addition to these, Father Mermet was acting as chaplain of a French post then recently established on the Ohio, in the neighborhood of which were a large number of Mascoutins.

Of the Peorias, among whom the devoted Gravier had received his death wound, but little was known at this time, they having been cut off from the benefits of trade with the French as a punishment for their brutal treatment of the Missionary. Some years after that event, however, that is in 1711, Father Marest visited them, the chiefs making this the occasion of renewed and earnest supplications for recognition by the French, and promising to disavow entirely the idolatrous teachings of the medicine-men, and listen only to and obey those uttered by the Missionary, whom they prayed might be sent to live among them. So much impressed did the reverend Missionary become with the sincerity of their appeal, that he promised to take up his abode among them upon his return from Mackinaw, to which place he was then on his way. The pledge he was only in part enabled to fulfill, as finding it impossible to do as promised, he sent de Ville, a man of much zeal and talent to reëstablish the mission.

In addition to the missions already referred to, there was one on the St. Joseph's River, composed of a mixture of Miamis and Pottawattomies, which Father Allouez superintended for a short time. In this charge he was succeeded by Father John B. Chardon, a man of great patience, endurance and ability.

Besides these missions already actively engaged, the place of Father Bergier at Tamaroa was also soon after occupied by Dominic Mary Varlet, a doctor of Sorbonne, whose subsequent career, Shea says, was a scandal to the Church. "For nearly six years," continues this authority, "he was a zealous and laborious missionary among the Illinois, but on his return to Europe, where he was raised to the Episcopacy as Coadjuter of Babylon in 1718, he avowed his Jansenistical doctrines, became the head of the Schismatic Church of Utrecht, and died interdicted, deposed and excommunicated by three successive popes."

Of his daily life among the Kaskaskias at this time, Marest says: "Early in the morning we assemble the catechumens in the church, where they say prayers, receive an instruction and sing some hymns; then the catechumens retire and Mass is said for the Christians, who sit, as in all Indian churches, the two sexes on different sides. Then follow morning prayers and an instruction, after which they disperse to their several avocations."

Following this service the Missionary's time was devoted in visiting among those who suffered from bodily ailment, or such as might need spiritual comfort and enlightenment. In the evening the chapel was again filled by anxious and fervent worshipers. This was the ordinary daily life experienced among these people, while still greater time was devoted by them to religious exercises on Sundays and holydays.

In 1721 the Illinois missions were visited by Father Charlevoix, and it is at about the same time we note with regret that the missions of the Peorias over which de Ville had presided since the departure of Gravier had again virtually lapsed into a state of paganism. Of the actual condition of the missions then in active existence, consisting of those of the Cahokias and Tamaroas, in charge of priests of the Foreign Missions, and the Kaskaskias, Peorias and Metchigameas, which were directed by the Jesuits, but little further can be said save that they had passed into the hands of others than those with whose names and labors we have already become quite familiar. That of Cahokia was located at a small stream about a mile distant from the Mississippi, and was composed of two tribes. This mission at the time of which we speak was in charge of Fathers Dominic Taumur de la Source and le Mercier, both of whom had been pupils of Father Charlevoix at Quebec in years gone by. The mission at Kaskaskia was in two sections, one located some half a league above old Fort Chartres, being in charge of Father Joseph Ignatius le Boulanger, while the second, under the direction of Father John Charles Guymonneau, was located some six miles inland. At one time or another, Fathers de Kerelen and de Beaubois were also associated with these missions. It was about this time that Illinois became subject to the government of Louisiana, the Superior of the Jesuits at New Orleans superintending the missions belonging to that people. Thenceforth missionaries appointed to different locations in Illinois came there by way of the Mississippi, the journey being accomplished in 1725 by Fathers le Burboi and de Ville, and two years later by Fathers Dumas, Tartarin and Doutreleau. In connection with these changes the fact, however, must not be lost sight of, that Father le Boulanger still remained Superior of the Illinois Mission, while the direction of that of the Miamis was in the immediate charge of Father C. M. Mesaiger.

Among the chiefs of the nation most noticeable for piety and actual purity of life was Chicago, who not only made numerous journeys to New Orleans on behalf of his people, but also visited France, where, being of an observant nature, he learned many things of interest and value. Another chief, Mamantouensa, Shea tells us, was not inferior to him in these remarkable qualities. "Seeing the Ursulines with their pupils, he exclaimed to one, 'I see you are not nuns without an object. You are like our fathers, the Black-gowns; you labor for others. Ah! if we had three or four of you, our wives and daughters would have more sense, and be better Christians.' 'Well,' said the Mother Superior, 'choose any that you like.' 'It is not for me to choose,' replied the truly Christian chief, 'it is for you who know them; for the choice should fall on those who are most attached to God and who love him most.'"

As a further evidence, if such be necessary, of the exalted and extremely favorable condition of the missions at this time, we quote from the personal impressions of an officer of the French Marine in Louisiana, who writes: "Nothing is more edifying for religion than the conduct and unwearied zeal with which the Jesuits labor for the conversion of these tribes. There are now Illinois, Apalache, even Choctaw Christians. Picture to yourself a Jesuit missionary as a hero, four hundred leagues away in the depth of the forest, without comforts or supplies, often with no resources but the liberality of men who know not God, obliged to live like them, to pass whole years with no tidings of their country, with men human only in figure, without relief or society in the hour of sickness, constantly exposed to perish alone or fall by the hand of violence. Yet this is the daily life of these Fathers in Louisiana and Canada, where many have shed their blood for their faith."

But events were to follow by means of which these edifying conditions were to be materially jeopardized, and the fruitful evidences of years of arduous labor and momentous struggle crushed almost entirely out of existence. Disaffections of a material and dangerous character in Louisiana mortally affected the interests of the entire territory comprising the valley of the Mississippi. So badly, in fact, was the cause of religion affected by this unhappy condition, that in 1750 there were but two missions in active operation in the country of the Illinois, both of which were conducted by Jesuit Fathers. In one of these missions there were some six hundred Indians, whose spiritual direction was in the hands of Fathers Francis Xavier de Guienné and Louis Vivier, while the other and smaller one was maintained by Father Sebastian Louis Meurin.

In addition to this, there was a Miami mission, which, never having been subject to the jurisdiction of Louisiana, still flourished under the spiritual direction of Father John Baptiste Lamorinie, while at a site near to the present town of Lafayette Father Pierre du Jaunay conducted a mission of the Weas. The power of the Jesuit missions was still farther depreciated when, in 1762, the center of the mission at New Orleans had been suppressed, ,and part of the property owned by that Order in Illinois disposed of by the French Government.

But the fathers still remained in the territory to which so much of their time and energy had been devoted, after the suppression of their Order in 1773, serving as secular priests under the authority of the Bishop of Quebec. Thus Vivier, Gagnon, Meurin and numerous others ended their lives' work, while Father Peter Potier, last of the Order in the West, and who resided at St. Joseph's in 1751, visited throughout that country until the time of his death, which occurred at Detroit in 1781.

Then came a succession of periods when the territory occupied by the Illinois changed in rapid succession from the possession of France to England, and England to the United States. Among those doing missionary service at that time, or, to be more specific, during the period of British rule, and, in fact, until near to the close of the eighteenth century, was the Rev. Mr. Gibault, who administered alike to the French and the Indians. Then, too, there was Father Flaget, afterwards Bishop of Bardstown and Louisville, who preached for a time at Vincennes, in which pastorate he was succeeded by Father Rivet, a man of learning and ability, who had been driven from his native country by the Revolution. He remained at Vincennes from 1795 to 1804, during which period his entire time was devoted to Christianizing and ministering to the spiritual wants of the Indians. In this work he was grandly successful, counting numerous converts from among the Pottawattomies, Weas, Piankeshaws, Miamis, Kaskaskias, Sioux and Cherokees. Some of these were particularly devout, noticeably a chief named Louis.

Following Rivet, came others to continue the good work, among them being Bishop Blanc. At a later date the Miami as well as the Illinois mission was removed to a location west of the Mississippi, thus falling once more under the domination of the Jesuits. And here ends our brief recital of the labors engendered and sufferings endured in the establishment and upbuilding of the Illinois mission, a work made doubly dear to the hearts of all Christian people by the heroic sacrifice of a number of devoted lives.

THOUGH dealing somewhat at length with the settlement of Canada by the French, and noting the gradual impress of civilization upon that country and the people inhabiting it, the intention has been to make the reader somewhat familiar with that historic ground so rich in history of the Church. With the same purpose in view, we have also dwelt to a considerable, though not unwarrantable extent on the characteristics of the natives, not only of that particular locality, but throughout the entire central, eastern and northern region, in which the heroic and self-sacrificing ministers of peace performed a notable duty to both God and man.

In our reference to the missions it will also undoubtedly be noticed that we have introduced that of the Illinois prior to the ones established in Michigan and Wisconsin,[1] although the latter, under all ordinary conditions, should have been given priority by right of age. Our reason for the change we believe to be good and sufficient, as it thus enables us to proceed uninterruptedly with the story of the Church in Wisconsin, which all are aware is the particular object of the present work. With this brief and possibly unnecessary explanation, we will proceed to follow the missionaries in their earlier wanderings through the then unexplored peninsula of Michigan, and the magnificent and far-reaching area of wooded and mineral wealth which marks the northern limits of Wisconsin, and so on to the time when through the tireless efforts of these zealous workers the Church assumed control, taking her rightful position in the vanguard of progress and civilization throughout the great Northwest.

It was on the peninsula of northern Michigan, which lies safely ensconced between the waters of Lakes Superior and Michigan, that the Algonquins of the West

(1) Of the general condition of affairs as discovered by the early voyagers and Jesuits who first journeyed from the Sault to Chequamegon Bay and down through the interior to the present site of Wisconsin, the Wisconsin Historical Collections give the following account:

"The principal tribes inhabiting the country now known as Wisconsin when first explored by the whites, were the Menomonees, Winnebagoes, Sacs, Foxes and Chippewas. There were several other tribes having a partial residence upon our territory. By treaty the most of these have ceded the greater part of their lands to the general government and retired west before the march of civilization, until at present we find but comparatively few remaining of these once powerful races and lords of the soil.

"The Oneidas in the northeastern part of the State, the Brothertowns residing in Calumet County, and also the Stockbridges who once resided in the same county, immigrated from the State of New York, having previously purchased their lands from the Menomonees and Winnebagoes about the year 1822. They were induced to remove westward mainly through the influence of the Rev. Eleazer Williams (elsewhere referred to), who has since that time claimed to be the Dauphin, or lawful heir to the crown of France, and who had previously been a Missionary of the Episcopal Church among the Oneidas for some five or six years. As these Indians were partially Christianized, Mr. Williams claimed that by intermingling with the wild men of the West they might be the means of converting the latter to the principles of Christianity. It has, however, been asserted that there had been chartered a powerful land company in the State of New York whose preemption attached to the lands occupied by these bands as soon as they might leave the state; and that this company operated in a quiet way upon Mr. Williams and the agents of the General Government to bring about their removal. They did not, however, all come to Wisconsin immediately after their new purchase, but immigrated at intervals for several successive years.

"In the year 1839 the Brothertowns sent a petition to Congress to be recognized as citizens of the United States. Their request was granted. They, therefore, abolished their tribal government and became subject to the laws of the United States and Wisconsin. They exercised the elective franchise by virtue of our State constitutions which confers the right upon 'persons of Indian blood who have once been declared by law of Congress to be citizens of the United States.' In the year 1843 the Stockbridges were also by act of Congress admitted to the rights of citizenship. They subsequently, however, became divided upon this subject, and a majority of them returned to their old form of government. On coming to their new homes, these two tribes settled in what has become Calumet County, though since that time some of the Stockbridges have removed further to the north. They built comfortable homes, and erected saw and grist mills. It is claimed by the Brothertons that they built the first steamboat which ever plied up Lake Winnebago, called by them the 'Manchester.'

"The Indians now residing in the State of Wisconsin (1882-85) are the following:

"Several bands of the Chippewas who are a part of the original and warlike tribe, better known as the Ojibways, whose territory extended along the shores of Lakes Huron, Superior and the northern shore of Lake Michigan, and as far west as the Mississippi River. They number something over twelve hundred.

"There are now about the same number of Menonomees who have a reservation in Menomonee County of some two hundred and thirty thousand acres; a considerable portion of the men, having made substantial advancement in civilization, are engaged in the pursuits of agriculture. The portion of the Stockbridges who are separated from their brethren in Calumet County, and whose numbers are now less than three hundred, are located on a reservation near the Menomonees.

"The Winnebagoes number some fifteen hundred, and have their reservation of over sixty thousand acres located near Green Bay. They are also engaged mainly in the cultivation of the soil. There are also some stray bands of the Winnebagoes and Pottawattomies, numbering nearly a thousand, who did not remove with their respective tribes west of the Mississippi or who returned soon after their removal, and who are now scattered through the central and northern portions of the State. They subsist mainly by cultivating small patches of ground, and by hunting and fishing.

"All not admitted to citizenship except the roving bands have their tribal governments. Of the three hundred thousand Indians now inhabiting the States and Territories of the United States, only about five thousand of them made their homes in the State of Wisconsin."

established their last outpost. There were several tribes of these people located in this vicinity, making the whole formidable enough in numbers to interrupt, should they so desire, the progress eastward of the Dakotas (Sioux), who had already moved as far in that direction as the banks of the Mississippi River. One section or canton, or tribe, of these people had, in fact, already pressed onward to the shores of Green Bay, where they had settled and were known to the Algonquins, among whom they mingled as Winnebagoes or Salt-water men. The main body, however, they called Naudowessies or "Cruel,"—identically the same name applied by them to the Iroquois. "The chief of these tribes," says Shea, "were on the north the Ottawas or Traders, the Outchibouec or Sauteurs, since called Chippewas and Ojibways, the Menomonees or Wild Rice Tribe, the Sacs, the Outagamies or Foxes, the Mascoutins or Fire Nation, the Kickapoos, and towards the south the Miamis and Illinois or Illiniwek."

Intimate commercial relations with the Hurons soon caused these tribes to become acquainted with the French, as a result of which their place of residence was soon made the object of a visit by the explorer Nicolet.[1]

It was now that the initiative step may be said to have been taken for the establishment of a mission among these people, the Father Superior of the Canadian missions appointing Fathers Charles Raymbaut and Isaac Jogues, both competent and experienced men, to undertake the work of investigation and ultimate development of the plan. It was about the middle of June that they started forth from the Mission of St. Mary's to dare the perils of this almost untried passage, and that through a country infested with all kinds of dangers and disease. So for the matter of seventeen days, they paddled along the waters of Lake Huron, until, arriving at Sault Ste. Marie, they came upon a large settlement of Indians who extended to them the heartiest greetings. Here, too, they learned of numerous other tribes, who by proper cultivation might be brought to a sense of their own unworthiness, and hence the missionaries, realizing the enormity of the task they had undertaken, as well as the noble possibilities for lasting and successful labor, were overjoyed with the prospect thus opened out before them. Nor, had it been possible at this time, would it have been necessary for them to go any farther in order that they might secure a field in which to begin. For the Chippewas, among whom they had thus early fallen, were anxious for them to stay, saying: "We will embrace you as brothers; we shall derive profit from your words." But to stay for any length of time was just then impossible; so, explaining the condition of affairs as best they could, and planting a cross to mark, as they said, the limit of their spiritual progress, they set forth on their journey back towards the settlement, promising, however, if such a thing were possible, to return at an early date and establish a permanent mission in that locality. Unfortunately for this project, Father Raymbaut soon after fell a victim to the climate, while Father Jogues was called to another field and upon that career which led to the ultimate annihilation of the Huron mission as well as to his own heroic death.

From this time forth the West may be said to have occupied a prominent position in the minds and plans of the Jesuit Fathers. But necessity, caused by the smallness of their working forces and other insurmountable difficulties, made it imperative that they should await a more favorable opportunity in which to extend their field of labor. So time passed along until 1656, in which year a flotilla of Ottawas came down to the

(1) Ten years spent in Algonquin cabins on the banks of Lake Nipissing and the Ottawa, fitted him to traverse in safety the vast regions where that language prevailed. Several years prior to his death, which took place in 1642, while engaged in a work of charity, Nicolet set out from the Huron country, and, after a voyage of three hundred leagues, visited the "Sea-tribe," undoubtedly the Winnebagoes on Green Bay, with whom, in the name of France, he concluded a treaty in an assembly of four or five thousand men.

There was none to follow him to that wild West till 1641, when a great "feast of the dead," given by the Algonquins in Huronia, gathered there all the kindred tribes to take part in the funeral games, the dances, chants and mournful procession of these decorated tribes. Among the rest came the Chippewas from the Rapids which close to the vessels of man the entrance of the vast upper lake. These denizens, like the rest, were visited by the Jesuit missionaries, and so won were the good Chippewas by the gentle self-devoting ways of those heralds of the Cross that they earnestly invited them to their cabins at the Falls, portraying with all the lively imagination of the child of the forest the riches and plenty that reigned in their sylvan abodes. Ever eager to extend their spiritual conquests, to enlarge the bounds of freedom in this Western world (for there alone is liberty where dwells the Spirit of the Lord), the missionaries joyously accepted the invitation of the Chippewas.—Shea.

The Wisconsin Historical Collections have it that Jean Nicolet was the explorer to whom history ascribes the honor of first visiting the territory now known as Wisconsin. He was a native of Cherbourg, Normandy, and emigrated to Canada while quite a young man about the year 1618. At that time, it will be remembered, Champlain was Governor of New France, and it was probably through his influence that the future explorer was induced to come. Nicolet's journey was made to the country of the Algonquins on the Ottawa River, while somewhat later he visited the Nipissing, then dwelling on the borders of the lake bearing that name.

After many years devoted to exploration and discovery, he finally returned to the colony and settled at Three Rivers, having been appointed government interpreter at Three Rivers. It was during this period that he won the distinction of being regarded as the most adroit among his fellows in the management of and control of the numerously banded natives who annually assembled at the settlements for the purpose of trade.

It was about this time that Champlain first learned of two great bodies of water lying beyond Lake Huron, about which he naturally desired to obtain more absolute and reliable information. On this mission, then, Jean Nicolet was dispatched, it being his function under the direction of the Governor to visit all the tribes dwelling in the vicinity of these lakes or any other like bodies of water that he might discover. For this purpose, he left the settlements in 1634, proceeding up the Ottawa River as far as the Isle des Allumettes, being accompanied by Fathers Brebeuf, Daniel and Davost, who were also bound for the Huron country. Arrived at the Isle, he separated from the Missionaries and proceeded across to Lake Nipissing, from whence he passed down the French River into Georgian Bay. Here he spent some time among the Hurons, but finally, having secured an escort of seven men from that tribe, he journeyed along the northern shores of Lake Huron, passing by Manitouline Island through the channel to the outlet of Lake Superior. On his way up at the falls, he came across a large settlement of Algonquins, with whom he remained for a brief period. It is not definitely stated that he saw or knew of Lake Superior, even though but a short distance from that body of water, as upon leaving the Algonquins he traveled towards the southwest, passing through the strait of Mackinaw into Lake Michigan. He then journeyed in a southerly direction, and after experiencing many hardships and delays, arrived at the now historic location of Green Bay, where he was received with much pomp by the chiefs and warriors of the Winnebagoes. From this settlement he passed westward, ascended the Fox River, crossed to the Wisconsin River, and descended that body of water to a point which, he asserted upon his return to the settlements, was within three days' journey of the sea. This, of course, it is believed, was an error, and that the "Great Water" referred to by the Indians was the Mississippi. From this point, however, he journeyed to the southwest, and visited the Illinois, returning then to Quebec by way of Lake Michigan. Nicolet died in 1642, being drowned in the St. Lawrence River while journeying from Three Rivers to Quebec.

settlements and requested that missionaries be sent to dwell among them. Of the assignment of Fathers Dreuillettes and Garreau to this mission, the cowardly murder of the latter, and ultimate abandonment of the plan, we have already treated at length, and refer to it again at the present time merely as being incident to the chain of events which follow. Then, after a lapse of four years, another flotilla[1] descended the St. Lawrence, the fleet of sixty canoes of which it was composed being manned by a force of three hundred Western Algonquins. These people also made a demand for spiritual aid and instruction, and as the Superior of the Jesuit Order in Canada felt it incumbent upon him to take cognizance of the matter, it was decided to comply with their request. For this purpose, then, was selected René Ménard, co-laborer of Jogues, Bressani, Brebeuf, Garnier and Garreau, who was practically regarded as sole survivor of the Huron missions. The path thus opened to him was long and dangerous, especially for a man to whom the labors, exposure and abuses pertaining to many years of active missionary life had brought an accumulation of physical ills which pressed upon and harassed him to a point almost beyond the limit of human endurance. Yet, still anxious to labor, and though morally certain that in so doing he was making his final adieus to civilization, this pioneer priest,[2] devout believer and earnest promotor of the Catholic faith, went boldly and uncomplainingly forth to consummate the full measure of his apostleship by yielding up his spirit to God who gave it.

That he believed this would be the last of his many undertakings, is made plain in a letter to a personal friend, written but a few hours previous to his departure from Three Rivers on the morning of August 28, 1666. In this communication, he said: "I write you probably the last word, and I desire it to be the seal of our friendship unto Eternity. * * * In three or four months you may put me into the Memento of the Dead, considering the manner of living of these people, and my age and weak constitution. Notwithstanding all this, I have felt such a powerful attraction and have seen so little of nature in this undertaking, that I cannot doubt that I would have had eternal remorse had I missed this opportunity.

"We were taken a little by surprise, so that we were unable to provide ourselves with clothing and other necessary things. But He who feeds the little birds and clothes the lilies of the fields, will take care of His servants. Should we happen to die of misery, that would be for us a great happiness."

"This first Mission in the West," writes Shea, "was situated, as the date of his letter tells us, one hundred leagues west of Sault Ste. Marie, in all probability at Keweenaw." This point, all authorities agree, was a somewhat extensive bay on the south shore of Lake Superior, at about the distance suggested by Shea from the Sault. The name given is said to be a perversion of the Chippewa word Kakiweonan, meaning, when they make a short cut by water, and there undoubtedly refers to the passage from the west shore of Keweenaw Point by way of Portage Lake and Portage River to the east shore of the Point.

Of his earlier experience in this locality, Father Ménard says: "One of my first visits was in a wretched hut dug out under a large rotten tree which shielded it on one side, and supported by some fir-branches which sheltered it against the wind. I entered on the other side, almost flat on my face; but creeping in, I found a treasure, a poor woman, abandoned by her husband and by her daughter, who had left her two dying children, one about two and the other about three years old. I spoke of the Faith to this poor afflicted creature, who listened to me with pleasure. 'Brother,' said she, 'I

(1) The flotilla ascended the Ottawa and Mattawan rivers, across Lake Nipissing, and descended French River to Georgian Bay; thence their course lay west. They passed Sault Ste. Marie and coasted the southern shore of Lake Superior. To the aged missionary the journey was one of unparalleled hardships, the Indians who near Montreal had forced Albanel to go ashore and return to the settlements, made Menard carry heavy packs over portages and compelled him to paddle nearly all the time. They even from superstitious fear threw away his breviary, but in his baggage he afterwards found another. Once after they had obliged him to disembark he had to make his way over frightful rocks and precipices in order to overtake them. He hurt his feet and leg, which remained swollen and sore during the rest of the voyage, especially as he had to jump into the cold water many times in order to lighten the canoe. Food became very scarce; those were deemed well fed who found a certain moss (tripe de roche), which grew on rocks and of which they made a black sticky broth. Such as had moose skins stealthily ate them to appease their hunger.—H. C. Campbell, Parkman Club Publications.

Ménard also tells of his sufferings on this eventful journey in the following language: "The Indians who granted me a passage with the assurance of fair treatment, considering my age and infirmities, have not after all spared me. They required me to carry on my shoulders very heavy packs every time, or nearly so, when we had to make a portage, and although my paddle wielded by hands as feeble as mine did but little service towards hastening the journey, they would not allow it to be idle. Once they obliged me to disembark on a very bad spot. To overtake them, I had to make my way over frightful rocks and precipices. So much was the country intersected with ravines, and so steep were the mountains, that I thought I should never extricate myself. Hastening my steps for fear of being left behind, I hurt my foot and leg. They remained swollen and annoyed me very much for the rest of the journey, especially when the water commenced to become cold, we being obliged to remain bare-foot ready to jump into the water in order to lighten the canoe whenever they judged it proper. Add to this that those people observe no regularity in their meals, eating everything once and making no provisions for the morrow. As for their camping, no attention is paid to their own or their guest's comfort, but only to the security of canoes and to the facility of embarkment and disembarkment. As for rest, they generally sleep on uneven rocky ground, on which they spread a few branches if at hand.

"We have every one of us kept fast, and that a rigorous one, having to content ourselves with small fruits, which are of rare occurrence, and such as nowhere else are eaten. . . . Everything seems palatable when a person is hungry.

"But the worst was to come; having after such hardships entered Lake Superior, there, in place of finding the promised rest and provisions, our canoe was smashed by a fallen tree, and that so completely that no hope of repairing it was left. They abandoned us, and we were left—three Indians and myself—without food and canoe. In that state we remained six days, living on filthy offal, which to keep off starvation we had to scratch up with our nails around an old abandoned lodge. To make soup, we pounded the bones that lay about. We picked up earth saturated with the blood of animals that had been killed there. In a word, we made food of everything. One of us was continually on the look-out at the shore to implore the mercy of those that passed by, and we wrested from them a few slices of dried meat, which saved us from death. At last, some more compassionate took us up and brought us to our rallying point, destined for our wintering. This is a large bay on the south shore of Lake Superior (Keweenaw Bay), where I arrived on St. Theresa's Day (October 15, 1660)."

(2) Ménard was now fifty-five years of age. Hardship and excessive work had left their marks upon him. His attenuated form was bent as with great age, his hair was white, and it is said that his face bore the scars of wounds which he had received at the hands of the Cayuga children. But old and decrepit as he was, he possessed a lofty soul and a stout heart.—Henry Colin Campbell in Parkman Club Publications.

know well that our folks reject thy words; but, for my part, I like them well; what thou sayest is full of consolation.' With these words she drew from under the tree a piece of dry fish, which, so to say, she took from her very mouth to repay my visit. I thanked her, however, valuing more the happy occasion which God gave me of securing the salvation of these two children by conferring on them Holy Baptism. I returned some time after to this good creature and found her full of resolution to serve God; and, in fact, from that time she began to come to morning and evening prayers so constantly that she did not fail once, however busied or engaged in gaining her scant livelihood." And in this vein he continues to speak of the conversion of a second, a third, a fourth and numerous others from among the pagan horde.

"As to the other Christians who composed this church," continues the Missionary, "they were few in number, but chosen, and they gave me much satisfaction. I did not like to admit a great number, contenting myself with such as I judged would persevere in the Faith during my absence; for I do not know what will become of me, nor to which side I will go. However, I should have to do great violence to myself, if I had to come down from the cross which God has prepared for me in this extremity of the world in my old days. Not a single pulsation of my heart has ever returned to Three Rivers. I do not know of what nature are the nails which hold me attached to this holy wood; but the mere thought that anybody should come to detach me from it, makes me shudder; and very often I start up out of my sleep with the thought that there is no Outaouak for me, and that my sins put me back to the same place whence the mercy of my God has drawn me by a singular favor. I can say with truth that I have more consolation here in one day, notwithstanding hunger, cold, and other almost inexplicable hardships, than I have had in all my life, whatever place in the world I have been."

And yet at this time not one comfort of refined or even savage life was his. From the bitter cold and rigor of a Lake Superior winter he had no protection, save that afforded him by a poorly constructed hut made of fir-tree branches. For food he had the remains of fish and pulverized bark of birch and white wood, which was either boiled in water in which a fish had previously been cooked, or else mixed with fish oil. As an additional and only occasional relish, there were also acorns, which, whenever the opportunity afforded, he devoured with much relish.

It was while laboring at Theresa that Father Ménard first became informed of a number of powerful tribes which were said to be living some two or three hundred leagues distant. To know that there were such a body of people, even though far distant, who needed the generous administration of a spiritual director in order that they might receive that knowledge and instruction so necessary to their spiritual welfare, created a great longing in the breast of the old man to go out to and instruct them in the ways and manners of a Christian life; and so, in spite of the well-known dangers and difficulties to be met with in such an undertaking, and a realizing sense of his own enfeebled condition, he determined to make the attempt, even though failing to survive. That he doubted his own strength is quite evident from the fact that he writes: "It is my hope to die on the way, but having pushed so far and being full of health, I shall do what is possible to reach them. I hope I shall be able to throw myself among some Indians who intend to make that journey. God will dispose of us according to His good pleasure for His great glory, either for death or life. It will be a great mercy on the part of our loving God if he calls me to Himself in so good a place."

At another time when an attempt was made to dissuade him from undertaking so perilous a journey, he replied: "God calls me thither; I must go if it cost me my life; I cannot suffer souls to perish under the pretext of saving the bodily life of a wretched old man like myself. What! Are we to serve God only when there is nothing to suffer and no risk to life?" And so, on the 13th day of July, 1661, he set forth on this last great undertaking, accompanied by one faithful companion and a number of Hurons, who happened by mere accident to be at the mission at that time. When several days on the way, they at length reached a lake where, their provision having almost entirely failed them, they decided to camp. Here the Indians abandoned them, and after waiting nearly a month for their return the venerable Missionary and his companion decided to continue on their way.

"Finally," says Verwyst, "the poor father, whilst following his companion, went astray, mistaking some trees or rocks for others. At the end of a portage made in order to get by a rather difficult cataract or rapids, his companion looked back to see whether he could descry the father coming. He seeks for him, calls him, shoots off his gun as many as five times to bring him back to the right path; but all in vain. This made him determine to go as quickly as possible to the Huron village, which he judged to be near by, in order to hire help at whatever cost it might be, to go and search for the father. But, unluckily, he himself lost his way and went beyond the village without noticing it. He had better luck, however, when getting lost, for he met an Indian who led him back and brought him to the village;

but he did not arrive there till two days after the father had gone astray. And then, what can a poor man do, who does not know a single word of the Huron language? Still, as charity and necessity are eloquent enough, he gave them to understand by his gestures and tears, that the father had lost his way. He promised a young man various French articles to prevail upon him to go and search for the father. At first he made a show of being willing to do so, and actually started. Scarcely was he gone two hours, however, when he returned, shouting, 'To arms! To arms! I am just after meeting with the enemy.' At this uproar the compassion they had conceived for the father vanished, and with it the will to go and seek for him."

Of other incidents connected with this sad affair, Shea tells us that the Missionary's bag was afterwards found in the hands of an Indian, who refused to tell where he got it, and that some of his chapel service was also seen in a lodge. Although the manner of his death still remains a mystery, it is the general belief that he was murdered at the first rapid[1] of the Menominee, thus "closing a long life of assiduous toil in the missions of America by a glorious death in the sight of Heaven, although there were none to chronicle his sufferings and constancy in death."

This incident actually marks the close of the first Ottawa mission, and a lonely and isolated one, too, as the nearest station to it towards the east was then at Montreal, there being none other in any direction that might be considered nearer, except perhaps the Spanish missions of Santa Fé or Alachua.

Father Réne Ménard was a native of the French capital, being born on September 7, 1605. Of a naturally studious nature, his entire youth was devoted to acquiring an education. He entered the Jesuit Order on November 7, 1624, at which time he had already completed a thorough course in the classics. In October, 1626, he went to the college founded by Henry IV., in 1607, at La Fléche, which was at that time conducted by the Jesuits. Here he spent three years in the study of philosophy and the sciences. In October, 1629, he was sent by his superiors to teach, as Professor of Latin, to the Jesuit College of Orleans. From this place he was transferred in October, 1623, to the Jesuit University at Bourges, where he remained four years, during which period he devoted almost his entire time to the study of theology. His theological course completed, he taught belle's lettres for one year, and rhetoric for two years, in the college of Moulines. Having taken the final vows of his Order, he on the 26th day of March, 1640, sailed from Dieppe on board the l'Espérance, bound for Quebec, at which place he arrived in the following July. Of his subsequent career in the missionary field, much has already been said. His death occurred, or was supposed to occur, on or about the 10th day of August, 1651, at which time he was fifty-seven years of age.

The man chosen to succeed Father Ménard in the arduous and dangerous task of continuing the Ottawa mission, and establishing others throughout the West, was Claude Allouez, who had long desired to obtain such means by which to express his devotion to the cause. It was on the 8th day of August, then, in the year 1665, that, accompanied by six Frenchmen and in the neighborhood of four hundred Indians, he started on his journey from Three Rivers toward the West,

1) It is clear that the portage on the Wisconsin River at which Ménard got lost was near a trail leading from that river to the head waters of the Black River. Diligent inquiry has resulted in the discovery that early in the present century a trail left the Wisconsin River at a point near the mouth of the Copper River; which empties into the Wisconsin where the latter approaches so closely to the head waters of the Black River; and that this trail extended to a point near Chelsea, and at this point had crossed the head waters of the Black River. When white settlers first visited that region during the present century this trail was still being used by the Indians. It was the best crossing place between the two rivers that could be found. It was really a portage trail, and Indian portage trails are always as direct as possible. It was not unreasonable under the circumstances to suppose that this was the trail which in the seventeenth century led from the Wisconsin River to the Huron village at the head waters of the Black River.

If this be true, it was not far up the Wisconsin River from the place where the trail to the Huron village began that Ménard wandered off into the woods. The fact that the Frenchman after hunting for Ménard, after getting astray himself and after going beyond his destination, nevertheless reached the Huron village the second day after the priest had disappeared, is conclusive on this point. It is just as clear that it was at a rapid, not a fall, that Ménard lost his way. The Relation of 1663, speaking of the journey made to the Huron village by three young Frenchmen whom Ménard had sent ahead to reconnoitre, makes a clear distinction between rapids and water falls. On the same page, speaking of the priest's death, it is explicitly stated that his companion missed him at the end of a portage near a rapid.

The statement in the same Relation that the rapid was "difficult" and that the two men became separated, indicates that only the priest took the portage trail, and that the Frenchman "ran" the rapids. On this point Perrot is more explicit. He says: "One day he (the Frenchman) found himself in a rapid which carried him along in his canoe. To help him, the father took some of his baggage out of the canoe and did not take the right path to get to him. He got upon a trail made by animals, and in endeavoring to get back to the right path he got entangled in a labyrinth of trees and went astray. The Frenchman, having passed the rapids with great difficulty, awaited the good father, and as the latter did not come he determined to go in search of him." The statement that the Frenchman found himself in a rapid which carried him along in his canoe shows that they were still descending the Wisconsin River. It is also made clear by this passage from Perrot that the rapid in question was one that could be "run," though with difficulty; it was a rapid where a landing could be effected before the most dangerous part of the descent was reached, and it was a rapid with a portage trail around it.

These clues, indefinite though they may seem at first thought, nevertheless point with convincing clearness to the place where Father Ménard lost his life. In itself no one of the three characteristics of the rapid described by Perrot is particularly noteworthy; but, taken together, they form a most significant combination. In a large measure Whirlpool Rapids, thirty-six miles north of Merrill, answer to of Perrot's description; but the Frenchman, after searching for Ménard and after getting lost himself, could not very well from Whirlpool Rapids have reached the Huron village at the headwaters of the Black River the second day after Ménard had gone astray.

Below the Whirlpool Rapids, which are above any possible crossing place to the head waters of the Black River, and above Mosinee, too far below any possible crossing place to the head waters of the Black River, there is only one rapid as distinguished from a fall, and that one rapid is in close proximity to the only crossing place to the head waters of the Black River. It is only a short distance above the old Indian trail leading to the west, and it minutely corresponds to the rapid described by Perrot. Its name is Bill Cross Rapids, and it is situated five or six miles above the mouth of the Copper River, where the trail to the head waters of the Black River left the Wisconsin River. The portage trail around Bill Cross Rapids is about twenty-five rods long. The trail runs now, as it probably did during the seventeenth century, along the west bank of the river, this bank being somewhat low; the east bank is high. Old residents of that region state that when they first saw Bill Cross Rapids the surrounding country was heavily timbered with pine and hemlock. In such a place a few steps in the wrong direction, steps which it is always easy to take, and one is literally swallowed up in the place. Such, undoubtedly, was the fate of Ménard. He probably heard the shots fired by his companion, but being without a gun himself, he could not answer the signals. Moreover, in the thick woods it is easy to mistake the place from which a shot is fired, and those well-meant signals may simply have increased the priest's bewilderment. Ménard became separated from his companions about August 10. He probably survived some time—perhaps five days—as he had in his possession a piece of smoked meat about the size of a man's hand.—H. C. Campbell, Parkman Club Pub.

where for thirty years his name was identified with all of the most zealous and laudable work performed by the missionaries in their efforts to regenerate and Christianize the Indians.

The route followed in making this journey was by way of the Ottawa River, Mattawan River, thence by portage to Lake Nipissing, up French River to Georgian Bay, and from Georgian Bay along the shores of Lake Huron to Sault Ste. Marie. The distance is generally estimated as being a thousand miles, at that time a dangerous as well as arduous undertaking. Of the journey outward it is unnecessary to speak at length, save perhaps to refer to the immense amount of toil and suffering endured by Allouez, which were aggravated to a great extent by the brutal conduct of the Indians into whose care he had given himself. Finally, however, he arrived at Sault Ste. Marie on the 1st of September, and then began the latter part of his journey along the southern shore of Lake Superior.

"During all the rest of that month," writes Rev. Joseph La Boule,[1] "Allouez and his party, bound for the western end of Lake Tracy (as the French called Lake Superior, in honor of Monsieur Tracy), coursed along the southern shores of that lake. A magnificent and rugged scenery filled his soul with cheer. He saw the lofty ridge of naked sand which stretches along the shore, and sailed by the cliffs of pictured rocks which for twelve miles rise three hundred feet in height like towering walls with fretted arches and bastions, witnesses of ages gone by. He passed Keweenaw (St. Theresa) Bay, where Ménard had preached to the Ottawa Indians, and whence the latter set out for his fatal missionary tour to the head waters of the Black River in Wisconsin. Two Christian Huron women, Allouez found here—'women, who,' as he says, 'shone like two brilliant stars in this darkness of paganism.' No doubt he also said Mass at this spot, consecrated by his saintly brother missionary. On he went, still westward. He was now on what was, to white men, territory comparatively unexplored. His tone of correspondence becomes that of a keen observer. Game and fish are more abundant and the quality, he tells us, is excellent. His attention is called to the presence of copper mines by the color of the water and the frequent discovery of copper ore in pieces of ten or twenty pounds at the bottom of the water.

"The Indians by this time seemed to have improved; their treatment of Allouez is much better. A box, in which he had put a number of devotional and other articles, and which his Indian companions had stolen from him, was now restored to him. They henceforth regarded the Missionary and his books as Manitous, dangerous to touch.

"The voyagers had now traveled over five hundred leagues, which, at the rate of 2.52 miles per league, amounted to about 1,250 miles, and were approaching their destination. The Indians shouted in savage glee, when, in the distance, they perceived a tongue of land, jutting out far into the stormy bay situated at the southwestern end of the lake. It was the sandspit so familiar to the Lake Superior Indians, famed in their early myths and later history as Chequamegon Point.

"Allouez landed with the flotilla at the head of Chequamegon Bay on October 1, 1665. The Indians soon dispersed, leaving him to his own contemplations. 'Here, then, I am, at last. Here is my new field of labor; here is my flock!' Allouez may truthfully have said, as he stepped from his canoe and drew it to the shore. The ever-varying scenes of the voyage were over. The time of the sowing had come, and the sower was prepared for work."

At Chequamegon Bay, Allouez found a condition of affairs hardly in keeping with what his hopeful and sanguine temperament had led him to expect. It was at that season of the year when for long consecutive periods the skies were overcast, while cold, bleak winds were sweeping down from the north, agitating the waters of the bay into a condition of active, though sullen resistance, and lending a weird and doleful appearance to the surrounding landscape. The gloominess of the location was still more intensified by the close proximity of the dense and towering woodlands which sprang up on every side, offering a seemingly impregnable barrier to farther progress inland; but he was not for long left alone, a number of petty Algonquin tribes soon assembling in that vicinity for the purpose of completing final arrangements preparatory to a predatory expedition into the country of the Sioux. To prevent the carrying out of this proposed expedition, the first efforts of the Missionary were given, and, although the younger and more ardent of the braves had brought themselves to such a pitch of frenzy that they might readily be deemed beyond any possible control, so earnest and strenuous were the efforts put forth by him, that the elders and advisors of the tribe were induced to pronounce most emphatically against the undertaking. Having succeeded to this extent, he now turned his attention to the establishment of a mission.[2]

Joseph Stephen La Boule, author of "Claude Jean Allouez, the Apostle of the Ottawas," and the builder of the first Indian Missions in Wisconsin, published by the Parkman Club at Milwaukee, June 8, 1897, is professor of church history, homiletics and German and French literature, at St. Francis Seminary, Milwaukee. A complete biographical sketch will be found of this gentleman in the history of St. Francis Seminary, which appears in this work.

(2) The chapels and mission houses, as well as the Indian villages described by Father Allouez in his reports to Quebec under the heading, "Relation of the Mission of the Holy Ghost on Lake Tracy," have long since vanished. It seems impossible to locate with absolute certainty those interesting sites. The Jesuit Relations are the only original sources of information, and even these do not always furnish sufficient data to remove every doubt as to the exact location of all the missions. Supplemented by knowledge of topography and by tradition, however, the Rela-to which end he erected a small chapel at la Pointe du St. Esprit, which was dedicated in honor of the Holy Ghost.

This chapel became a mark of great interest as well as wonder to the Indian tribes located at different intervals throughout the vast extent of surrounding territory. Many of these, in fact, heard of it from solitary huntsmen who, in pursuit of their quarry, came across this particular village or settlement, where Allouez had established himself, and becoming interested in the mysteries of the service, bore the news homeward, the recital of their experiences losing none of the interest which they had already aroused in their naturally impressionable minds. Thus they came to the mission from long distances, their numbers repeatedly increasing, so that the good Missionary became enthusiastic over the belief that the work of evangelization was already progressing in a most satisfactory manner. Thus from time to time he gathered around him people of the Chippewa, Pottawattomie, Sac, Kickapoo, Miami and Illinois tribe, while in his journeyings among the outlying settlements he also met with the Sioux. At Chequamegon, however, Shea tells: "His labors were crowned with but partial success. Many were no strangers to Christianity, but had long resisted its saving doctrines. Like Ménard, he had to struggle with superstition and vice, consoled only amid hardship and ill-treatment by the fervor of a few faithful souls. His mission comprised two towns—one inhabited by the Ottawa clans, the Kiskakons and Sinagos; the other by the Tionnontates. The latter, mostly converted in their own land, he endeavored to recall; the former, embittered against the Faith, he endeavored to gain, and not in vain. In the first winter, he baptized eighty infants and three adults in danger of death, and had the consolation of gaining one whom he deemed worthy of the Sacrament in health.

"Superstition reigned around him. The lake was a god, the rabbits, rocks, and metals, all were gods; and the chimera of their own imagination, Missipissi, was the object of universal adoration. He visited also the Sauteurs at Sault Ste. Marie, and after spending a month among them proceeded to Lake Alimegon, where the Nipissings, better taught by adversity than their old Tionnontate neighbors, afforded the Missionary greater consolation. They had had no priest for twenty years, and many were still pagans, but the old Christians were full of fervor. But the great field in his eyes was, however, the new tribes yet uncorrupted by intercourse with the whites."

Of his work in the mission, Allouez gives the following account: "God gave me the grace to make myself understood by more than ten different tribes, but I confess it is necessary to beg Him for patience even before daylight in order to suffer joyfully the contempt, raillery, importunity and arrogance of these savages.

"Another occupation I have in my chapel is to baptize sick children, which the pagans themselves bring to me in order to get medicine from me, and since I see that God restores those innocent little children to health tions serve to narrow the ground in question so much as to satisfy us that we have come at least very near the exact facts in regard to the sites of the first missions of Chequamegon Bay.

In the Relation of the year 1667, Allouez gives us some information as to the site chosen by him for the mission. He says: "We arrived on the first day of October, 1665, at Chequamegon. * * * It is a beautiful bay, at the head of which is located the great village of the savages, who there plant their fields of Indian corn. * * * They are there collected from seven different nations, who live peacefully with one another." In this passage, Father Allouez refers to the habitations of the Indians (Algonquins and Hurons) in general; or he refers to the largest of the villages there, which the later narrative proves to be that of the Ottawas; in either case, the site of the village, or collection of villages, is at the head of the bay.

Continuing the same narrative, Allouez says: "This great collection of people caused us to prefer this place before all others at which to fix our ordinary abode, and to erect a chapel and commence the functions of Christianity." Having built the chapel (the first one built here) in the neighborhood of the "grand bourg des Sauvages" (the great village of the savages), which was at the head of the bay, Allouez tells us a little later in the same Relation, chapter 6, page 13, that their abode and chapel was located between two great villages; one, that of the Hurons; the other, that of the Ottawas. The quarter of the lake where we have put up our abode is situated between two large villages, the center, as it were, of all nations of this country. We have here erected a small chapel at bark, where my sole occupation is to receive the Algonquin and Huron Christians, and infidels who come here out of curiosity.

Again, speaking of the Hurons in chapter 7 of the same Relation, page 16, Allouez tells us that the village of the Hurons was located so near his abode (Assez proche de notre demeure) that he could attend to them better (Avec plus d'assiduité) than to others farther removed. Among the others certainly must have been included the Ottawa village, because that is the one he constantly refers to when he speaks of villages besides the Huron.

Furthermore, in the same Relation, chapter 6, Allouez narrates, "after having established Christianity among the Hurons, and having baptized many children, he, sometime in 1666, transported his birchbark chapel to the 'grand bourg,' the great village which he mentions at the beginning of his Relation, as being located at the head of the bay. Let us here note well that Allouez clearly says: "This grand bourg' was three-fourths of a league distant from his ordinary abode."

The Father's chapel did not remain at the grand bourg, for soon after it was almost destroyed by barbarous Ottawas, and he returned to his former (ordinary) residence, which was near the Huron village.

From the above carefully examined passages, we gather at least the following facts; First, the bark chapel and the mission house were located near the head of the bay; second, though nearer to the Huron village, the mission and ordinary abode were only three quarters of a league (one and seven-eighths miles) distant from the Ottawa village. If now we can fix the site of the Ottawa village, we can almost with certainty place the mission.

In the beginning of the Relation of 1667, we were told, the site chosen by the Missionary was near the "grand bourg" (which it is evident was that known as the Ottawa village), at the head of the bay, "where they planted their fields of Indian corn." Again, in the Relation of 1670, the writer casually refers to the site where the Ottawas planted and hid their Indian corn, and where, too, their village must have been. He says that the Indian women at Chequamegon Bay often found large pieces of copper at the place where the Ottawas raised Indian corn, and that this place was a half league from the border of the water (lake). Now, one and one-fourth miles (one-half a league) inland from the head of the bay would lead us up Fish Creek, about half way to Ashland Junction. Here, on either side of Fish Creek, are signs of ancient clearings. Mr. Martin, a very old inhabitant of the neighborhood said to the writer himself, when he was visiting the locality last summer (1896), "that even in their day there was an Indian village. On the east side of Fish Creek, about one and one-fourth miles from its mouth, Father Chrysostom Verwyst, O. S. F., claims to have found evident signs of ancient clearings upon which Indian corn could be raised. The Indians, living near the bay would naturally choose flowing streams as the places of their abodes. Tradition, topography, the Relations, all converged toward the conclusion that the Ottawa village lay somewhere near the confluence to Metabikitigweiag Creek and Fish Creek, one and one-fourth miles southwest of the city of Ashland. Assuming, therefore, what seems to be established as a fact, that the Ottawa village was located at or near a point on Fish Creek mentioned above, we can more readily fix the site of the mission. According to Father Allouez, the ordinary residence and mission chapel were about three-fourths of a league distant from the Ottawa village. According to the same authority, the Huron village was still nearer to the mission, which was placed between two villages. Upon personal examination of the ground, the writer can say with absolute certainty that neither the mission nor the Huron village can have been so far north as Vanderwenter's Creek, which is at Washburn (seven miles from Fish Creek), as that creek is not at the head of the bay, nor near enough to the head of the bay to answer to the description in the Relations. It is not possible to designate the exact spot, but taking the general tradition of Indians for granted that the earliest villages and the missions lay near the western shore of Chequamegon Bay, the Huron village can have been very little, if any, farther north than Boyd's Creek, and the mission was, most probably, at or near Whittlesey's Creek or Shore's Landing.—Joseph Stephen La Boule.

after baptism, I am in hopes He intends to make them, as it were, the foundation of His Church in these quarters.

"I have hung different pictures in the chapel, for instance, of Hell and the General Judgment, which supply me with subjects for instruction very suitable for the capacity of my hearers. In this manner I have no difficulty afterwards to make them attentive, to make them chant the 'Our Father' and 'Hail Mary' in their language, and to take the lead in the prayers I have them say after each instruction. All this attracts so great a number of Indians to instruction, that from morning until night I see myself happily obliged to do nothing else.

"God gives His blessings to these beginnings. * * The first days of 1666 were employed in presenting New Year's gifts to the Infant Jesus, which, no doubt, were very pleasing. This present consisted of several children whom their mothers, receiving a very extraordinary inspiration from God, brought to me to have them baptized. So this small congregation was increasing little by little. Seeing they were already imbued with our Mysteries, I judged it time to transfer our little chapel to the large village three-fourths of a league distant from our dwelling place, and composed of from forty-five to fifty large wigwams of all tribes, where there are as many as two thousand souls. (Father Verwyst gives it as his opinion that the village referred to was located on the southeast end of Chequamegon Bay, between Fish Creek and Ashland.)

"It was just at the time of their greatest debaucheries, and I can say, in general, that I saw in this Babylon a perfect picture of libertinism. I did not omit laboring here the same way as in our first place of abode, and with the same success. But the malignant spirit, being envious of the good which the grace of God effected here, caused diabolical juggleries to be performed every day, right near our chapel, for the healing of a sick woman. These juggleries consisted of nothing else than superstitious dances, hideous masquerades, horrible clamors, and a thousand buffooneries. I did not fail to go and see her every day, and in order to attract her by kindness, I made her a present of some grapes. At last, the sorcerers having declared that her soul had departed and that they had no hopes of her getting better, I went to see her the next day and told her that this was not true, and that I had hope she would be cured, provided she would believe in Jesus Christ. But I could not make any impression on her mind. Hence, I determined to speak to the sorcerer himself who attended her. He was so surprised to see me at his place, that he seemed wholly dumfounded. I showed him the follies of his art, and that he contributed more to the death of his patients than to prolong their lives. In reply, he threatened to make me feel their effect by certain death. A little after, having begun his jugglery, he kept it up for three hours. From time to time he would cry out in the midst of his ceremonies: the Black-gown would die of their effects; but, through Divine Grace, all was in vain. God even knew how to draw good from evil; for the medicine man having himself sent two of his children to have them baptized, they received by means of the sacred waters of Baptism, at one and the same time, the cure to both soul and body.

"The next day I visited another celebrated sorcerer, a man who had six wives, and who lived in such disorder as may be imagined in company of this kind. I found in his wigwam a small army of children. I sought to acquit myself of the duties of the ministry. This is the first time I saw Christianity mocked in these quarters, especially in what concerns the resurrection of the dead and the fire of hell. I left with this reflection: 'Ibant apostoli gaudentes a conspectu concilii, quoniam digni habiti sunt pro nomine Jesu contumeliam pati (the apostles went rejoicing from the sight of the council, because they had been judged worthy to suffer insult for the name of Jesus).

"The insults I received in that wigwam soon became known outside, and were the cause of others treating me with the same insolent affronts. Already they had broken away a part of the bark, that is of the walls of our church; already they had commenced to rob me of all that I had; the young assembled more and more and became the more insulting, and the Word of God was listened to only with scorn and derision. This obliged me to abandon this post in order to return to our ordinary dwelling place, having this consolation, when leaving them, that Jesus Christ had been preached and the Faith announced both publicly, as also to each Indian individually, for besides those who filled our chapel from morning till night, those who stayed at home in their wigwams were instructed by such as heard me.

"I have heard them myself in the evening, after all had retired, repeat understandingly, in the tone of a chief, the whole instruction I had given them during the day. They admitted, indeed, what I taught them is very reasonable, but libertinism overrules reason, and if grace be not overpowerful, all our instructions have but little effect.

"One of them having come to see me in order to be instructed, at the first word I said to him concerning the two wives he had, he said to me: 'My brother, you are speaking to me of a very difficult affair; it is enough that my children pray to God, i. e., becoming Christians; instruct them.

"After I had left that place of abomination, God led me about two leagues away from the sight of our dwelling, where I found three adults who were sick, and whom I baptized after sufficient instruction. Two of them died after Baptism. The secrets of God are wonderful, and I could relate several instances of the same kind, which show His loving providence for the elect."

Somewhere towards the end of the year 1666, Father Allouez made a journey to the westward in order that he might meet with and visit the Sioux,[1] a people who had ofttimes been referred to by those among whom he had been dwelling as their inveterate and ferocious enemies. He came upon a settlement of these people at the western extremity of Lake Superior with whom he was quite successful. "Another most daring and almost incredible undertaking," says Father La Boule, "was the missionary expedition of Allouez across a part of Lake Superior. He coursed," continues this writer, "along the northern shore for hundreds of miles, past many rapids, and carried his canoes over swampy portages, up to Lake Nipegon and back, making, therefore, another journey of about five hundred leagues in all. This perilous journey was made in May and June of 1667, in a bark canoe, with two Indians as companions. A less zealous missionary of our day would probably call unwise and ungodly the faith that permitted such hazardous deeds; but missionaries of the stamp of Allouez kept the highest models before them, such as Francis Xavier and St. Paul, and the winning of one soul for Heaven was to their stout hearts sufficient compensation for any sacrifice. At Lake Nipegon, he was received with open arms. Some of the Nipissings had been baptized about twenty years before in their former homes among the Hurons. He revived the dormant faith in the happy village, and repeatedly said Holy Mass for them during his visit of fifteen days. The joyous, sincere devotion of these poor people,' he writes on this occasion, 'gave me the sweetest refreshment, and consoled me abundantly for all past hardships.'"

It was during this year that Allouez returned to Quebec with a view to informing his Superior of the actual condition of the Western missions. Having completed this work, which included the emphatic and very reasonable demand for additional aid in conducting the mission, he, without further delay and within two days of his arrival at Quebec (August 3,[2] 1667), started on the return journey, accompanied by Father Nicholas,[3] one donne and several French mechanics, who had volunteered to join the party. And here, unfortunately, for the complete success of the undertaking, arose fresh and unexpected difficulties, owing to the brutal disposition of the Indians, who absolutely refused to carry any other than Allouez, his companion priest and one donne. They even forbade the taking of extra baggage, so that the Missionary was compelled to leave behind him many articles which he had considered absolutely necessary to his personal comfort, and for the proper conduct and observance of the religious services. From Montreal, therefore, these three passed onward in company with the Indian flotilla, leaving the rest of the party to make their way back to Quebec as best they could. Finally, and fortunately, too, for they were made objects of many indignities on the way out, they arrived at the mission and at once entered upon their several duties in the conduct of the same.

Fearless and determined to conquer all existing difficulties in order that he might carry the Word throughout that entire region, and undismayed by the true and fickle character of the people, a personal acquaintance

(2) It is the expressed opinion of Father La Boule that the distance alleged to have been covered by Allouez in his visit to Lake Nipegon has been greatly over-estimated, as it would have been impossible for him to have made such an extended journey in May and June of the same year, and still have been enabled to arrive at Quebec on this date. It is his opinion, however, that either the distance covered in that expedition was overestimated by mistake, or that the dates given are incorrect.

Of this memorable journey regarding the dates of which there seems to have been some reasonable doubt, Father Verwyst says: "Father Allouez left his mission at the head of Chequamegon Bay on the 16th of May, and on the 17th crossed the lake, probably starting from Sand Island. As it took them twelve hours hard paddling to reach the north shore, we may safely conclude that the lake must be some forty miles wide where they crossed—a risky undertaking in a frail birchbark canoe. Father Allouez himself says: 'For almost twenty years they (the Nipissings) have not seen a pastor nor heard speak of God. I thought I would add part of my labors to this old mission, trusting that a voyage I would make to their new home would be followed by the blessing of Heaven.

"'On the 16th of May of this year, I embarked in a canoe with two Indians who were to serve me as guides during the whole of this voyage. Having met on our way down forty Indians from the Bay of the North, I imparted to them the first tidings of the Faith, for which they thanked me with some show of politeness. Continuing our voyage on the 17th, we crossed over a part of our Great Lake (Superior), paddling for twelve hours without intermission. God assisted me very sensibly; for there being but three in our canoe, I had to paddle with all my strength together with the Indians, in order not to lose any time of the calm without which we would be in great danger, being all of us tired out with exertion and hunger. Notwithstanding all this, we lay down to sleep without supper, and the next day we contented ourselves with a meager repast of Indian corn and water; for the wind and rain prevented our Indians from casting their nets.

"'On the 19th, the fine weather being inviting, we made eighteen leagues, rowing from daybreak until after sundown, without stopping or disembarking. On the 20th, having found nothing in our nets, we continued on our way, grinding some grains of dry corn with our teeth. The next day (the 21st) God refreshed us with two small fishes which gave us a little life. The benediction of Heaven was multiplied the following day (22d), for our Indians took such a lucky draught of sturgeon that they were obliged to leave some of them on the beach.

"'On the 23d, coasting along the shores of this great lake, on the north side, we proceeded from island to island, for these are very numerous. There is one of them at least twenty leagues long, where pieces of ore are found considered by the French to be true red copper, they having tested its quality. After traveling a long distance on the lake, we finally left it on the 25th of May, and entered a river full of rapids and falls, so very numerous that even our Indians could not proceed any farther. Having learned that Lake Outchibegong was still frozen, they willingly took a rest of two days, to which they were compelled by necessity.

"'While we were advancing towards our destination, we from time to time met Nipissing Indians who had strayed away from the place of their habitation, to seek a living in the woods. Having assembled quite a number of them for the feast of Pentecost, I prepared them by a long instruction to understand the holy sacrifice of the Mass, which I celebrated in a chapel constructed of green boughs. They heard it with as great piety and gravity as our Indians of Quebec do in our chapel at Sylleri. This gave me the sweetest refreshment I had during this voyage, and consoled me abundantly for all past hardships. We were six days traveling from island to island, seeking for a passage, and finally after many turns we arrived at the village of the Nipissings on the 3d of June. It is chiefly inhabited by idolatrous Indians and some Christians of former time. Among others, I found twenty persons who made public profession of Christianity. I was not wanting employment among both, the one and the other party during the fifteen days that we stayed with them, and I labored as much as my health, ruined by the hardships of the voyage, allowed me. I found more opposition there to baptizing their children than anywhere else; but the more opposition the devil makes, the more should we try to confound him. I think he does not at all like to see me making this last voyage, which is about five hundred leagues, going and returning, including the turns out of the way which we were obliged to make.'"

with which had removed all of the glamour which had at one time so thoroughly permeated his understanding of the missionary field, Allouez returned to perpetuate and carry out a gracious though sometimes thankless task for a period of over thirty years. In this he was greatly assisted by Father Nicholas, who seemingly had been well chosen, as the Relations refer to him as "a strong, practical, every-day man and a tireless worker." Of the work of these noble-minded men immediately subsequent to their return, but little has been recorded, save perhaps that the natural progress of their undertaking was ofttimes noticeably retarded by the ill-humor, waywardness and unreliability of the people. In spite of these discouraging results, however, we are assured that the Indians maintained a deep-rooted affection for the Missionary, appreciating to a great extent his efforts in their behalf, although failing in many instances to avail themselves of the many benefits proffered. Finally, however, having become satisfied of the uselessness of his endeavors to bring them to an absolute understanding of their condition, he informed them that he had received a call to locate among the Indians at Sault Ste. Marie, and that he had concluded to accept. So, shaking the dust off his feet, he at once made ready for his departure. Then, a realizing sense of their true condition seemed to dawn upon these people, and the chief of the tribe rose up in council and exhorted loudly and earnestly in favor of the Christian, while three other venerable and noted chiefs came to his support. This had considerable effect upon them in addition to which there was undoubtedly a great desire on their part to retain the Missionary among them. They therefore pledged themselves to all of the reforms for which he had so often, yet fruitlessly, made demand. They even went so far as to make a serious effort to abolish polygamy, as well as their idolatrous sacrifices and other superstitious beliefs. They became regular attendants at the daily services, filling the little chapel to overflowing, and in fact giving every evidence of their desire to become true and earnest supporters of the Faith. "Such," writes Father La Boule, "is the final result of Allouez's work at Chequamegon Bay. From five hundred to one thousand Indians had received Baptism, and most of the others were promising candidates for the Holy Sacrament. What is certain is, that a decided change was here effected, and Allouez could leave Chequamegon Bay assured that the God of Nations had heard his voice crying in the wilderness, and that the hand of the Almighty rested in benediction upon him and His children." Thus, then, Allouez returned to Sault Ste. Marie in 1669, his place as spiritual director of the missions at, and connected with, Chequamegon Bay passing into the hands of Father Marquette.

Of the subsequent history of the Chequamegon Mission, there is but little to be said. When Marquette took charge there in 1669, he found it in what at that time was considered a quite prosperous condition, and even may be said to have become hopeful of accomplishing much and lasting good among the tribes of that locality. Unfortunately, however, it was at about this time that the Ottawas became involved in a somewhat protracted war with the Sioux, as a result of which they as well as the Hurons became scattered in all directions. Under these conditions, the mission was relinquished, Marquette going to Michillimackinac, where he founded the mission of St. Ignace in 1671, at which time also the Hurons came to join him. So the old mission was entirely neglected and Mass was not again celebrated at La Pointe du St. Esprit until 1835, in which year Frederick Baraga[1] established a mission on Madeline Island, where he also built a chapel, which, being somewhat remodeled and improved, is still in existence at this day. Since the year 1877, the spiritual direction of this mission has been in charge of the Franciscan Fathers of Ashland and Bayfield.

To return, however, for a brief moment, to the time immediately preceding the expressed resolve of Allouez to leave La Pointe and return to the Sault: It was in April of the year 1668 that the already celebrated Father James Marquette left Quebec with Brother le Boesme for the West. Prior to this time, Father Nicholas had started on his way for the settlements with a flotilla of Nez Perces, from which time his connection with the Western mission ceased. The year following, Allouez also went down to the settlements, his object in so doing partially being to return some Iroquois prisoners to Governor de Courcelles, while he also sought for additional aid in the work undertaken, which was already far beyond his strength. Upon returning shortly afterwards, he was accompanied by Father Claudius Dablon, who, though much needed in Quebec, was made Superior of the Upper Missions, of which he was given charge.

Arriving at the Sault, Father Allouez remained there until November 3, when he took his final departure from that locality for Green Bay, where it is said he arrived on the 2d of December, 1669. In the meantime, the Indians formerly located at La Pointe had in many instances removed, some going to the Falls of St. Mary's, while others went as far as Green Bay. So, taking into consideration the changed conditions, Dablon and Marquette established a new station near the foot of the rapids on the southern shore, where the latter found an almost exhaustless field wherein to operate. Here, then, he worked zealously and energetically until a continued vacancy at the mission of Chequamegon made it necessary for him to turn his attention in that direction.

The journey of Marquette to the location of this added responsibility lasted over a month, the undertaking being accomplished under the most trying difficulties, owing to the great quantities of snow and ice which barred the way, as well as the generally bad condition of the weather, which not infrequently threatened to annihilate them. Upon arriving at his destination, he discovered a mission of five villages, four being Algonquin and one Huron. Of this Shea says: "The Hurons and Kiskakons were chiefly Christians, the Sinagaux and Keinouches bitterly opposed to the Faith. The Hurons assembled in their village to receive him; but Marquette, little versed in their language, was unable to minister to their wants. The Kiskakons received him joyfully, and afforded him much consolation. At a word, they renounced practices still retained, but savoring of superstition; and the sick earnestly begged his presence to keep off the medicine men. The skillful Missionary Marquette did not endeavor to alter their time-honored customs, unless when sinful. Prayer replaced idolatrous ceremonies in their festivals, and acts of adoration their senseless juggleries. To enjoy the labors of the Missionary the more, they separated from the rest, and erected their winter cabins around his chapel."

In the meantime, Father Dablon remained at the new mission designated St. Mary du Sault. Here the only permanent residents were the Sauteurs, a small tribe of some one hundred and fifty in number, although the mission was greatly augmented by hunters from the Noquet, Chippewa, Marameg and numerous other tribes residing on the islands round about, as well as the Kilistinons and Winnebagoes, belonging in the interior, who all came to this vicinity on account of the remarkably rich fisheries to be found there.

At this time Father Marquette was making a painstaking and persistent effort to perfect himself in the language of the Illinois, for which purpose he studied assiduously under the direction of an Illinois captive. At this period, therefore, we see the field comprising the Western missions under the immediate direction of three of the most devoted and enterprising of the missionary force; for by this time Allouez had completed his journey, having arrived at Green Bay early in the month of December, and celebrated his first Mass at that point on the feast of St. Francis Xavier, in whose honor the mission was also named. The Indian town located at this place was of a particularly nondescript character, being composed of Sacs, Foxes, Pottawattomies and Winnebagoes, the chiefs of which tribes he called into council with a view to obtaining their assistance and coöperation in establishing a mission. His efforts in this direction having been fairly successful, he, without delay, erected a crude bark chapel, in which services were held at regular intervals, and instructions given to those desirous of becoming acquainted with the rites, beliefs and duties connected with an acknowledgment of the Christian Faith. He also devoted much time to visiting among the dwellings of the people, besides which he would go to their contiguous settlements, particularly one occupied by a contingent of Pottawattomies, who were located in the spur of Green Bay.

As the springtime came, he made preparations for more extended journeys, and in April ascended the Fox River to the place where a tribe of that name was located, whence after a brief period he returned to the mission at Green Bay. Thus far he had been greatly impressed with the people with whom he had been brought in contact, a majority of the tribes being powerful, while all of them with the exception of the Winnebagoes spoke the Algonquin[1] dialects.

He also labored successfully among the Menomonees, who were, however, less representative as a whole in matter of strength and importance than those already named. With the Winnebagoes he experienced more difficulty, owing to the fact that they were not familiar with the common tongue. In fact, their language, Shea writes, "he found new and strange, with no analogy to the Huron and Algonquin." He quickly overcame these difficulties, however, and it was not long before he had acquired such proficiency in the language that he was enabled to translate the Lord's Prayer and Angelical Salutation with a brief catechism. He was unquestionably most successful in his labors among these people, and, strange as it may seem, acquired a greater influence over them and effected more real and lasting good among them than he had been able to accomplish with the others.

Naturally, it was not so very long before the news of this successful enterprise, and the vast territory offering a field for active operations on the part of the missionaries,

(1) By the Missionaries these various tribes were designated the Upper Algonquins in order to distinguish them from those living farther south and in the neighborhood of Tadoussac and Quebec, to whom the prefix "Lower" was attached. As a rule, these people were called Outouacs, owing to the fact that there were some thirty different tribes located in this section of the country, the first of whom to visit the French settlements at Quebec being the Outouacs, whose name was therefore adopted by the Missionaries in referring to all of the Indians living in that section of the country. It may, however, be said upon this subject, and in order that the different localities may be more definitely fixed in the mind of the reader, that the entire field comprising what has been designated the Ottawa Mission was occupied by or divided into three distinct missions, each of which had its central or objective point. The extreme limits of the Ottawa field were designated by the falls of St. Mary's, at which place the first of those missions, Sainte Marie du Sault, was established; the western limit, or rather central point of the western limit, was located at Chequamegon Bay, and part of the year on the neighboring (Apostle) islands, where the Outouacs and Hurons of the Tobacco nation made their annual excursions to fish and raise corn. It is probable, in fact, that these people devoted a greater portion of the year to such pursuits on these islands, especially on La Pointe Island, where, as spiritual director, both Allouez and Marquette followed them. Here was established the mission of the Holy Ghost, while the central and probably most important of these missions found its location at the head of the Bay du Puants, or Green Bay, at which, as we have elsewhere stated, Allouez established the mission of St. Francis Xavier.

reached the Superior at Quebec, and impressed him to such an extent with the magnitude of the opportunity afforded, that it was determined with as little delay as possible to send forth an additional force of missionaries to aid in the furtherance of the work. To the accomplishment of this noble and inspiring work, the venerable Father Dreuillettes and Father Louis André were assigned, departing for this new field in 1670.

At the Sault, Father Dreuillettes effected many noticeable and valuable changes, being greatly aided in this by his remarkable skill in curing the afflicted during a period of epidemic in that region. In fact, such a power did he become among the people, that in a general council held by the Sachems in the earlier part of October, 1670, it was declared that the Sault was Christian, and henceforth adopted the God of "the prayer" as the Master of life. "Then," writes Shea, "the minds were open to light, the hearts to grace: in six months one hundred and twenty children were baptized, and when in January, 1671, the church and mission house were destroyed by fire, Dreuillettes, who had saved nothing but the Blessed Sacrament, began to erect a new and finer one. Within the year he baptized three hundred souls; but Dreuillettes was not only a most successful missionary and able counsellor; he was, in the eyes of his contemporaries, a saint."

In the meantime, the hopes of Marquette, who had assumed most friendly relations with the Sioux, were entirely destroyed by the stupidity of the Ottawas and Hurons located at La Pointe, who unnecessarily brought about a war which compelled them soon after to flee[1] the country. From thence, then, the former removed to Manitouline Island, while the latter not long after removed to Michillimackinac, their place of former residence. To this point they were accompanied, or followed, by Marquette, who established in their midst the mission of St. Ignatius, the chapel connected with the mission being built on the mainland immediately opposite the island. Neither was the spiritual direction of the Ottawas entirely abandoned, as Father André, who as pastor of the tribes located on the islands or along the shores of Lake Huron, hastened to their assistance. With this purpose in view, he left the mission at the Sault on August 28, 1670, and after having paid brief visits to some other tribes along the way, he passed on to St. Simon's, the new Ottawa mission, which had been established on Manitouline Island. This place, henceforth, he made the central point of his mission, although, having ascended the French River to Lake Nipissing, he, during the winter, of 1670-71, remained and labored among the Indians in that locality.

(1) In speaking of the abandonment of this mission, the Relation of 1671 says: "These quarters of the north have their Iroquois just as well as those of the south. Such are certain tribes, called Naudowessies, who have rendered themselves formidable to all their neighbors because they are naturally warlike, and, although they use only the bow and arrow, they use them with such skill and dexterity that in a moment the air is filled with them, especially when, like the Parthians, they turn their faces in flying, for then they are no less to be feared when they flee than when they attack.

"They dwell on the banks and in the vicinity of the great river called Mississippi, and they consist of no less than fifteen villages pretty well settled. Still they do not know how to cultivate the land so as to plant or raise anything. They content themselves with a kind of marsh rye that we call wild rice, which the prairies supply spontaneously. They divide the ground whereon this rice grows, so that each one can reap his own separately without trespassing upon his neighbor's patch. They are located about sixty leagues from the end of Lake Superior towards sunset, in the midst of the tribes of the West, all hostile to them by a general league against the common foe. They speak a language altogether peculiar and entirely different from that of the Algonquins and Hurons, whom they surpass by far in generosity, often being satisfied with the glory of having been victorious, and sending the prisoners back free whom they had captured in battle, without doing them any harm.

"Our Outouac and Hurons of La Pointe du St. Esprit had until now preserved a kind of peace with them. Affairs having become embroiled, however, last winter, so that some murders were even committed on both sides, our Indians had reason to fear that the storm might burst upon them. They considered it safer to leave the place, which, in fact, they did in the spring of 1671, when they withdrew to the lake of the Hurons. The Outouacs went to live at the island of Ekaentoton (Manitouline) with those of their tribe who last year had gone there in advance, and where we afterwards established the mission of St. Simon. The Hurons settled on the famous island of Michillimackinac, where we commenced last winter the mission of St. Ignace.

"As in such like migrations peoples' minds are not calm enough, Father Marquette, who had charge of the mission of the Holy Ghost, had more to suffer than to do for the conversion of these people. With the exception of some few children whom he baptized, the sick he consoled, and the instructions he continued for those who make profession of Christianity, he was unable to pay much attention to the conversion of the rest. He was obliged like them to abandon this post, to follow his flock, undergo the same hardships and encounter the same dangers as they, to go to this country of Michillimackinac where they had formerly dwelt. They have good reason for preferring this locality to many others on account of the advantages we have mentioned above, and also because the climate seems to be entirely different there from that of the surrounding country; for the winter is somewhat short, not having begun till long after Christmas, and ended towards the middle of March, when we saw spring return."

During the period of uncertainty which emphasized the labors of the missionaries at the Sault and Chequamegon, the mission of St. Francis Xavier at Green Bay was developing the most satisfactory results. In fact, it may be said to have been regarded as the forlorn hope of the missionaries, whose only manner of reaching the out-lying nations was by means of the Fox River, all other avenues having been closed by the aggressiveness and hostility of the Dakotas. The position of all was a most trying one; and it was at this juncture, owing to the plausible attitude of a number of Illinois with whom they met, that the mission of their country, of which already an account has been given, was projected. But, although greatly discouraged, they by no means resigned themselves to the surrounding conditions, the zealous Allouez laboring thoughout the following winter in Wisconsin, where he divided his time between the Miamis and Mascoutins, who attended the mission of St. Francis Xavier, and also at St. Mark's, where the Foxes resided.

Another change was experienced at that time in the departure of Father Dablon for Quebec, where he had been ordered to assume the duties of Superior of the Canada missions. He, however, was quickly succeeded by Father Henry Nouvel, an experienced missionary worker who had done valuable service for a number of years among the tribes inhabiting the country of the Lower St. Lawrence and Saguenay. Upon the arrival of Father Nouvel at the Sault, André took his departure for Green Bay, where he found a most dangerous as well as unpromising field. Not long had he been there, in fact, when his home and winter supplies were burnt about him, and his life was not infrequently threatened.

In the meantime, Father Nouvel made a journey among the numerous tribes occupying the territory between the northern shore of Lake Huron and Lake Nipissing. In this undertaking he obtained assistance from Louis, who had been converted to the Christian belief under the administration of Ménard, and was now a leader among the Christian element of his people at Manitouline. Dreuillettes also continued to work at the Sault, while Marquette devoted a considerable portion of his time to those living at Mackinaw and in the country round about.

Of the work accomplished by Allouez, many gratifying reports were received, his efforts being spoken of by Shea as follows: "Allouez meanwhile had planted a towering cross at St. James of the Masccutins, and by Assumption Day, 1672, opened his chapel of mats to the Illinois, Kickapoos, Mascoutins, Miamis and Weas cabined there. So great was the curiosity of the throng, that they broke into the sides of his chapel, and Allouez at last came forth, and, when silence had been proclaimed by an aged chief, rose to speak. 'God gave me grace to speak Miami,' says he. In that tongue he poured forth words of truth and love. His long instruction was heard with wonder; for so fluctuating was the population that few had ever heard or seen him before. He now began regular instruction in his chapel for the various tribes, visited each nation, cabin by cabin, instructing, consoling, baptizing the sick. When about to depart, he met a band of the Illinois whom he also instructed, and whose surprise was endless at his attention to a poor sick boy. For philanthropy and benevolence are but vain shadows of Christian charity, which is found only where the Cross has been planted. With these, the Pottawattomies near Green Bay, and the Foxes of St. Mark's, he spent the year. The latter had received from the Iroquois calumnies against the missionaries, and, losing some Christians in war, began to view Allouez with suspicion. Yet his mission during the year shows nearly two hundred baptisms."[1] Here we are afforded, then, a fair insight into the life and experience of mission work such as applied to this zealous and tireless worker.

In the meantime, Father Dreuillettes was meeting with reasonable success in his undertakings, continuing by his wonderful powers in affording relief to physical ailment, in inducing many to renounce their sinful mode of life and the many superstitions and vagaries pertaining to idolatrous worship. Father Nouvel also met with much success, although his experiences were of a more stormy character, and numerous were the occasions when his life was in greatest jeopardy. Other dangers also distinguished his journeyings among the people, one of which Shea recites as follows: "Anxious to reach his mission, he prepared to launch his canoe, when the Indians, pointing to the coming storm, implored him to stay; but he put off boldly, and after gazing at him for a time, they retired. Soon the storm came on in all its fury; and Nouvel, unable to paddle, advance, or return, lay down in the bottom of his canoe, and let it drive before the storm. At last he felt that it was approaching the shore—that the Holy Family, constantly invoked, had not rejected him. In a few moments he sprang ashore, and, to his wonder, beheld a new mercy. He was at the very spot whence he had started, but his absence had saved his life. A tree had been struck by lightning, and the forest far around was wrapped in flames."

So the work continued among the vicissitudes, privations, changes and moral eruptions so frequent in occurrence. In 1674, as a result of continued hostilities between the Sioux and Algonquins, the church erected by Father Dreuillettes was burnt to the ground. In the strengthened by the advent of Father Peter Bailloquet, who assumed the duties previously maintained by Father Nouvel, who in turn moved farther east, wandering among the residents about Lake Erie. He returned to the Sault, however, in 1676, accompanied by Father Peter A. Bonneault; together they preached the Word throughout the entire length of the journey. Meantime, Father Dreuillettes worked on alone at the Sault, the difficulties of his position being intensified by fast advancing age and consequent infirmities, against which, however, he struggled with the utmost persistency. But the end was fast approaching, and in 1679, unable longer to resist the encroachments of nature and the results of his vigorous and tempestuous career, he returned to Quebec, where he died during the following year.

In the meantime, the mission originally established by Father Marquette was conducted by Father Philip Pierson, whose persistent exertions resulted in the erection of a new and substantial church at this mission of the Hurons. The immediate cause for the coming of Father Pierson to the mission at this particular time, was owing to further and more important demands made upon the services of Marquette, whose removal from the charge, however, it was understood, was but of a temporary nature. He, in fact, in conjunction with the explorer Joliet[2] had been appointed by Louis de

(2) Of the early history of the explorer but little, we believe, is known. He obtained his education in the Jesuit College at Quebec, and afterwards, report has it, was for some time an assistant in that institution. Finally severing his connection with the college, he proceeded west with the intention of bettering his fortunes in the fur trade. It was the experience gained while in pursuit of this undertaking and the intimate associations with the Missionaries which also accrued therefrom, that induced the government to select him as the most fitting person to whom to relegate the extremely dangerous and difficult task of exploring the Mississippi River. This selection, it would seem, was also highly gratifying to Father Marquette.

Baude, Comte de Frontenac, successor to M. de Courcelles as Governor of Canada, as a commissioner to explore the Mississippi. To make preparations for such an arduous undertaking, the winter months of 1672 were entirely devoted. On May 17 they left Mackinaw in two small birch canoes, in which, accompanied by five Frenchmen who had volunteered their services for the occasion, they traveled to the south of the Arkansas River, which empties into the Mississippi at a point some considerable distance southeast of the present city of Little Rock, and almost diagonally across from Rusedale, Mississippi. Passing up the Menominee River, they visited with the Indians living along its banks, who on learning of their intentions endeavored by every means in their power to dissuade them from undertaking so difficult and perilous a task. The way which they would have to travel, it was explained, was not only full of dangers, but was infested by treacherous and crafty tribes from whom no mercy could be expected, as well as by other hidden and undreamed-of conditions. Not to be deterred, however, from carrying out their long-cherished designs, and thanking the Indians courteously for their well-meant advice, they again embarked, and continuing their journey, soon after arrived at the mission of St. Francis Xavier, at the head of Green Bay, where they found over two thousand Indian converts established. From thence they passed up the Fox River, a difficult passage, owing to many rapids and hidden rocks which were met with along the way, navigated along Lake Winnebago, from which they entered the Upper Fox River, arriving, on June 7 at the village of the Mascoutins. This village was situated at a point about two miles from the river, on a rising piece of ground which commanded a beautiful view of the surrounding country, and here they found a mixed population of the Mascoutin, Miami, and Kickapoo tribes, the Miami being, in their estimation, particularly tractable and intelligent.

One of the first and most interesting objects to greet the eye of the Missionary was a large cross erected in the center of the village, which was ornamented with numerous gifts made in thanksgiving to the Great Spirit for their success in hunting during the previous season. Soon after the arrival of the party, the chiefs and Sachems of the tribe called upon them, the explorer informing them of the material cause of their visit in behalf of the French Government, while Marquette explained to them that he had been sent on the part of the Almighty to enlighten them in the ways of Christianity. "The Master of our lives," said he, "desires to be known by all nations. To obey His will, I fear not death, to which I am exposing myself in making such a perilous voyage." Having made the usual number of presents to the Indians, the voyageurs, accompanied by two Miami guides, left the village, being attended by them to a point nine miles below, where it was necessary to portage between the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers. Having knelt down and most earnestly invoked the Blessed Virgin, and placing themselves and their enterprise under her special protection, they again embarked, passing down the Wisconsin, until, on June 17, they entered the Mississippi River.

Thus they journeyed on until the 25th, when they came across the first evidence to indicate that the country through which they were passing was inhabited. At about a hundred leagues below the spot where they had portaged into the Wisconsin, they noticed a beaten and evidently well-used track, passing from the beach into an unusually attractive prairie country. Interested exceedingly in these probable conditions, and naturally desiring to become acquainted with the people living there, the Missionary and explorer at once landed, and leaving their companions in charge of the canoe, immediately began to follow the pathway into the interior, which being followed a distance of nearly five leagues brought them to a village of the Illinois, where they were received most kindly.

Of their reception by these people, Father Verwyst in his account says: "The Indians deputed four old men to go and speak to the pale-faced strangers. Two of them carried pipes ornamented with feathers. Walking very slowly, they now and then raised their pipes towards the sun, as if offering it to that luminary to smoke, but said not a word. When near, they stood still and regarded the two strange visitors from head to foot. Father Marquette seeing by these ceremonies that the Indians regarded them with favor, and noticing, moreover, that they had several articles of European manufacture, he judged that they were on friendly terms with the French. He, therefore, broke silence, asking them who they were. They said they were Illinois, and offering them as a mark of friendship the calumet, or the pipe of peace, they invited them to their village.

"At the door of the cabin which they were to enter,

Together, then, these two noble and adventurous spirits explored the Great River, settling beyond all peradventure of a doubt any question as regards its course. Unfortunately, while returning, Joliet lost all of the documents and memoranda which he had accumulated regarding the enterprise, so that the report made was of an entirely verbal nature. This report, when reduced to writing, was quite voluminous, and should have been the means of furthering the explorer's interests, so that he might, as preconceived and desired, continue a series of explorations which this first venture had suggested to his fertile and energetic mind. But here again the historical lack of appreciation and gratitude—characteristic of most governments—was exemplified in the gift of an insignificant island (Anticosti) in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, which was considered by the French Government as a full and even liberal equivalent for the perils undertaken, and value of the discovery. On this island, then, Joliet built a fort and dwelling for his family, besides numerous other buildings to be used in proposed trade with the natives.

With the latter undertaking he did but little, as we soon after find him once more employed in behalf of the Government to whom he rendered many valuable services in the West. Then his island fell into the hands of the British, while his family, including himself, were made prisoners by the British Commander Phipps. Of his subsequent history but little is known in addition to the fact that, after an active and adventurous life, he finally died some time during the early part of the eighteenth century.

stood an old man, his hands open and stretched out towards the sun as if to ward off his rays, which, nevertheless, passed between his extended fingers, and lit up his face. When the Father and his companion approached, the old man addressed them as follows: 'How beautiful, O Frenchman, is the sun, when thou comest to visit us! All our village awaits thee, and thou shalt enter all our cabins in peace.' He then led them into his cabin, where a great crowd, as Father Marquette graphically describes it, devoured them with their eyes. They observed profound silence; however, occasionally these words were heard, spoken in a low voice: 'How good it is, brothers, that you visit us.' They then offered their visitors the pipe of peace to smoke, which Father Marquette and his colleague accepted, after which all the headmen smoked in honor of their guests.

"Soon an invitation came from the head chief of the tribe to visit his village, as he desired to hold a council with them. On their way thither the two men were accompanied by the whole village. The people who had never seen a Frenchman before could not satisfy themselves looking at the strangers. Some would sit down on the grass along the path where they were to pass by; others would run ahead and then turn back to meet them, thus to get a good look at them. But all this was done noiselessly, and in a most respectful manner.

"When they arrived at the village of the great chief, they saw him standing in front of his cabin in the midst of two old men with their calumet turned towards the sun. He bade them welcome in a neat little speech, and offered them his pipe to smoke. Seeing them all assembled and silent, Father Marquette spoke to them by four presents which he gave them. By the first, he told them that he and his party were traveling in peace to visit the nations that lived along the Great River as far as the sea. By the second present, he told them that God who had created them had compassion on them, since after so long a time in which they had been ignorant of Him He willed to make himself known to all these people; that he was sent on the part of God for this very purpose, and that it was for them to recognize and obey Him. By the third present, he said that the great chief of the French informed them that it was he that made peace everywhere, having subdued the Iroquois. Finally, by the fourth, he requested them to give him all the information they could about the sea and the nations whom they would have to pass to get there. When Father Marquette had concluded his discourse, the chief arose, and laying his hand on the head of the little slave whom he meant to give them as a present, he spoke as follows: 'I thank thee, Black-gown, and thee, Frenchman—addressing Joliet—for having taken so much trouble to come and visit us. Never was the earth so beautiful, nor the sun so bright, as to-day; never was our river so calm, nor so free from rocks which your canoes have removed in passing by; never had our tobacco so good a flavor, nor had our corn appeared so flourishing as we now see it. Behold, here is my son, whom I give to thee that thou mayest know my heart. I implore thee to have pity on me, and all my people. Thou knowest the Great Spirit who made us all. Thou speakest to Him and hearest His word. Ask Him to grant me life and health, and do thou come and live with us, to make us know Him.'

"The chief then placed the little slave near them. As a second present, he gave them the mysterious calumet, which they prized more highly than a slave. By this present, he showed his great respect for the French Governor. By the third present, he begged of them on the part of his people not to go any farther on account of the great danger to which they would expose themselves. The Father replied that he feared not death, and esteemed no happiness greater than that of sacrificing his life for the glory of Him who made all things. This was a thing beyond their comprehension." Then followed a banquet, after which the entire village was visited by the travelers—no small task in itself, as there were not less than three hundred lodges. Having accomplished the object of their visit, the voyagers left the village on the following day (July 26), and reëmbarked soon after arriving at the place where the Missouri empties into the Mississippi. Here they were exposed to considerable danger, owing to the vast amount of debris which came floating down from the Missouri with such impetuosity as to make it almost impossible for them to effect a crossing. After considerable labor and delay, however, they made the passage in safety, and having traveled some twenty leagues in an almost southerly direction, came to the Ouaboukigou, or Ohio River. Near the mouth of this river, they discovered a settlement of Chaouanons (Shawnees or Southerners), a powerful and populous tribe, who occupy twenty-three villages; while in another locality, fifteen other villages were found. These people were of a peaceful and inoffensive disposition, which fact caused them to frequently fall victims to the predatory raids of their blood-thirsty contemporaries, the Iroquois. Continuing on their way, the travelers at length reached the mouth of the Arkansas River, but three or four days distant from the Gulf of Mexico, when they determined to return and report to their respective superiors. Having now spent a month in exploring this grandest of all American rivers, they, on July 17, started on the return journey. Passing up stream, they again visited with the friendly Indians whom they had met along the route while on their downward journey, Father Marquette making it the occasion of again impressing upon them the necessity of wholly accepting and adhering to the one true Faith. At a point a little farther north, they entered the Illinois River, where they met with still another village at a place called Kaskaskia, the settlement consisting of some seventy-four lodges. Leaving here, they were accompanied by a chief and several braves, who attended them to the headwaters of the Illinois River and Lake Michigan, where it became necessary for them to make a portage. Here they bade adieu to these friendly people, and, passing along the eastern shore of the lake without further incident, arrived safely at the mission of St. Francis Xavier, towards the end of September, and after an absence of nearly four months.[1]

Worn and fatigued by his perilous journey, Father Marquette now remained at the mission of St. Francis Xavier until the autumn of 1674, when, somewhat recovered, he again prepared to journey southward among the people with whom he had frequently been so successful. On this errand bent, he started out on October of that year, accompanied by the Frenchmen, Pierre Porteret and Jacques, his particular purpose being the establishment of a mission among the Illinois. The weather at this time became exceedingly unsettled, so that it was only by continuous exertion that they were able to make any headway at all. By persistent effort, however, they managed to reach Sturgeon Bay by the 27th, the following three days being devoted to the transportation of their baggage and canoes across a three mile-portage to Lake Michigan. Having concluded this arduous task, they, in company with several Pottawattomies and Illinois, began their journey down the western shore of the lake. From this point, progress became slow and uncertain, owing to the continually increasing inclemency of the weather, and finally, overcome by hardship and the encroachments of an insidious disease which had long since fastened upon him, Father Marquette decided to go into winter quarters. On December 14, therefore, they went into camp some six miles down the Chicago River, where there was a short portage between that stream and the Illinois River. He remained at this place until March 29, 1675, when, though still suffering from and sadly enfeebled by this seemingly incurable malady, he again started out, reaching Kaskaskia on April 8. Here he labored zealously and with marked success[2] until increasing weakness compelled him to desist and attempt the thus augmented difficulties of a journey homeward to the mission. On reaching Lake Michigan, with still one hundred leagues to go, it became evident that, in spite of every effort to the contrary, his life was but the question of a few days at most. Of this he was himself particularly convinced, so much so, in fact, that he designated a bluff at the entrance of a river they were approaching as the place of his interment.

There they carried him ashore and there, realizing the brief limit of life which still remained for him, yet exuberant with holy fervor, he died[3] and was buried May, 18, 1675. Nearly two years later his remains were exhumed by a party of Kiskakons, who reverently bore them to the mission of St. Ignace at Michillimackinac, and there, with all due ceremony, they were deposited in a vault prepared in the center of the mission church, on June 18, 1677. Thus passed from earth one of the most remarkable men of his century; a man who, feeling as well as knowing his duty towards God, never faltered, but on the contrary,

(1) The following distances, which we copy from the Library of American Biography, were furnished by General Wool, Inspector-General of the Army of the United States, and are recognized as furnishing a correct idea of the extended travel involved in the voyage of discovery along the Mississippi and adjacent rivers, as undertaken by Father Marquette and the explorer Joliet:

From Green Bay up the Fox River to the portage, one hundred and seventy-five miles; from the portage down the Wisconsin to the Mississippi, one hundred and seventy-five miles; from the mouth of the Wisconsin to the mouth of the Arkansas, one thousand and eighty-seven miles; from the Arkansas to the Illinois River, five hundred and forty-seven miles; from Chicago to Green Bay by the Lake Shore, two hundred and sixty miles; total, two thousand five hundred and forty-seven miles.

General Wool observes that some persons estimate the route about fifty miles more; but he thinks it will rather fall short than exceed the above result. It would appear, therefore, that the whole distance passed over by Marquette and Joliet in this tour was at least two thousand five hundred miles. Considering the manner in which Father Marquette traveled, being conveyed in boats up and down rivers through an unknown country, it cannot be supposed that his estimates of distances would be exact, particularly as he had no means of deciding the velocity with which he was carried along by the currents of the streams. Deceived by the rapid motion of the water, he reckoned the distance from the portage to the mouth of the Wisconsin to be forty leagues, or one hundred and twenty miles, whereas General Wool states it to be one hundred and seventy-five; and Mr. Schoolcraft, who ascended the river, estimated the distance at one hundred and eighty-two miles from Prairie du Chien to the portage.

(2) "Still visiting at this place," Father Verwyst tells us, "he went from cabin to cabin, instructing the Indians on our holy Faith. Several times, also, he assembled the chiefs and headmen, explaining to them the truth of religion. At length, on Holy Thursday, he convened a general assembly of all the people in an open prairie near the village. Mats and bear skins were spread on the ground for the people to sit on. The Father attached four large pictures of the Blessed Virgin to a pole so as to be seen by all the people. The auditory consisted of five hundred chiefs and headmen, seated in a circle around the Father. Fifteen hundred young men stood outside this circle, besides a very great number of women and children.

"He spoke ten words to them by ten presents that he made them. He discoursed on the principle truths of religion and dwelt especially on the death of Jesus Christ on the Cross for man's redemption. After the sermon, he offered up the Holy Sacrifice. On Easter Sunday another great meeting of the Indians took place, at which he said Mass again and preached to his Indian hearers with the fiery zeal of an apostle. The good people listened to the Father with great joy and approbation. He told them he was obliged to leave on account of his ailment and how happy he felt at their receiving so well the instruction he gave them. They begged of him to return as soon as possible. He promised to do so or if he should not be able to come himself, then some Father would take his place, and instruct them. They escorted him more than thirty leagues of the way, contending with one another for the honor of carrying his little baggage."

(3) Father James Marquette was born in 1637 at Laon in Picardy in the present department of Aisne, where his family had long held distinguished rank. His mother was a relative of the venerable John B. de la Salle, the founder of the Christian schools. Entering the Society of Jesus 1654, he was for twelve years employed in studying or teaching; then exchanged from his province of Champagne to that of France, he came to Canada. After studying Montagnais under Drouilettes, he went to the West, and after founding Sault Ste. Mary's, became the Missionary of the Ottawas and Hurons at la Pointe, with whom he removed to Mackinaw. Zealous, laborious, cheerful, mild and humble, he was the same in life as in death—forgetful of self. His last thoughts were for his companions; his last entry in his journal, sympathy for the sufferings of the traders. Of his own, he never spoke. His devotion to the Immaculate Conception was wonderful. He never wrote a letter without mentioning it. He gave that name to his Illinois mission and to the Great River which he discovered. He died at the age of forty-eight.—Shea.

aware of the dangers, privations and discomforts attending such an undertaking, went manfully, even joyously, forth to work the Master's will. To the struggling missions of that day, his seemed indeed an irreparable loss; so true, so faithful and so single of heart had he been in carrying the trust imposed. Never a thought of self was there in one act performed; fatigue passed unnoticed, pain was ignored, and even Death's relentless clutch had no terrors for him who but saw in its approach the guerdon of Everlasting Peace and Divine Approbation.

Of this sad event the Relations give the following account: "A week before his death he had the precaution to bless some holy water to serve him through the rest of his illness, in his agony, and at his burial, and he instructed his companions how to use it. The eve of his death, which was a Friday, he told them, all radiant with joy, that it would take place on the morrow. During the whole day he conversed with them about the manner of his burial, the way in which he should be laid out, the place to be selected for his interment; he told them how to arrange his hands, feet and face, and directed them to raise a cross over his grave. He even went so far as to enjoin them, only three hours before he expired, to take his chapel bell as soon as he would be dead, and ring it while they carried him to the grave. Of all these he spoke so calmly and collectedly that you would have thought he spoke of the death and burial of another and not of his own.

"Thus did he speak with them as they sailed along the lake, till, perceiving the mouth of a river with an eminence on the bank which he thought suited to his burial, he told them it was the place of his last repose. They wished, however, to pass on, as the weather permitted it, and the day was not far advanced; but God raised a contrary wind which obliged them to return and enter the river pointed out by Father Marquette. They then carried him ashore, kindled a little fire, and raised a wretched bark cabin for him, where they laid him as little uncomfortably as they could; but they were so overcome by sadness, that, as they afterwards said, they did not know what they were doing.

"The Father being thus stretched on the shore, like St. Francis Xavier, as he had always so ardently desired, and left alone amid those forests—for his companions were engaged in unloading—he had leisure to repeat all the acts in which he had employed himself during the preceding days. When his dear companions afterwards came up, quite dejected, he consoled them, and gave them hopes that God would take care of them after his death in those new and unknown countries. He gave them his last instructions, thanked them for all the charity they had shown during the voyage, begged their pardon for the trouble he had given them, and directed them also to ask pardon in his name of all our Fathers and Brothers in the Ottawa country, and then disposed them to receive the Sacrament of Penance, which he administered to them for the last time. He also gave them a paper, on which he had written all his faults since his last confession, to be given to his Superior, to oblige him to pray more fervently for him. In fine, he promised not to forget them in Heaven, and as he was very kind-hearted and knew them to be worn out with the toil of the preceding days, he bade them go and take a little rest, assuring them that his hour was not so near, but that he would wake them when it was time, as, in fact, he did two or three hours after, calling them when about to enter his agony.

"When they came near, he embraced them for the last time, while they melted into tears at his feet. He then asked for the holy water and his reliquary, and taking off his crucifix, which he wore around his neck, he placed it in the hands of one, asking him to hold it constantly opposite him, raised before his eyes. Then, feeling that he had but little time to live, he made a last effort, clasped his hands, and with his eyes fixed sweetly on his crucifix, he pronounced aloud his profession of faith, and thanked the Divine Majesty for the immense grace He did him in allowing him to die in the Society of Jesus; to die in it as a missionary of Jesus Christ, and, above all, to die in it as he had always asked, in a wretched cabin, amid the forests, destitute of all human aid.

"On this he became silent, conversing inwardly with God; yet from time to time words escaped him, 'Sustinuit anima mea in verbo ejus—my soul hath relied on His word,' or, 'Mater die, memento mei—Mother of God, remember me,' which were the last words he uttered before entering on his agony, which was very calm and gentle. He had prayed his companions to remind him, when they saw him about to expire, to pronounce frequently the names of Jesus and Mary. When he could not do it himself, they did it for him; and when they thought him about to die, one cried aloud: 'Jesus, Maria.' which he several times repeated distinctly; and then, as if at those sacred names something had appeared to him, he suddenly raised his eyes above his crucifix, fixing them apparently on some object which he seemed to regard with pleasure, and thus, with a countenance all radiant with smiles, he expired without a struggle, as gently as if he had sunk into a quiet sleep (May 18, 1675).[1]

(1) An interesting though entirely different account of the death of Marquette is to be found in an address by the Hon. Judge Law, delivered before the Young Men's Catholic Literary Institute, Cincinnati, on Wednesday evening, January 31, 1855, which is as follows:

"When on his voyage from Chicago to this Island of Mackinaw, he entered on the 18th of May, 1675, the mouth of a small river on the western shore of Lake Michigan, known on the old map as 'Riviere du P. Marquette,' erected his altar for the purpose of saying Mass at some little distance from the companions of his voyage, having first requested

"His two poor companions, after shedding many tears over his body, and having laid it out as he had directed, carried it devoutly to the grave, ringing the bell according to his injunction, and raised a large cross near it, to serve as a mark for passers-by. When they talked of embarking, one of them, who for several days had been overwhelmed with sadness, and so racked in body by acute pains that he could neither eat nor breathe without pain, resolved, whilst his companion was preparing all for embarkation, to go to the grave of his good Father, and pray him to intercede for him with the glorious Virgin as he had promised, not doubting that he was already in Heaven. He accordingly knelt down, said a short prayer, and having respectfully taken some earth from the grave, he put it on his breast, whereupon the pain immediately ceased; his sadness was changed into joy, which continued during the rest of the voyage.

"God did not choose to suffer so precious a deposit to remain unhonored and forgotten amid the woods. The Kiskakon Indians, who for the last ten years publicly professed Christianity, in which they were first instructed by Father Marquette, when stationed at La Pointe du St. Esprit at the extremity of Lake Superior, were hunting last winter on the banks of Lake Illinois. As they were returning early in the spring, they resolved to pass by the tomb of their good Father, whom they tenderly loved, and God even gave them the thought of taking his remains and bringing them to our church at the mission of St. Ignatius (Ignace), at Michillimackinac, where they reside.

"They accordingly repaired to the spot, and after some deliberation they resolved to proceed with their Father, as they usually do with those whom they respect. They opened the grave, divested the body; and though the flesh and intestines were all dried up, they found it whole, the skin being in no way injured. This did not prevent their dissecting it according to custom. They washed the bones and dried them in the sun. Then putting them neatly in a box of birch bark, they set out to bear them to the house of St. Ignatius (Ignace).

"The convoy consisted of nearly thirty canoes in excellent order, including even a good number of Iroquois, who had joined our Algonquins to honor the ceremony. As they approached our house, Father Nouvel, who is Superior, went to meet them with Father Pierson, accompanied by all the French and Indians of the place. Having caused the convoy to stop, they made the ordinary interrogations to verify the fact that the body which they bore was really Father Marquette's. Then, before landing, he intoned the 'De Profundis' in sight of the thirty canoes still on the water, and of all the people on the shores. After this, the body was carried to the church, observing all that the ritual prescribes for such ceremonies. It remained exposed under a pall stretched as if over a coffin all the day, which was Pentecost Monday, the 8th of June (1667). The next day, when all the funeral honors had been paid it, it was deposited in a little vault, in the middle of the church, where he reposes as the guardian angel of our Ottawa missions. The Indians often come to pray on his tomb."

Of the discovery at a later date of the grave of this most remarkable man, an incident necessarily of more than usual interest and importance to the present generation, we learn more definitely than from any other source, from a communication of the Rev. Father E. Jacker[1] to the Rev. Chrysostom Verwyst, O. S. F., writ-the two men who were his voyagers to leave him alone for the space of half an hour. This time having expired, his companions went in search of him, and were astonished to find him dead. The soul of this good and great man had taken its flight to another and better world; and in accordance with a presentiment no doubt entertained by him, as he remarked to his companions when landing, 'here will be the end of my voyage.' As it was too far to Mackinac to remove his body there, it was buried on the bank of the river, which, according to Charlevoix, who visited it in 1721, had since the burial of Marquette receded little by little from the grave, as if respecting the burial place.' The following year one of the two voyagers who had accompanied him, and assisted in performing the last duties to this enterprising and devoted son of the Church, returned to the place where he had been interred, and carried his remains to Mackinaw. The Indians after his death gave to the stream on which he was buried the name of 'Riviere de la Robe Noire'; the French that of 'P. Marquette'; and these voyagers of the inland sea of Michigan for years did not fail to invoke the spirit of the sainted man as their frail barks braved the tempest of the lakes on their annual voyages to Mackinaw. And the Algonquin as he coasted its borders or hunted along its banks, cast his votive offering on the resting-place of one whose amenity of manners, goodness of heart and kindness of feeling had endeared him to every tribe from the mouth of the Huron to Sault Ste. Marie—from Chicago to Michillimackinac. Yet at this time not a cross marks the place of his death, not a stone shows that of his grave; and the traveler as he is carried by the genius of Fulton, with all the appliances of comfort and luxury through the waters of Michigan, may inquire in vain where he died, or where he was buried."

Regarding Father Marquette's participation in the discovery of the Mississippi, Mr. Law also spoke as follows:

"It is to be presumed that Marquette was not ignorant as late as 1673, when he left Green Bay, that missions had already been established in the Illinois some years before; and the eclat attending the discovery might have induced him to withhold all the sources of information, which as a discoverer alone, and not as a missionary, might have been in his possession."

This naturally enough raised a storm of protests, some of which called into question the sincerity of purpose on the part of the speaker in such emphatic language, that as a matter of personal justification he felt bound to make what he deemed an elaborate defense of the position taken by him in regard to the matter. From this reply we cull the following as pertinent to the subject in question, and which undoubtedly will prove of unquestionable interest to the reader:

"I have too high a regard for the memory of that great and good man Marquette to be willing even unwittingly to do him an injustice. I accord to him fully the merits of the first discovery of the Mississippi; and have not the slightest doubt that to his explorations we owe the first knowledge of the 'Father of Waters.' But from all I have read or seen or heard, I am yet unconvinced that years before Marquette ascended the Fox and descended the Wisconsin to its junction with the Mississippi the Jesuit Fathers starting from Chicago had not established their missions on the Mississippi at Cahokia and Kaskaskia, as well as at Peoria on the Illinois. True they had not descended the Mississippi, but overland through the present state of Illinois—they had reached and established their missions on the Mississippi before Marquette descended that stream. And I do no injustice to Marquette by saying what I believe and what a far greater man than I am was fully convinced of (Bishop Brute), that the missions at Cahokia and Kaskaskia were well known to exist by Father Marquette previous to his leaving Lake Michigan on his voyage of discovery."

(1) The Very Rev. E. Jacker was born September 2, 1827, in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg, Germany. He acquired his education at the University of Tubingen and Munich, and after completing the same emigrated to America in 1854. Having arrived in this country, he served as a professor at St. Vincent's Seminary, Westmoreland County, Pennsylvania, for twelve months, at the end of which period he went to St. Mary's, where he was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Baraga. His first charge was the Indian Mission at L'Anse (now Baraga), where he remained until 1860. While there he attended to the spiritual wants of the Catholics in the Portage Lake mines. For a part of the time (during the years 1866-71) he was in charge of St. Ignatius Church at Houghton, and for a portion of the latter year superintended the building of St. Ann's Church at Hancock, becoming first pastor of the congregation at that place. In 1866 he removed to Marquette as assistant to Bishop Baraga, with whom he remained until 1868. From Marquette he ten May 4, 1886, which the latter has incorporated in his valuable and interesting little work entitled "Misssionary Labors of Fathers Marquette, Ménard and Allouez in the Lake Superior Region." This letter is as follows:

"You wish to learn something reliable about the discovery of Father Marquette's grave, nine years ago, and about the little share I had in the matter. Want of time compels me to be brief. Up to the time when I took charge of the Mackinac and St. Ignace missions (in 1873), I had given but little attention to the question concerning the locality of Father Marquette's Mission, and the church in which his remains were deposited (June 8, 1677); hence I had no preconceived opinion in the matter. It was rather news to me that a local Indian and French tradition pointed to the head of East Moran Bay (south of which the present church and most of the village of St. Ignace are located) as the site of the old Jesuit chapel and the grave of a great priest (Kitchi Mekatewikwanaie). This tradition certainly existed as early as 1821; for about that time an Indian, Joseph Misatago (a very honest and intelligent man, still living) met Father Richard (of Detroit) lost in the woods back of East Moran Bay, whither he had gone in search of any traces that might exist of the church where they said the 'Great Priest' was buried. Moreover, within the memory of some old persons, a squaw was living in the neighborhood of St. Ignace at a advanced age, who asserted to have in her childhood (probably about, or even before, the middle of the last century) seen a large cross standing on or near the beach of the bay, and that this cross marked the site of a church that once existed there. The Indian name itself of that little bay goes far to show that its shores were once inhabited by Father Marquette's Huron flock, for the Ottawas who settled in the neighborhood a little later called it 'The little bay of the Huron Squaws,' i. e., where those squaws went for water (Nadowekweiamishing).

"The study of the Jesuit Relations (1671-79) soon convinced me that the tradition rested on a solid foundation. From these records, whose truthfulness has never been questioned by any man of sense and learning, it plainly appears that the mission chapel built by Father Nouvel about 1674, in which Father Marquette's bones were buried, stood not, as some have supposed, on the island of Mackinac, or on the apex of the southern peninsula commonly called Old Mackinac, but on the point north of the strait, then, as now, called Point St. Ignace. The exact spot, however, could not be made out from the description of the mission in the Relations. That second church was built at some little distance from the bark chapel provisionally put up in the winter of 1673. Close to the church, the Tionnontate Hurons, with whom that Father had come from Chequamegon, lived in a fortified village. And within sight of that village, probably in front of the church, a large cross was erected, about 1678. This is about all that could be gathered from the Relations.

"My own and Father Dwyer's investigations and vain endeavors to find traces of the old mission (the site of which we erroneously surmised to have been on higher ground), helped at least to create a lively interest in the matter, and to keep the people on the alert for any chance 'find.' All we ascertained was the former existence of an extensive Indian village on the bluff overlooking the part of St. Ignace called Vide Poche, north of the bay of a fortified hill, a good quarter of a mile west of the bay, and of a long line of palisades on the low, level ground at the head of the bay. The vestiges of the latter were still visible in the shape of a low straight ridge, running south and north; and the Murray brothers (the owners of the ground) assured us that they had in that neighborhood ploughed up decayed cedar posts. In digging a cellar (in front of what we now believe to have been the Jesuits' church), Mr. David Murray, Sr., had even struck a grave once occupied, to judge from silken stuffs and gold borders found in it, by some person of distinction. Here, in front of the church, as was once customary, the cemetery would seem to have been located. The ground behind that spot was thickly grown over with shrubs and small evergreens. It was there the discovery was made.

"In the evening of May 4, 1877, (very nearly two hundred years after Father Marquette's burial) Peter Grondin, a half-breed, being occupied in clearing the ground for Mr. Patrick Murray, Jr., discovered the rude foundation of a building 36x40 in size, the smaller side facing the lake. Being advised of it the following day, I hastened to the spot.

"The foundation consisted of flat limestones, mostly covered with sand or soil. There were no traces of a chimney—a proof that the building had not been an ordinary dwelling house. But immediately adjoining it to the west, there were the plain traces of a large building, divided into apartments, and furnished with three fireplaces, one of which—to judge from broken implements found in it—had served as a forge. (The Jesuit brothers work at all trades.) At some little distance behind that complex of buildings, there were the remains of a 'root-house.' The whole plan looked ever so much like that of a church, an adjoining sacristy went to Calumet and there organized a congregation and built a church, where he remained until 1873. From there he removed to Mackinaw and St. Ignace, and it was during his residence there that he discovered the remains of Marquette in 1877. It was also during this pastorate that he made numerous visits to the Indians and half-breeds residing along the shore country from Escanaba to Drummond Island. In 1880 he returned to Hancock and again took charge of St. Ann's Congregation. His health then failing, he in 1886 paid a visit to Mount Clemens near Detroit with a hope that he might receive some material benefit. In this, however, he was disappointed, his death occurring September 1, 1887, at the residence of Bishop Vertin, whose vicar-general he was at one time for a term of years.

and residence of priests, with work-shops, a. s. f., all on a small scale. And now, our attention being sharpened, we also discovered what we could have seen before—the traces of seven or eight small log houses, in the shape of square ridges, with a heap of stones—the ruins of a chimney on one side, and a hollow—the former cellar—in the middle. These buildings stood at some distance south of the presumed church. And north of it was the ground cleared long before, where the stumps of cedar posts had been ploughed up.

"A hollow, about five feet deep, in the southwest corner of the chimneyless building (just in front of the spot where in our churches the altar of the Blessed Virgin stands), had at once attracted my attention. But excavations were out of the question, as the owner of the ground had conscientious scruples in regard to having the presumable grave of a holy man disturbed. This gave me (and other persons who took an interest in the matter) ample time to search historical documents before digging up the ground.

"The chief source for ascertaining the exact locality and the surroundings of the Jesuit mission, was found in the second volume of La Hontan's Travels, which contains a description and plan of the Michillimackinac (or St. Ignace) settlement, as it was in 1668, eleven years after Father Marquette's burial. At the sight of that plan, everything at once became clear. There were, first, along the southern border of the little bay, the small houses of the French traders; next, north of these, near the head of the bay, the Jesuits' chapel ('some sort of a church,' as that writer saucily calls it); then, adjoining to the north, but still on the level ground, the Hurons' fortified village; and farther off, on the higher ground north of the bay, the larger Ottawa village. It was impossible not to recognize the perfect correspondence between that plan and the vestiges found on the spot; and every intelligent visitor of the ground during that summer (among them some historical students) declared himself convinced.

"At last, Mr. Murray's scruples being removed, we obtained permission to excavate. Monday, September 3, in the presence of probably not far from two hundred persons—people of the village and neighborhood, with a few tourists and other visitors from a distance—a ditch was drawn across the area of the presumed church; and no traces of former disturbances being found in the sandy and gravelly ground, the cellar-like hollow in the corner was attacked. The expectation was on tip-toe, for by that time almost every one present knew that Father Marquette's bones, having been brought to St. Ignace in a birch bark box (from his grave in Lower Michigan) were buried, together with that box, in a small cellar under the Jesuits' church; and also that this church had been destroyed by fire (in 1705), and never after restored. Had those precious relics been removed before the fire by the missionaries themselves (who burned the chapel to prevent desecration after their departure), or after the destruction by other parties? Either was possible; but if the remains were gone, some trace of the grave, or even the bark casket itself, might be found.

"The fact that the hollow referred to had been a cellar was soon placed beyond question by the digging up of two half decayed corner posts and pieces of plank, and by the exposure of the original level bottom four or five feet below the general surface, and covered with about a foot of decayed vegetable matter. On that floor, quite a number of articles, the evident debris of a wooden building destroyed by fire, were found scattered, such as nails, spikes, the hinge of a door, broken glassware, blackened pieces of mortar (still plainly showing the imprint of cedar logs, the interstices between which they had once filled), superficially burnt pieces of small timber, etc. Finally, near the western end of the cellar, a parched piece of bark came to sight, soon followed by others of various sizes, mostly all more or less scorched. Some of them showed on one side sharply cut edges and inverted borders, and on being handed to the Indians or halfbreeds present, were declared by them to be fragments of a large and strong box (makak). Almost all of these pieces were found underneath the floor of the cellar, in a space evidently once dug out for the purpose of burying something, and now filled with loose blackened sand, quite different from the surrounding clean and pebbly ground. Mixed with that sand and these shreds of bark, there were many small globular pieces of apparently pure lime, quite soft and damp. (Possibly the box might have been covered with a thin layer of lime; this would help to account for the fact that the fire reached the box, which was not likely if it was covered with sand and gravel.) Within the same space, we found two fragments of bone, about the size of the first and second link of your finger. At last, at the depth of about one and a half foot under the floor of the cellar, there appeared a large and strong piece of bark, scorched on the upper side only. It rested perfectly level on three much-decayed sticks, and was plainly still in the same position in which it had first been laid. This piece, about one and one-half foot in length, plainly was but the fragment of a larger one, placed under the box like the pieces of bark which you still see the Indians put on the bottom of graves. (It would not be strange at all if the missionaries had in that matter followed the Indian custom.) That it did not form part of the box, was shown by one well-preserved cor-ner's being cut round with a knife. Below that piece the ground had not been disturbed.

"A careful search within the space excavated under the floor of the cellar led to no further discovery. The evening being nearly spent, we left the ground with mixed feelings of sadness and joy. Our hopes of finding the remains of the saintly Father were disappointed, but all present were satisfied from the overwhelming force of circumstantial evidence that they had beheld the spot where Father Marquette's bones had been buried two hundred years ago, and touched the fragments of the box in which they had been placed for transportation from his first burying place.

"Presuming to be the natural custodians of the articles found in the cellar, and with the silent consent of the owner of the grounds, I took the fragments of bones and birch bark along with me, and caused as much of the debris as I considered serviceable as pieces of evidence to be brought to my house. The following morning duty called me away from home. But great was my surprise when, upon my return, Wednesday evening, a young man of the place (Joseph Marley, now dead) came into my room to hand me a handkerchief full of blackened sand and dust, which he had scraped up from the bottom of the cellar, at some little distance from the deeper hollow, and which contained over thirty small pieces of bone from different parts of the human frame, such as the skull, the hands or feet, the limbs, the spine, etc. There was not one entire bone among them; they all looked like pieces dropped out of larger bones which had been cracked by the heat. Experts to whom these fragments were handed for examination—one of them unaware at the time of the discovery and its circumstances—declared them to be human, very old, and acted upon by intense heat. A surgeon directed my attention to a cut made with some sharp instrument across the upper surface of a fragment of the cranium—perhaps by one of the Ottawas who dissected the body and scraped the skin off the bones before putting them into the box.

"These bones, dug out the day after the discovery, had been covered with sand, in consequence of the caving in of the western bank of the cellar, near which they lay, and toward which we had not extended our search. Their looks and the stuff in which they were bedded, as well as the character of the finder (who neither expected nor got any reward), left no room for the least suspicion of fraud. Besides, at the occasion of leveling the ground for the erection of a little monument, four years ago, a few more fragments of an exactly similar character were found.

"May I suggest the circumstances which would seem to account for the scattering of these bones on the floor of the cellar, outside of the grave? It might have happened in this manner: Some time after the destruction of the church and the departure of the missionaries (whose Christian flock had been persuaded by Cadillac to follow him to his new post of Pontchartrain, or Detroit), some of the remaining pagans, being aware of the remarkable cures wrought at the Father's tomb, may have removed his remains for the purpose of using them as charms, or for medicine—you know the custom of those poor people; or do they not, in your neighborhood, also, carry bones in their 'medicine bags,' or grind them to powder for external use, e. g., to cure the headache by the application of ground skull bones? Now, in taking the bones out of the grave, one of these Indians, squatting in front of it, may have thrown them on the floor of the cellar, near the opposite bank; and there the small fragments, dropping off, remained while the larger bones were distributed among the crowd, and taken away. The shreds of the partly burned box, which might have been thrown out, would have been washed back into the hollow by the rain. The small particles of bone—from the size of a pea to the larger link of your thumb—remained imbedded in the sand, would seem to show that the work was done in haste, and not with that pious care which the missionaries would have employed had they effected exhumation. Besides, they would in all likelihood have taken out the bones with the box (which after twenty-eight years must have been almost as good as new), before, with sad hearts, they set fire to their dear chapel. Perhaps you will ask why they should not have done so, and taken the precious remains along with them to Canada. We would have done so, undoubtedly; but it was not their custom. They left the bones of their fallen brethren where they first laid them to rest, on the field, as it were, of battle. I know of one exception only, in the case of the martyred Brebeuf, whose skull was taken from the shores of Lake Huron to Quebec. But his was an exceptional death, also; nor is it certain that the relic was brought thither by his brethren. Father Marquette, whose fame towers now above that of his not-less-worthy companions in the Western mission, on account of his journey of exploration, did not hold that prominent position two hundred years ago.

"Is it, then, you may ask, absolutely certain that the modest monument erected by the people of the neighborhood in the city of St. Ignace marks the true site of Father Marquette's grave? I am not yet prepared to say so. But I have not heard of, nor can I imagine any circumstance connected with our search, that would warrant any positive doubt. Everything, it seems to me, answers the requirements of good circumstantial proof so nicely—thousands of judicial decisions are rendered on much slighter evidence—that mere chance could have brought about such an orderly combination of facts with as much probability only as two alphabets of type, scattered on the ground, might be expected to form, in the proper succession of letters, the name Marquette. If you or anybody else are leaning more on the side of doubt, I shall not quarrel with you.

"Some of the remains were reinterred under the monument, together with specimens of the debris. Other pieces are in the possession of a number of the admirers of Father Marquette all over the country. The greatest and most interesting collection (the bones being arranged in a neat casket, presented for that purpose by the Rev. Father Faerber of St. Louis) will be piously preserved in the Marquette College of Milwaukee. I thought it would be safer there than in the hands of your friend, E. J."

It was during the year in which the remains of the sainted Marquette were brought to Mackinaw for final interment that Father Nouvel went to that mission, in order that he might assume pastoral charge of the Ottawas. Here, also, soon after his arrival, he built the bark chapel of St. Francis Borgia. In the two missions at this time, there belonged together in the neighborhood of thirteen hundred Kiskakons and five hundred Hurons, the village of each tribe being under the spiritual direction of a catechist, who, after the missionary had completed his instruction, also repeated and explained it at length. The religious fervor exhibited in this locality, in fact, became so pronounced, that Mackinaw was regarded as rivaling both La Prairie and Lorette in the actions and piety of the Christian Indians.

In 1678 additional strength was added to the Ottawa contingent by the arrival of Father John Enjalran, who thereafter was connected with the developments and progress of the work for many years. In the meantime, the mission of St. Francis Xavier at Green Bay was steadily improving, Father Louis André having a congregation of not less than five hundred Christians, that number being gradually, if somewhat slowly, augmented as time passed along. Of course, these successes were not attained without much labor and forbearance, the missionary having to experience many of those periods of depression which followed the numerous and unexpected treacheries that seem to be a normal constituent of the most well meaning among the Indians. Thus, twice he suffered the loss of his house by fire, the destruction of one at Green Bay being quickly followed by that of another at Menominee. These acts of brutality, however, caused but little comment on his part, and he kept on working devotedly and earnestly in behalf of the Indians, spending the greater portion of his time in passing from one to another of the six tribes which composed his entire parish.

Another change in the arrangements of the Western missions occurred in 1676, when Father Charles Albanel was made Superior of that department, taking up his residence at Green Bay, where a new and somewhat more striking edifice than those previously used was erected.

In the meantime, Father Allouez was laboring assiduously among the people of the Fox, Mascoutin and Pottawattomie tribes who dwelt in the territory round about Lake Winnebago and almost directly south of the other mission. He was also given an assistant in the person of Father Arthur Silvy, who arrived in that locality on the 6th of April, 1676. So these two energetic and persevering men labored on until the month of October, when Father Allouez, who had been appointed to succeed the lamented Marquette, set forth to take up his work in the country of the Illinois. From that time until 1679, Father Silvy labored on alone at Lake Winnebago, and then returned to Tadoussac, his duties being assumed by Father Peter A. Bonneault. Not long after these changes had been effected, Father Allouez also returned to the scene of his former labors, having been absolutely driven from the country of the Illinois.[1]

(1.) The biographical sketch of this zealous and enterprising Missionary we take from the writings of Father La Boule, being in our estimation the most complete and satisfactory of any extant:

"Claude Jean Allouez was born in the village of St. Didier (dans le Velay), which is situated southwest of Lyons, in the rocky and mountainous country known as Haute Loire in France. His name 'Allouez' seems to point to a Spanish ancestry; however, no reliable records exist to support this supposition. We find the name written Allouetz and Aloez. Marie de l'Incarnation, who knew Allouez well, and wrote of him in her Lettres Historiques, spells the name Dallois. The time and place of Allouez's birth seem to have been unknown to American historians of the early missions. Bancroft, Dr. Shea and others said they were unknown. Even the modern French historian Margry in his Decouvertes et etablissements, published in 1879, mistakes of the date, placing it in the year 1613. Father Camille de Rochemonteix, himself a Jesuit, published in 1896 his three-volume work on the Jesuit missions in New France. He had access to all the sources available, and on the authority of the genealogical catalogues and archives of the Society of Jesus in France, he definitely fixes the date of Allouez' birth as June 6, 1622.

"Regarding the early boyhood days of the later celebrated Missionary, very little is on record. We are informed, however, that as a wide-awake boy he attended the religious instructions of Blessed Francis Regis, who, between the years 1625 and 1631, achieved great renown as instructor and preacher at Puy, the capital city of the district in which Allouez's parents lived.

"When, in 1632, the Jesuit missions in New France (Canada) were reopened by Father le Jeune, S. J., Francis Regis forthwith volunteered to go to Canada to devote his life to the Indians. He was one of those ardent souls so numerous at that time in Catholic France, who, like St. Paul, yearned to give testimony for the faith that was in them. Incidental to his instructions to the young men of Puy, he, no doubt, often made the foreign missions the theme of conversation. Regis wrote to his general, Mutius Vitelleski, for permission to join Father le Jeune in the Canada missions. The answer to Regis was not favorable, and Puy was to remain his field of labor. In the meantime Regis' zeal had kindled a holy flame in young Allouez, and the soul of the noble-spirited tutor seemed as if poured into that of the docile pupil. What Francis Regis was prevented from doing, his pupil and friend was called to undertake. At any rate, this time on, Allouez prepared himself to become a priest, a Jesuit and a missionary. Having passed his examinations in the college of Puy, a bright and vigorous youth of seventeen years, he in 1639, on the 25th of September, was allowed to enter the novitiate of the Jesuit order. If Allouez aimed at becoming an apostle to the foreign missions, for which, we are assured, he even then felt himself called, the means he chose to qualify himself for such an undertaking prove the genuineness of his zeal. A work so great as he had laid out for his life needed due preparation. However trying such probation may have seemed to his ardent nature, he patiently bided his time, in happy anticipation of the moment when his Superior-general would bid him go. All of eighteen years were thus to pass before the desired summons would launch him into the realization of his noble project.

"Allouez' novitiate of three years proved his true worth, and he was advanced to his higher studies. Four years are devoted by him to rhetoric and philosophy, then for three years he is employed as a teacher of belles-lettres, grammar and the humanities at the city of Billom, after

We now arrive at a period when information concerning these missions becomes less frequent and more fragmentary, being, as it were, but the impression casually expressed by voyagers and travelers, and not, as heretofore, an extensive and exhaustive detailed accounting of the work undertaken and accomplished by the missionaries. All, however, accord unstinted praise to the Jesuit Fathers for their laborious and self-sacrificing efforts in behalf of the heathen, and the work accomplished certainly warranted such enthusiastic praise. Speaking of this, the historian Shea says: "The missions of the Fathers of the Society of Jesus had, indeed, from the arrival of Allouez in 1665, resulted in the baptism of many pagans, old and young, most, indeed, since dead, yet enough surviving to form important missions at Sault Ste. Marie, Mackinaw, Green Bay, Winnebago Lake, and the scattered islands in Lake Huron, all of which were in successful operation. Of the individuals we know little. In 1680 Father Enjalran was apparently alone at Green Bay and Pierson at Mackinaw—the latter mission still comprising two villages, Huron and Kiskakon. Of the other missions neither Le Clercq nor Hennepin, the Recollect writers of the West at this time, make any mention, or in any way allude to their existence, and La Hontan mentions the Jesuit missions only to ridicule them."

Then, too, there were other difficulties to contend with, for the wars pending at that time created a state of unrestrained excitement among the people along the lakes, which, owing to La Salle's openly avowed dislike for the Jesuits, caused much injury to their undertakings, as well as putting their lives in frequent and imminent danger. Among the Winnebagoes, this feeling was made particularly evident, some of that tribe indulging their ferocity to such an extent as to murder a servant of the mission, and afterwards sternly and menacingly refused to consider all demands for suitable reparation. And there were many other incidents of an equally atrocious character, of which, however, for the sake of harmony, but little notice was taken. In the meantime, Enjalran was sent to accompany the Ottawas under the command of Durantaye in Denonville's raid upon the Senecas. He remained away about a year, and then returned, being again at the Ottawa mission in 1688. Here, besides him, were Allouez, Nouvel, Albanel, Bailloquet and Gravier, the latter soon after going to the country of the Illinois with Claude Aveneau, who was at Detroit in 1687 with Stephen de Carheil, and later with Nicholas Potier. Much valuable work was accomplished by this coterie, among other things being the establishment of the mission of St. Joseph's River among the Pottawattomies by Allouez, who afterwards died there. Then, for several years following little is known or told of the work accomplished. Naturally, there was a cause for all this: "Political intrigue," writes Shea, "had entered that field, and the propagation of the Faith was sacrificed to petty and selfish views. The race of truly Catholic-hearted rulers was gone. A new race succeeded, and not one would reëcho the words with which Champlain, the first Governor, opened the history of his voyages. This was not all. England had entered the field to contest with France the mastery of the Northwest. Mackinaw was abandoned; a new post arose at Detroit, and hitherto the Hurons and afterwards the Ottawas removed. At Mackinaw there remained only a few Algonquins, all heathens, with some coureures de bois almost as heathen as they."

Then again, in 1700, Father Enjalran, who now resided at Quebec, was sent West with a view to inducing the people in that region to take active interest in affairs by making a personal representation at the great congress in 1701. Enjalran remained during the winter months at Mackinaw, but who were his companions is not stated; for, while it appears that Fathers Nouvel, Aveneau, de Carheil and Marest were still on the Ottawa mission, the place of residence of each is not given. In 1703 Nouvel was succeeded by Father John B. Chardon, who, a little later, we find laboring among the Illinois. Then, three years later, the Mackinaw mission was abandoned, and, after having burned their chapel and residence, the missionaries returned to Quebec. This act on their part, though justified, created such general alarm, that Father Marest was finally persuaded to return and reëstablish the mission of St. Ignace, a task made somewhat easier from the fact that at about that time a number of discontented Ottawas, former residents at Detroit, returned to Mackinaw to which the now ripened scholar and efficient scholastic is advanced to his course of theology at Toulouse, which studies last four years. About the year 1655 he received priestly orders, and after one year more of meditation and 'study of self' was engaged as preacher at the Jesuit Church of Rhodez, France. While thus active in practical theology, he reached the thirty-fifth year of his life. He had almost despaired of realizing his long-felt desire, and his zeal had stood a long and severe test. 'Obedience is better than sacrifice,' he concluded, and trusted in Divine Providence.

"At last a letter arrives from his Superior at Toulouse (Pere Rocette, S. J.), dated March 3, 1657. Eagerly he reads and calmly laying the letter aside, and moved to the depth of his heart, exclaims in holy joy: 'It is the Lord who granted me this grace. By a stroke of His right hand has He exalted me to this most sublime of all vocations. Seigneur, je suis a vous! Lord Jesus I am thine.'

"The permission to become a Missionary in New France and to sail for Quebec at an early date was granted. A career of missionary activity is opened which was to last over thirty-five years, and the results of which are wrapped up in innumerable acts of self-sacrifice and unflinching charity.

"The young Jesuit who was soon to leave for the far West seemed especially fitted by Providence for his arduous mission. A note, preserved in the Jesuit archives of France, and which, apparently was written by Allouez's Superior about the time of his departure, says in terse language of the prospective Missionary:

"'He is possessed of a vigorous constitution, of a fine mind and disposition, of good judgment and great prudence. He is firm in purpose, proficient in literature and theology, and eminently fitted for missionary work.'

"Here, then, is a Frenchman of the mountainous Loire country type, a man of middle stature, of vigorous frame, yet graceful deportment; a man who is inured to exposure and toil as he is trained in the science of spiritual perfection; capable of living contented in the huts of barbarians as well as moving with due tact in the salons of refined French society. Such a man it is whom we presently see embarking on a project, which, as Bancroft says, 'has imperishably connected his name with the progress of discovery in the West,' and which made him the Apostle of the Wisconsin and Upper Lake Indians."

live. In 1711 Father James J. Marest became Superior of the Ottawa and Illinois missions, the work progressing most satisfactorily under his direction. When Charlevoix visited the Ottawa missions in 1721, he still found a missionary station at Mackinaw. There was also a spiritual director at the Sault, while Father Chardon was living at the Fort of Green Bay, its location being at a point about a mile and a half from the mouth of the Fox River. Here he was laboring to considerable disadvantage among the intractable Sacs. Passing along, Charlevoix next came on to a fort on St. Joseph's River, where a missionary had but recently arrived. This charge consisted of the village of Miamis and another of Pottawattomies. Then, just as matters began to attune themselves to a state boding more satisfactory results to the missionaries, the Fox War broke out, once more demoralizing the West. Now, though of necessity partially deserted, the work was continued, being kept in hand by Fathers Marin Louis Lefrance and Peter de Jaunay. They were located at Mackinaw till 1765, making regular visits to numerous stations along the borders of Lake Michigan. These excellent and devout men were long remembered throughout the territory where they labored so faithfully, and considering the state of the times, successfully, too. After they had passed on to the long and better life, there still remained Father Peter Potier, who continued to labor among the Illinois and tribes in that vicinity until the time of his death in 1781.

"There is yet, however," writes Shea, "one mission of which we have not hitherto spoken. Father Ménard had projected a Sioux[1] mission, Fathers Marquette, Allouez, Dreuillettes, all entertained hopes of realizing it, and had some intercourse with that nation, but none of them ever succeeded in establishing a mission among them. When La Salle was carrying out his mighty plans for colonizing the West, amid a thousand difficulties, he sent the Recollect Father, Louis Hennepin, in 1680, to explore the Ohio to its mouth. That well-known missionary was ascending the Mississippi in April, when he fell into the hands of the Sioux, and was by them detained as a prisoner until July, when Du Luth, a French agent, effected his liberation. A stay of four months enabled him to acquire some knowledge of their language and manners; but as a missionary his labors were confined to a single case of Baptism, having, after some hesitation, conferred the Sacrament on a dying child. The tribe was subsequently visited by Father Marest, to whom doubtless Charlevoix alludes when he says: 'Our missionaries have tried to found a mission among them, and I know one who greatly regretted that he had not succeeded, or rather that he was unable to stay any longer among the apparently docile people.' But there is no extant account of his visit, its time, or duration.

"The first Bishop of Quebec, the venerable Laval, had this mission greatly at heart, and his biography says that Jesuit Fathers were sent there in his time; but nothing is certain beyond Marest's visits until 1728, when Father Ignatius Guignas began a mission among them. His labors were not, however, to continue long; he was compelled to abandon his infant church on a victory of the Foxes over the French. Attempting to reach Illinois, Guignas fell into the hands of the Kickapoos and Mascoutins in October, 1728, and was for five months a captive in the hands of those allies of the Foxes, constantly exposed to death. After a time, he was indeed condemned to be burned, and was only saved by the intervention of an old man, who adopted him. Relieved by supplies from the Illinois missionaries, Guignas used what he received, to gain the Indians, and having induced them to make peace he was taken to the Illinois country and left on parole until November, 1729, when they returned and took him back to their canton, though there is nothing to show that he then resumed his Sioux mission.

"We cannot, then, consider this mission as more than an episode in that of the Ottawas; but if we can believe tradition, the Sioux shed the blood of Catholic Red River, was killed by the Sioux on a little isle in the Aubert, a fervent missionary, attempting to penetrate to missionaries. According to the Oblate, he, Father Lake of the Woods, and the rock bedewed by his blood is still pointed out by the Indians."

Here, then, virtually closed the story of the original Ottawa mission, which dated its beginning from the coming of Ménard among the Kiskakons and Hurons in 1660. Following this most effective effort, came the establishment of missions by his successors among the

(1) Father Claude Allouez was the first of these missionaries to visit the Sioux and it was he that baptized the first Indian child.

Of this visit, Father La Boule writes: "At the Chequamegon mission, Indians often spoke to Allouez of their enemies that lived towards the West. His courage was not weakened by the many hardships suffered, so Gerard he desired to go, still farther toward the setting sun, where, too, he fondly hoped to behold with his own eyes the great River of which the Indians said that it was the father of waters and was called 'Messipi.' The exact time when he made the voyage on the lake to its most western point is not recorded. It probably was the fall of 1606. He met the Sioux ('Nadouessioux' he calls them) at the extremity of the Lake (a). He describes them as wild, impassive warriors, who dwelt in a land of prairies with wild rice for food (Allouez calls it 'seigle de marais'), which they collected at the end of summer on little lakes round about them, and from which they prepared a very palatable dish. They lived in huts covered with skins of deer, instead of with bark. They spoke a language entirely different from that of the Indians known to him. Of this nation he baptized one child, 'which soon was taken to Paradise, as the first fruit of the Sioux mission, to intercede for the race of its fathers.' Allouez thus becomes, in a manner, also the apostle of the proud and irrepressible Sioux, who up to our own days have remained the unconquered lords of the vast prairies of the Wild West. Concluding his remarks on this mission, Allouez glories with the psalmist, exclaiming, 'From the rising of the sun to the setting thereof the name of the Lord is praised.'"

(a) Some local archaeologists of West Superior claim the villages visited by Allouez were on Wisconsin Point, north of West Superior. Others claim that they were either near the extremity of St. Louis Bay. Verwyst claims that Father Allouez went out some fifteen miles west of Duluth. There used to be a village of Chippewa Indians on Wisconsin Point, and the old cemetery there indicates the presence of Indians more than a century ago. The Sioux often came from the prairies of Dakota to make incursions on their neighbors in present Minnesota and Wisconsin. Whether or not Allouez baptized Chippewa Indians at this point, is not certain. It is likely that he here met the tribe known as Christinoes.

Chippewas and Nezpercés on Lake Superior; the Ottawas, both Kiskakon and Sinagos, the Pottawattomies, Winnebagoes, Menomonees at Green Bay and Sacs, Foxes, Mascoutins, Kickapoos and a few Miamis in the interior of Wisconsin. All of these people, it is believed, embraced the Catholic faith, remaining consistently true to the same "until there arrived," says Shea, "that sad period for the French missions when Choiseul directed the destinies of France. His two great achievements, the surrender of Canada and the suppression of the Jesuits, were the death blow to the missions of the West." After this, for a period of thirty years, there was no Catholic priest west of Detroit, although the Indians remained to a great extent reasonable adherents to the cause in which they had been so faithfully and zealously instructed.

It was during this well-remembered period[1] that the country passed into the possession of the British, when the persistent warring of Pontiac threw that entire territory into a perpetual state of excitement and of alarm. Then, after the American War of 1783, another series of disastrous Indian conflicts followed, and for a period of many years the country was so utterly overwrought with dissensions and disaster that the very thought of religion had well-nigh been driven from the minds of this unfortunate people. Thus, without the guiding and restraining influence of the missionaries, intensely uncertain and demoralizing surroundings, the Christian Indians were placed in a position in which every command urged them to an almost utter forgetfulness of everything pertaining to the Christian faith. Of the mission itself, Shea tells us: "It embraced, as we have seen, the Ojibways on Lake Superior, the Ottawas who finally settled in Michigan, the Menomonees on the river which still bears their name, the Sacs, Foxes, Kickapoos and Mascoutins around Green Bay with the Winnebagoes. Only two languages, the Algonquin and Dakota, prevailed; the former in various dialects. Not only have the narratives of the missionaries perished, but also the philological works which they composed; and at this day there is no trace of any grammar[2], vocabulary, catechism or prayer-book in any of the dialects of Wisconsin and Michigan.

"On the death of the old missionaries, the Algonquins, who were great ramblers, frequently visited the Sulpitian mission at the lake of the Two Mountains, where a small body of Catholic Algonquins still remain. At this place, they revived their early knowledge of the Faith, and returning to the West, kept religion alive. The mission at the lake may then be considered as having been, in the interval, the only sanctuary of religion for the Western branches of the Algic race. There, only, could they find the consolation of religion; there, only, hear the truths of the gospel proclaimed in their own tongue."

"After the French Revolution, a condition of affairs which had caused many of the clergy to become wanderers upon the face of the earth, a large tide of emigration, mostly Catholics, setting forth from Great Britain and other parts of Europe for the New World, finally settled in the Northwest, for the upbuilding of which section of the country they were consequently largely responsible. It was at about this time, also, that Gabriel Richard, a Sulpitian, was stationed at Detroit. He was by all accounts a man of extraordinarily zealous character, as well as active habits, most necessary adjuncts to the personal attributes of a successful man during that portentous period. He was, in fact, a man of broad intelligence, who, aside from performing his duties as a devout and conscientious Christian, became an active factor in the every-day life of the settlement, performing unquestionably his duties as a citizen as well as a priest, and thus doubly endeared himself to the entire community. He it was, Shea tells us, who was "founder and director of the first printing press in Michigan, and deputy to Congress from that territory." "As early as 1799," our authority continues, "he visited Arbre Croche, where the Ottawas of Mackinaw then were." Then he left that part of the country and did not return for some considerable time. When, however, the Episcopal See of Cincinnati was established, and Wisconsin attached to that diocese, some effort was made towards supplying the Ottawas with a permanent spiritual director. Then again, in 1821, Richard visited the scenes of his former labors, the occasion being made memorable by a journey to Marquette's grave, over which he erected a cross, carving on it the simple inscription "Fr. Jh. Marquet. Died here 9th May, 1675." He also celebrated Mass on the following Sunday in the presence of a number of the Ottawa tribe. Not long after, the Indians, imbued with a renewed desire for spiritual direction, sent the following petition to Congress: "We, the undersigned chiefs, heads of families and others of the tribe of Ottawa, residing at Arbre Croche, on the east bank of Lake Michigan, take this means to communicate to our father, the President of the United States, our requests and wants. We thank our father and Congress for all the efforts they have made to draw us to civilization and the knowledge of Jesus, Redeemer of the red men and the white. Trusting in your paternal goodness, we claim liberty of conscience and beg you to grant us a master or minister of the gospel belonging to the same society as the members of the Catholic Society of St. Ignatius, formerly established at Michillimackinac and Arbre Croche by Father Marquette and other missionaries of the Order of Jesuits. They resided long years among us. They cultivated a field on our territory to teach us the principles of agriculture and Christianity.

(1.) Another authority has it that when in 1770 the British took possession of the West, there were no missionary establishments except at Green Bay, Des Peres (De Pere) at the mouth of the Fox River, and Prairie du Chien near the junction of the Mississippi and Wisconsin Rivers. At the same time, on the left bank of the Fox River at the present site of Ft. Howard, the French had built Ft. la Baye, and five miles up and on the right bank, the Jesuit Fathers had nearly a century before established the mission of St. Francis Xavier.

(2) This we believe is erroneous, works of that character being attributed to the Franciscans, while it is an assured fact that the late Bishop Marty did much in that direction.

"Since that time we have always desired similar ministers. If you will grant us them, we will invite them to live on the same ground formerly occupied by Father Du Jaunay on the banks of Lake Michigan, near our village of Arbre Croche.

"If you will grant this humble request to your faithful children, they will be eternally grateful, and will pray the Great Spirit to pour forth his blessings on the whites. In faith hereof, we have sent our names this day, August 12, 1823."

Nothing, however, was done in regard to the matter until 1825, when Rev. J. V. Badin[1] visited that section of the country, when the Ottawas, having heard of his coming, erected a log chapel which he blessed on July 19th of that year. He also called at Drummond Island, Mackinaw, Sault Ste. Marie and Green Bay, where he was met with much enthusiasm by the people. He returned to this new and interesting field the following year, Father Richard in the meantime laboring with the authorities at Washington for permission to establish a permanent mission. "The secretary at war," writes Shea, "at last agreed to bear two-thirds of the outlay for buildings for educational purposes, and allowed twenty dollars for each child instructed. By his zeal, too, Badin inspired two good ladies of Mackinaw to offer their services as teachers of the Indian girls, and his great object now was to induce the Jesuits to return to the former possessions of their Society. Arbre Croche was thus formed as a mission station; and, though Badin failed in securing the former laborers, he soon found a man fitted for the task." In 1827 this mission was visited by the Rev. Mr. Dejean, who had been sent there from Huron River, where he had labored for a number of years. Here he found the work in a most satisfactory and interesting condition, there being fully one hundred and fifty Christian Indians connected with the mission. His residence among these people was made permanent in 1829 by Bishop Fenwick, his arrival in May of that year being the occasion of celebration and much festivity. Of his work accomplished here, Dejean writes on October 9, 1829, saying: "My desires are at last fulfilled. Here I am stationed since June, among the Indians of Arbre Croche. Already eighty-five, chiefly adults, have received Baptism, five of the number being over eighty-one. A house 46 feet long by 20 feet wide and a church 54x30 have been built of wood. * * * My good Indians have worked with zeal and courage." And so, the work obtained a new tenure of life, for not only was the spiritual condition of the people ministered to, but schools were established for the instruction of the young. In this way, then, the Ottawa mission was at length restored.

After some little time, when the affairs of the Church had obtained a renewed grasp upon the people scattered throughout the Ottawa country, Father Frederic Résé, at a later period Bishop of Detroit, made an extended visit to the Pottawattomie mission of St. Joseph, where the Rev. Stephen Badin was still in charge, arriving there some time during the month of July, 1830. Thence, after a brief visit, he went to Sault Ste. Marie and so on by way of Mackinaw to Green Bay, where he baptized a number of Menomonees who had been thoroughly prepared for the occasion by Father Mazzuchelli, an active and zealous worker whose limited efforts in this locality had already resulted in the partial erection of a new church, and the establishment of a flourishing school. Dejean was also making the most satisfactory progress at the mission of Arbre Croche, where within a year he had received not less than six hundred members into the church and maintained school, having an average attendance of sixty-four pupils. A prayer book had also been compiled and printed at this mission, and there were numerous other evidences extant of a desire on the part of the Indians to assimilate as much as possible the manners and customs of the Christian people.

The time had now arrived for the Government of the United States to take an appreciable cognizance of the work so admirably planned and ably interpreted by members of the Jesuit Order. That the undertaking had, from the start, been deemed a most worthy one, was readily to be gathered from the voluntary immolation of the missionaries—men of culture and refinement—whose unquestionable sincerity was vouched for in the blood and agony of many of their number. Besides, the natural surroundings accruing with the rapid settlement of the country, demanded more civilized conditions in connection with the mission work, a state of affairs demanding an additional outlay for which the Order was ill prepared. The Government appropriated the sum of one thousand dollars per annum for the maintenance of the schools at Arbre Croche, the Menomonees at

(1) Father Badin, whose name was so long and favorably associated with the Pottawattomie mission, is a noticeable figure in the history of mission work owing to the fact that he was the first priest to be ordained in he United States. He was born in Orleans, France, July 17, 1768. Here he pursued his studies, first at Paris and afterwards at the Sulpitian Seminary at Orleans. Objecting to the tenets of the Constitutional Church, he removed to America in 1792, and was ordained by Bishop Carroll at Baltimore, May 25, 1793. For many years following he dwelt in the South, his principal field of action being Kentucky, of which state he has been oftimes referred to as its apostle. His death occurred at Cincinnati, Ohio, April 21, 1853, at which time he was 85 years of age.

Green Bay and the Pottawattomies, "so that," remarks Shea, "even though this bounty should continue for a few years, it would give a permanent foundation to them. The Rev. Frederic Baraga,[1] afterwards vicar-Apostolic of Upper Michigan, succeeded Dejean at Arbre Croche in the month of May, 1831. He was a man of much determination and possessed of unusual activity, attributes which enabled him to accomplish a vast amount of good within the territory to which his services had been given. Thus he soon widened the field a most satisfactory condition of affairs prevailing, Arbre Croche at that time consisting of a settlement of sixty-one houses and twelve hundred inhabitants, all of whom were intelligent, industrious and particularly active in all matters pertaining to their newly adopted religion. In the meantime, work was meeting with a similar and gratifying success throughout the territory, particularly was this noticeable in the work of Baraga, who, after two years' labor in that locality, had, in 1835, a flourishing mission of two hundred Catholic Indians located at Grand River. This work, it must be remembered, was done in opposition to the efforts of missionaries of other denominations, some of whom had carried on a fruitless struggle for ascendency for a number of years. So of action formerly operated by his predecessor, extending his labors to the Beaver Islands and beyond Lake Michigan, marking the pathway of his successful ministration with a number of new churches. The mission prospered to an almost unexampled degree, "the parish of St. Peter's at Arbre Croche then numbering a constituency of seven hundred Catholic Indians." Of these he had baptized two hundred and sixty-six within a year, "one hundred and thirty-seven of whom were afterwards confirmed by Bishop Fenwick."

In answer to a petition of the Fathers of the First Council of Cincinnati, the Vicariate Apostolic of Upper Michigan was made into a diocese and a see established in 1853 at Sault Sainte Marie, where Fathers Jogues and Raymbaut had first planted the cross in 1642. Dr. Baraga was transferred to this See January 9, 1857. The new diocese had about twenty-three churches, sixteen priests, an Ursuline Academy, Sisters of St. Francis, thirteen schools, and a Catholic population of six thousand five hundred, including the Indian missions in Lower Michigan, at Cross Village, Mackinac, Little Traverse, and those at La Pointe and Fond du Lac, in Wisconsin.

Bishop Baraga had from the outset of his missionary career labored to acquire a thorough and complete knowledge of the Chippewa and Ottawa languages. He published an Otchipwe grammar in 1850, a dictionary in 1853, both reprinted in Canada in 1878, and Prayer-books, in Ottawa and Chippewa, in 1832, 1837, 1842, and 1846, a Life of Christ, in Chippewa, in 1837; Bible Extracts, Catholic Christian Meditations, in Chippewa, in 1846; Eternal Happiness, in Chippewa, in 1850, and he even issued pastoral letters in Chippewa.

What the life of this missionary bishop was, we see in his visitation during the winter of 1859-60, proceeding to Mackinac and St. Ignace, then on the ice to Sault Sainte Marie, then returning on snow shoes to Mackinac. Next he visited Father Zorn's mission at Cross Village, Beaver Island, with its white and Indian Catholics, Garden Island, Rev. Louis Sifferath's missions, at Little Traverse, and Arbre Croche, then Grand Traverse, where Rev. Ignatius Mrak was laboring. Starting in September, he visited the stations on Lake Superior, L'Anse, Eagle Harbor, the Copper Mines, Marquette, Portage Lake. The perils, hardships and privations of these apostolic journeys can be easily conceived. His diocese with Indian, French, Canadian, and, finally, Irish miners coming in, afforded the resources for building up great churches or institutions; but, he could, at the Council of Cincinnati, show how he and his devoted priests were laboring to save souls.

The ruins at Ontonagon, the only religious community of women in the poor diocese, continued their labors. In 1865, the Rev. Mr. Chebul was seen enlarging the church at Bayfield, and the Rev. Edward Jacker was erecting two new churches, this district, Ashland and Marquette, though recently built, could no longer accommodate the Catholic flock, and a new church was planned at Negaunee. That at Marquette, completed in 1866, was the finest and largest church in Upper Michigan, and became Bishop Baraga's Cathedral, as his See was virtually removed to that city.

The government of the United States was compelled to recognize the great services rendered by Bishop Baraga and his devoted clergy and teachers, in Christianizing and elevating the remnant of the Indian tribes in Upper Michigan.—Shea.

(2) Of the life and labors of this missionary after coming to the United States we have been furnished the following notes by Hon. Theo. H. Beaulieu, a son of Basil H. Beaulieu, and prominent citizen of White Earth, Becker County, Minnesota:

The Rev. Theodore J. Van den Broek, a zealous and sincere Christian soldier, a native of the sturdy land of dikes and windmills, Holland, landed at Green Bay, then Navarino, Wisconsin, on July 4, 1853. Here he entered at once upon an earnest missionary campaign among the Indians, Chippewa and Menominі or Foi Avoin, who dwelt in village along the banks of the romantic Fox River, finally settling where now stands the City of Little Chute. For upwards of ten years he preached the gospel of Christ from a simply constructed pulpit and within the dingy interior of a wigwam, to the simple-minded and untutored children of the forest, telling them the ever sweet story of the birth of Him who loved all men, and through whom all can be saved. Finally a log building, covered with birch bark and boughs, was con-

(1) On the 23d of July, 1853, Pope Pius IX, at the instance of the Bishop of Detroit, erected the northern peninsula of Michigan, with the adjacent islands, into a Vicariate Apostolic, which was confided to the laborious missionary, Frederic Baraga, born in 1797, at the hereditary seat of his noble ancestors, Treffen Castle, in Carniola. He early acquired, under private tutors, Illyrian, German, French, Italian, and Latin, fitting himself for the task of mastering the native languages of America. He studied law in the University of Vienna, but, feeling called to the service of God at the altar, he laid aside his law books, and after a divinity course at Laibach, was ordained September 21, 1823. He was a zealous missionary for seven years, his sermons and devout publications doing much good. The immense work yet to be done among the Indian tribes in this country seemed to him the field assigned to him by Providence. He landed in New York on the last day of the year 1830, and, after an audience with Bishop Dubois, to Michigan. When appointed Vicar Apostolic, he had labored among the Indians for twenty-two years; five among the Ottawas at Arbre Croche, and the rest of the time on Lake Superior, beginning at La Pointe in August, 1835. There, amid difficulty, opposition, and privation, he built a church, a dwelling for himself and a number of houses for his Indian converts, of whom he gathered in eight years seven hundred souls, Indians and half-breeds. Leaving that mission to Father Otto Skolla, in 1843, he founded a new mission at L'Anse, erecting church, presbytery and thirty houses. Here he gathered in time a flock of two hundred souls, and established a school for boys and girls.

In 1845 the copper mines on Lake Superior began to be worked, and men from Ireland, Canada, Germany, and other parts, sought employment. Many were Catholics, and the mining camps were regularly visited by the devoted priest. But the work was soon beyond his strength. He selected sites for churches and schools at Ontonagon, Minnesota, and Norwich mines, Eagle Harbor, South Cliff, and Pere Marquette. St. Patrick's Church, at Ontonagon, thirty feet wide and seventy-six feet long, was the chief church of the district. The Vicariate, at its erection, contained six churches, five schools and five stations. The episcopate thus offered only enabled him to continue his work with more ample powers. He was consecrated in the Cathedral at Cincinnati, on Tuesday, November 4, by the Most Rev. John B. Purcell, assisted by Bishop Henni, of Milwaukee, and Bishop Leferere, Administrator of Detroit. Bishop Spalding delivered a masterly sermon on the Catholic Episcopate, as Bishop Baraga resolved to visit Europe at once, to Bishop-elect Baraga to the Catholic Vindicator, October 22, 1854. to obtain priests and means to meet the growing wants of his Vicariate. Before his departure, he addressed a pastoral letter to his flock, in which he treated of their duties to God: Faith, Adoration, Respect, Obedience, Love.

All recognized his zeal, learning and piety. A Protestant paper proclaimed him "one of the truest, most useful friends of the Indian race upon the continent."

Bishop Baraga had more than one audience with the Pope, at whose hands he received rich gifts. He secured five priests for his Vicariate, and represented the claims of Episcopacy at the marriage of the Emperor of Austria. In the summer he was again in his diocese.

In order to place all the Indian missions under the care of Bishop Baraga, the Bishop of Detroit ceded to him jurisdiction over the missions in Lower Michigan, and Bishop Henni over those in Wisconsin.

The Rev. Father Weikamp, of the Third Order of St. Francis, an old missionary, had gathered a society of Tertiary Brothers and Sisters. Bishop Baraga offered him land he had purchased near Arbre Croche. They took possession in December, 1855, and formed the nucleus of a most valuable body for Indian work. Soon after, Bishop Baraga ordained, in the church at Little Traverse, Rev. Seraphin Zorn, long to labor on the Indian missions.

In 1856, we find Bishop Baraga making his visitations of the missions on the shores of Lake Superior, and, making it, generally, as the early missionaries did, in a bark canoe. He revisited the scenes of his earlier labors, conferring the Sacrament of Confirmation, and addressing each congregation in its own language.

jointly in charge of the mission at Green Bay, wrought well and faithfully among the Winnebagoes and Menomonees in that locality. In 1835 Bishop Résé of Detroit made a visit to the Indian mission, in progress of which he was greatly interested. Here he found active, in fact, was his effort at this particular point that a petition was sent by interested parties to the Governor of Michigan, requesting his removal; and so intense was the feeling exhibited that, although the Governor expressed himself as favorable to the position taken by Baraga in this matter, it was thought best to make use of his services in other directions. He was succeeded at Grand River by the Rev. Mr. Viszogsky. Leaving Grand River, Baraga returned to his former mission Arbre Croche, Father Sanderl having been recalled to Vienna. At a later date, this mission passed structed and used as a temporary house of worship. His interpreter and helper in those days of privation was a faithful and noble woman named Mrs. Jacque Porlier (nee Agatha Lawe), a sister of the Hon. George W. Lawe, of Kaukauna, lately deceased.

In 1833, and a few years after Paul Hudon de Beaulieu had purchased land, including the old Stockbridge Indian agency saw and grist mill property at Kaukauna, then known as Kaukaulan, or, as the Indians named it, "O-gah-cun-ing," which interpreted means the place or home of the pike, preparations were made to build a mission church at Little Chute. Accordingly a canvas was made among Mr. de Beaulieu's employes, including his son, the late Bazil H. Beaulieu of White Earth, Minnesota, and formerly a wealthy citizen of Kaukauna, Outagamie County, Wisconsin, and a sufficient amount of lumber having been donated, the mill, which had been undergoing repairs, proceeded to saw the first cut of lumber for the St. Nepomuc's church. In the course of a few days the lumber was sawed and the church erected.

The first bell, and one of the very first bells of any mission in the Northwest, was purchased and donated by Paul Hudon de Beaulieu and Agatha Porlier, who afterwards served as god-parents of the bell at its christening. It was a small church in size about as large as the common farm or plantation bell, in spite of which it did excellent service for St. Nepomuc's fold for upwards of thirty years, when an article of more cosmopolitan proportions supplanted the old and weather-worn pioneer bell, which was at last account, doing duty on a small Catholic station church at Wrightstown or Bridgeport, Wisconsin. It may not be out of place at this time to mention the names of some of the sturdy and worthy pioneers who contributed to build the foundation of St. Nepomuc's Mission Church. These, as far as I have any record, were: Messrs. Paul and Bazil H. de Beaulieu, George W. Lawe, J. M. Boyd, Grignon, Mann, Mausau, Souillard, Le May, Jacques Porlier and his faithful wife, Louise Cornelier, a noble and worthy good Indian woman whom I cannot now call to mind. Shortly after the erection of the mission church, a colony of Hollanders and their families followed in the footsteps of their beloved pastor and emigrated and settled in and about Little Chute.

The Rev. Theodore J. Van den Broek, after incessant and untiring labors in the mission field of the Northwest, covering a period of nearly twenty years, amid trials, privations, storms and sunshine, through pathless and unbroken forests, and over trackless wastes of waters, in the midst of the disturbing savage yells of wild beasts, in the midst and at the mercy of wild men, and with the only comfort and solace of the blessed Redeemer, laid down his mortal remains to rest in the year 1853.

An incident showing the zeal and earnest devotion of this grand and noble missionary is related as follows: On the day previous to his death, notwithstanding the load of infirmity, pain and suffering of body and pain he suffered, he arose from his couch of sickness and performed the baptismal ceremonies on an infant. The writer of Bazil H. Beaulieu. This was his last official act in office he performed ere his sweet spirit took flight to that heavenly home where all is happiness and peace. The Indians, among whom Father Van den Broek labored with a great extent, were the Menomonees and Chippewas, by whom, as by those of all other nationalities or creeds with whom he came in contact, he was regarded as one of the kindest and noblest of men.

Paul Hudon de Beaulieu, who thus early became associated with the labors of the Rev. Missionary, immigrated to the new Northwest from Canada during the turbulent times of 1812. His forefathers were of French blue-blood stock, who came to America seven years prior to the Revolutionary war. The Hudons of France were among the most prominent and loyal subjects of the ruling sovereign, and for their sturdy loyalty, both in peace and war, was conferred upon them the title of "de Beaulieu." Mr. Paul Beaulieu died in 1850, and is buried beside his faithful wife, who preceded him in the old Catholic mission burying ground at Green Bay. His son, Bazil H. Beaulieu, was for many years a prominent citizen and figured conspicuously in the political development of Northern Wisconsin. In 1878 he emigrated to White Earth, Minnesota, where he died in 1894. Two sons of Bazil H., Alexander and Bazil H. served and were members of Co. F, Thirty-second regiment Wisconsin Volunteer infantry, during the War of the Rebellion. Paul H. died from exposure and privation while in the service of his country. Paul de Beaulieu Post No. 247, G. A. R., of Kaukauna, Wisconsin, was named in honor of his memory, and of the gallant services rendered on duty and in the field.

Another account of the life and works of this zealous and priestly character is given by Father Verwyst, as follows: "Father Theodore J. Van den Broek was stationed for some time in Alkmaar, Holland, and belonged to the Dominican Order. He left his native land in 1832, and, having landed at Baltimore, he proceeded via Wheeling, Cincinnati and Louisville to St. Rose, near Springfield, Washington County, Kentucky, where there was a house of his Order, with fourteen Fathers and four lay brothers. The whole journey from Antwerp, Belgium, to St. Rose took nine weeks. Here he prepared himself for missionary work, studying the language and customs of the country. After a short stay at St. Rose he was removed to Somerset, Perry County, Ohio, where there was another house of his Order. M. Grignon, an estimable and worthy lady, now residing at Green Bay, used to interpret for him sometimes at Somerset.

"On the 4th of July, 1834, he arrived in Green Bay to labor in the Indian missionary field. Here he found only ten Catholic white families, although more were living at a distance in the interior of the State at Little Chute, Butte des Morts, etc. He completed the priest's house, begun by Father Mazzuchelli, and labored zealously among the whites and Indians of his flock. The Catholic church and priest's house were then located at Menomineeville (Shantytown), halfway between Green Bay and De Pere. Scarcely a year after his arrival the towns of Navarino and Astor, now Green Bay, were built, and as the Catholics of these places formed one congregation with those of Menomineeville, we will call the mission Green Bay.

"Father Van den Broek labored at Green Bay, sometimes alone, sometimes with Father Mazzuchelli, from 1834 till the winter of 1836. It seems he left Green Bay in December of that year and came to reside at Little Chute. As the Redemptorist Fathers Sanderl and Hatscher and Prost remained but a short time in Green Bay, the care of that mission devolved again upon Father Van den Broek for the next two years, from 1836-38. He used to have Mass there every other Sunday. While yet residing in Green Bay, he often said two Masses on Sundays, the first one at Green Bay (Menomineeville), and the second at Little Chute, walking it at that, although the distance is twenty to twenty-four miles. Generally he started early from the priest's house in his boots, whence he was obliged to stop on his way to get them extracted. Another time he lost his boots in the thick, sticky mud. Truly, his was not an easy life. Besides the hardships of the road, he had often to endure hunger, as his Indians were rather negligent in providing for his wants. When he first came to Little Chute he lived for half a year in a wigwam fifteen feet long and ten feet high, which served as a church, meeting and school, for he began at once to teach his Indian neophytes to learn their A B C, so as to be soon able to read Bishop Baraga's prayer and catechetical books. Here in his wigwam he was visited by snakes, wolves, and that worst of all nuisances, starving Indian dogs, who would often steal the poor Father's next meal, stowed away in the shape of meat or fish, in some old Indian kettle.

"His mission embraced the whole State of Wisconsin for some years. He attended Green Bay, Little Chute, Butte des Morts, Port Winnebago, near Portage City, Fond du Lac, Prairie du Chien, Poygan, Calumet and other places, visiting the more distant missions generally in winter, sometimes he had to sleep, during bitter cold winter nights, in the snow, with no other roof overhead than the starry canopy of Heaven and no bed but the sod. Once, when he was attending a mission, about two hundred and forty miles distant, he got lost in the woods, his guide having got drunk at a fort, where the Father had stopped over Sunday to give the Catholic soldiers the chance to attend to their religious duties. After riding about for several hours in the dark through the woods, having lost his way, he finally tied his horse to a tree, took off the saddle and bridle to use for a pillow and thus passed his night there. It rained fearfully, and wolves howled about him fiercely. Next morning he said prayers devoutly and made a vow that he would offer up a Mass in thanksgiving for the mercy he had found in the woods. He mounted his horse, let the reins loose and allowed the animal to go whithersoever divine Providence might direct it. In less than half an hour he was on the road and soon arrived at the sick person's house. Incidents like these give the reader some idea of the hardships and trials this apostolic man endured.

"But Father Van den Broek was not only a missionary; he was also a civilizer of his Indian people. He worked, himself, most industriously, and, planting his garden with his own hands, raised the first year he came to Little Chute plenty of corn and potatoes, which, no doubt, his Indians helped him to eat up. The second year he raised sufficient breadstuffs besides vegetables, his Indians helping him with a good will to till the ground. He also trained them to handle carpenter tools, made them masons, plasterers, etc. With their help he erected a neat church, seventy feet long, with a nice little steeple, which he completed in 1838 and dedicated to St. John Nepomuc, the glorious martyr who sealed with his blood the inviolability of the Seal of Confession. Between 1834-42 he converted and baptized over six hundred Indians, not to speak of those converted between the last named year and that of his death, 1853.

"But Father Van den Broek has not only a claim to the grateful remembrance of the Catholics of Wisconsin as a zealous Indian missionary, but also as an indefatigable organizer of Catholic congregations. On the 9th of May, 1847, he left Little Chute and, crossing the broad Atlantic, visited his native land, Holland. The same year he published at Amsterdam a pamphlet describing some of the great advantages then held out to the industrious immigrant, and induced many of his countrymen to settle in our State. Three ships with Hollanders sailed for America in 1848, by all of which were Catholic priests to attend to the spiritual wants of their countrymen, namely Fathers Godhard and Van den Broek. The latter sailed from Rotterdam March 18, 1848, in the 'Maria Magdelena.' May 7th he landed at New York, and the 9th of June arrived at Little Chute with a large number of Hollandish immigrants. These people settled at the last named place, also at Hollandtown, Green Bay, De Pere, Freedom and other localities. They were soon followed by others, and at present form quite a large percentage of the Catholic population of the Green Bay diocese. They are second to none in strong, practical Catholicity, zeal for their church, religion and schools, and command the respect of all classes of our people by their industry, thrift and orderly behavior. They are an honor to the country of their birth and a valuable acquisition to the land of their adoption. The tree that Father Van den Broek planted at Little Chute in 1848 has spread its branches over a large part of Northeastern Wisconsin, and off-shoots of it are found in Minnesota, Nebraska, Oregon and other States.

"Father Van den Broek continued to labor with his customary zeal after his return to Little Chute, in 1848, until his death in that town, November 5, 1853, at the age of sixty-eight years. He was succeeded by the Fathers of the Holy Cross, who for many years continued the work of their worthy predecessor, laboring zealously among the Hollanders, French, Irish, and Indian half-breeds of Little Chute and vicinity."

into the hands of the Rev. Francis Pierz, who, besides, for many years subsequently held dominion over those of Sault Ste. Marie and Mackinaw. On leaving Arbre Croche, Baraga remained for a period at the now historic spot known as La Pointe, where he established a missionary station, built a church, mission house, and also a number of dwellings for the Christian Indians. Eight years later we find him at Ance, "a central point," says Shea, "for idolatry and intoxication." Here, however, he was as successful as elsewhere, so that he was enabled to establish a mission which by 1849 numbered two hundred families. So successful was he here, that in 1850 this settlement contained in the neighborhood of three hundred Christian Indians, whose spiritual interests were administered by Mr. Angelus Van Paemel. In the meantime, Father Pierz was actively engaged in increasing the area of his territory, establishing mission stations at Cheboygan, Manistee and Castor Island. As early as 1845, there was also a mission at Grand Traverse Bay, while the older and better known among these Christian settlements were more than maintaining their own in zealous effort and increasing prosperity. Additional zest was also added to the work by the strengthening of the missionary forces in this section, as now, besides Fathers Baraga and Pierz, the Revs. Ignatius Mrak and Otho Skolla were also numbered among the faithful workers in the spiritual vineyard. The latter, a member of the Franciscan Order, succeeded Father Baraga at La Pointe in 1849, at the same time assuming charge of stations at Fond du Lac and Pigeon River, besides occasionally visiting Lac Courtes Oreilles and Flambeau. Passing backward a few years, we find in 1838 that Father Proulx, a Canadian priest, reëstablished the mission at Manitouline, while six years later Father Choné, a Jesuit, and others carried the missionary work to the extremity of Lake Superior. Being succeeded by Father Eugene Jahan, in 1852, Pierz immediately proceeded to a new and unoccupied field, in which to continue his zealous efforts. Of additional labors connected with the missions during the earlier part of the present century, Shea says: "Besides these missions a new class began by emigration from Canada. The abbe, now Bishop Provenchére, was sent in 1818 to Red River near the American border; and finding the tribe of Chippewas and half-breeds divided, stationed his companion, M. Dumoulin, at Pembina, but he had to leave it in 1823, as it was found to be in the United States. George A. de Bellcourt, in 1833, began a new Indian mission on St. Boniface's River; but as Pembina again attracted the half-breeds and Indians, and began a settlement at that spot, Bellecourt, who knew them, also entered the country in 1846. Pembina seemed to him the point for central missions: the Chippewas, though pagans, awaited him earnestly; but having no powers over the Bishop of Dubuque, in whose diocese he now was, he did not undertake any ministry until he received them. Five hundred soon gathered here, around his Church of the Assumption, and he, thus, for several years aided by the Rev. Albert Lacombe, visited many scattered tribes amid great hardships and danger, driven by dogs over the snow. In 1852 Lacombe succeeded, also, in establishing a mission among the Mandans, which has not yet, however, acquired permanence. Meanwhile, the town of Pembina grew up twenty miles from the mission and soon had a population of fifteen hundred Catholics, chiefly half-breeds. This now became Bellecourt's chief station, whence he visited the Assumption. Many Chippewas were to be found around Mille Lacs; among these, Pierz on leaving Lake Michigan fixed his residence and established a mission at Crow Wing, where the log chapel of St. Francis Xavier soon arose. Here two hundred and fifty Catholics resided, and many more Sandy Lake, Chippewa and Sac Rapid Indians are also Catholics.

"Such is the state of the Ottawa-Chippewa mission at present, greater in reality than it ever was in the most flourishing times of the old Jesuit Fathers. To confirm and extend it, the Holy Father has recently appointed the Rev. Mr. Baraga Bishop of Amyzonia and Vicar-Apostolic of Upper Michigan. He has fixed his residence at Sault Ste. Marie, and most of the missions we have mentioned are in his diocese, or have been placed under his control by the neighboring Bishops." Although much has been done in the way of assiduous effort among the Menomonees, a permanent mission was not established among that people until 1843, when Father Van den Broek extended his labors in that direction. There had, however, been an Indian school in active operation among these people for some time previous. In 1844 Father Van den Broek also started the mission of St. Francis on Wolf's River (Lake Poygan), where, in 1846, we find a Christian settlement of four hundred Indians and a flourishing church and school. Father Van den Broek was succeeded in the field by Flavien J. Blonduel, who, after but a short residence there, was enabled to build a second school, while the population in the meantime had increased to five hundred. "All of this settlement," writes Shea, "were agriculturists; fifty-seven families living in substantial houses. The government agent reported that they were the most numerous and interesting tribe in his department and speaks in high terms of the wonderful improvement which they had made under the missionaries. The impression made on the whites was felt by the pagan Menomonees. Oshkerenniew, brother of the Christian Chief, Oshkosh, joined the Christian party, and was followed by a considerable number. Ellis, the agent, had expressed the hope that they would not be disturbed. This was not to be so. Preparations for their removal were made in the following year. Seventy families then resided there. Among these one hundred and forty-eight persons were members of a temperance society; one hundred and twenty could read Ojibway and Ottawa books. Two hundred testaments and other books in those dialects had been distributed among them. The Sunday schools for young and old were well attended.

"So happy a state of things made a distant removal almost certainly ruinous. By the exertions of the missionary, they were permitted by the general government and that of Wisconsin to settle, in 1852, on a tract between the Oconto and Wolf Rivers. Here, on the banks of Lake Shawano, the mission and school arose under the invocation of St. Michael, and Blonduel resigned to Father Otho Skolla the mission which he had created.

"Another tribe evangelized by the old Jesuits on this mission was the Pottawattomies. A part of these, with some Miamis, had, as we have seen, settled on St. Joseph's River. These, like all the other Western tribes, attracted the attention of Father Richard. Résé was sent to them, and arrived early in July, 1830, at the village. As soon as the Pottawattomies knew that a Black-gown was really there, all begun to gather around his cabin, pitching their tents hard by, not to lose his words. Many solicited baptism. All sought to show their desire to embrace the religion which had been preached to their fathers. Résé baptized Pokegan, the chief, and twelve others whose past conduct seemed to promise perseverance. At the end of the ceremony, they held a council to decide on a place for the chapel. They finally decided to ask the Baptist ministers stationed there to leave, and give up the mission house to a Catholic missionary at the expiration of a month. Having found their efforts useless, the Baptist missionaries agreed to the proposal.

"Résé's work could not be permanent and he soon left." Then, as elsewhere told, Father Badin was sent to take charge of this mission, and proved so successful in the work that other tribes, notably the Kickapoos in Illinois, requested him to come and teach them also. He was greatly assisted at this mission by Miss Campo, "an excellent lady," remarks Shea, "acquainted with the Indian language," who greatly lightened his labors, "acting as his interpreter and teaching the young the Christian doctrine." Later, the Government agent having taken possession of the mission (the Baptists had withdrawn), although it had been built with funds reserved by request of the Indians for a Catholic mission, Father Badin bought a house 25x19 feet, which he built over into a chapel, and fifty acres of land near by. Here he took up his residence, laboring with energy and determination to carry forward the good work to the utmost possible limit of prosperity; in this he was ably assisted by the good will and docility of the people. And he succeeded, counting not less than three hundred adherents to the faith by the January following. So he was more than satisfied with the result, although suffering severely at times for the most simple and ordinary articles of food and apparel. Later, he was joined in the work by de Selles and Boheme, besides receiving much material aid from friends and adherents in Europe.

Not long after, the mission received a new pastor in the person of Father Desseille, a Belgian, who, having expressed his entire willingness to go with the tribe to their new reservation, was appointed to that position by the Bishop. Of his work, Shea says: "The missionary extended his visits to Chitchakos and another town on Tippecanoe River, in 1834, baptized several and planted a cross at Yellow River. He returned the next year; and Bruté, Bishop of Vincennes, about the same time reached both stations, and confirmed some at the latter, which was in his diocese. At Tippecanoe the greatest joy prevailed. The Indians, then scattered, came from all sides and encamped around the missionary, to whom they offered ground for a church and school. In ten days Desseille baptized forty-three adults and admitted to their First Communion thirty, baptized the previous year. Proceeding thence to Yellow River, where he had already planted the Cross, he found a little chapel raised, and the people anxious to enjoy his ministry.

Desseille continued to labor zealously in spite of the difficulties caused by the removal of the tribe in 1836. In October, 1837, however, he fell dangerously ill and sent for the nearest clergyman, but it was too late. Worn out by his toil, he expired alone before anyone could reach him.

In the meantime, at the village of Chichipé Outipe, a settlement of about twelve hundred Christians, the young priest, Benjamin Mary Petit, who had been recently ordained by Bishop Bruté, assisted by Miss Campo, worked with energy, vigor and success. When the Pottawattomies were deported, they were accompanied by this pastor, who afterwards resigned his charge to the care of Father J. Hoecken, a Jesuit. Father Petit, now that his great responsibility was over, felt the result of his protracted and arduous efforts, and became alarmingly ill. Again, he made a brave fight, but, though endeavoring to reach his home in Indiana, suffered a relapse on the way from which he died at the University of St. Louis on February 10, 1839.

To the new territory allotted to them, sixteen hundred of the Pottawattomies came in 1836, while within a brief period three thousand others followed to this settlement. At the request of their chiefs, missionaries of the Society of Jesus were finally sent. Although, before these arrangements could be accomplished, it was necessary for Father Verhaegan, the Vice-Provincial of the Order, to make a journey to Washington in order that he might obtain the necessary permission. "Here," writes Shea, "we leave the Pottawattomies for a time, and return to another tribe, embraced in the old Ottawa mission. This is the Winnebagoes, or Puants, as they were called by the French. They derived their name from the fact of their coming from the Pacific, and were a branch of the Dakotas or Sioux (Naudowessies), who penetrating among the Algonquins, were almost entirely destroyed by the Illinois, but all captives were allowed to return and form a tribe again. The Jesuit missionaries converted many to the Faith, and in 1721 we find them with the Sacs under the pastoral care of the zealous and charitable Father Chardon. On the suppression of that Society, and the death of the last survivor of the old Fathers, the Winnebagoes were left in entire destitution of religious instruction." Father Mazzuchelli was one of the earliest to visit these people, and brought them to such a proper understanding of their responsibilities that when Bishop Loras was raised to the See of Dubuque they sent emissaries to him, requesting the appointment of a resident missionary among them. After many such demands had been made, Father Petit, particularly adapted to the undertaking owing to his remarkable faculty for acquiring languages, was appointed to that mission. Here he made an excellent showing, and would doubtless have done far better had it not been for the antipathy and ill-will exhibited by the Indian agent, Lowry, who finally succeeded in procuring his dismissal by the Governor. This by no means suited the Indians, who were persistent in their demands that the missionary be returned to them. Finally, being supported in their demands by Lowry's successor, James McGregor, who "supported the request of the Winnebagoes, and declared that as they had from their earliest intercourse with the whites until within twelve years past lived under the influence of the Catholic church, he deemed it questionable policy to force them to receive instruction from a class to whom they object." So urgent and consistent were the demands made by these people that at last the Bishop dispatched Father Joseph Cretin, afterwards Bishop of St. Paul's, to their assistance. Of this appointment, Shea says: "At a public council held in the presence of Governor Dodge, they (the Indians) strongly expressed their desire to have a Catholic priest to instruct their children; but in spite of all, Cretin could obtain leave only to reside there, being expressly forbidden to open a school. He continued his mission, however, but at last he, too, was summarily removed by order of Governor Chambers.

The affair excited general condemnation, and was even taken up in Congress, but, of course, was soon forgotten, and not only did the government continue to pay the money of the Winnebagoes to a missionary whom the tribe rejected, but, strange for a government that professes equality of religious rights and is indignant at Tuscan laws, too, deprived the Winnebagoes of a priest of their religion." When Father Cretin became Bishop of St. Paul's in 1850, he restored the mission, for, although for some time preceding, the tribe had been removed a considerable distance away to Long Prairie. To this place, however, he sent Francis de Vivaldi, canon of Ventimiglia, and through persistent and continuous efforts on his part the tribe at last obtained some concessions and a partial recognition of their rights from the Government. Under these more favorable auspices, the mission grew and flourished apace so that in the early 50's, under the careful, judicious and energetic direction of Father Vivaldi, there was a Catholic population of about two hundred, and a school of ninety children. The girls of the latter institution were placed in charge of three Sisters of St. Joseph. The condition of the remaining missions, briefly stated, shows that there was none at this time permanently established among the Sioux, owing, undoubtedly, to the fact that many of them had wandered too long distances away from the place of original settlement. It may be well to state, however, that the Rev. Augustine Ravoux was sent to Fort Pierre by Bishop Loras in 1847, where he established a temporary mission among the Sioux and half-breeds, and which was maintained, though not permanently, in the early 50's. It is also a fact that Father de Smet had for some time projected a Sioux mission in the Indian Territory, but of the undertaking, its attempt or fulfillment, nothing positive is forthcoming. "Such," writes Shea, "is the present state of the principal other tribes embraced in the old Ottawa missions. The Mascoutins had disappeared (1857): the Sacs and Foxes, constantly at war, are now in the Indian Territory with the Kickapoos and Pottawattomies. * * * Of the modern Algonquin missions in the West, the Illyrian, Bishop Baraga, is, if not the pioneer, certainly the one who has labored most earnestly and successfully; and no missionary of whom we have had occasion to speak, has published more works in Indian dialects, or treatises on them, or issued more frequent editions. These works comprise catechisms, prayer books, instructions, meditations, bible history, epistles and gospels, and form a richer religious library than any other tribe possesses. Their use is not limited to them alone; the Menomonees also use them occasionally, adapted by their missionaries. Owing chiefly to his care, this part of the Church contains now several thousand active Catholics, directed by zealous, earnest priests, and no obstacle exists to the progress of Faith, except the occasional opposition of fanatical or disinterested Government employes. Of the Red River missions many encouraging reports were received, the work having obtained a firm and lasting recognition owing to the undaunted and assiduous efforts of Fathers de Smet, Hoecken and others of the Order."

WISCONSIN, it will be remembered, was in the first instance a part of the French possessions, and so remained until 1673, when it came into the possession of the English; since 1776 it has formed part of the United States of America. At this particular time, there roamed within its boundaries the Winnebago, Menomonee, Sauk, Fox and Chippewa tribes of Indians, only a handful of soldiers representing the French, English and American Government, being stationed at the different forts, while a few Canadian fur traders who had married Indian women, and were virtually recognized as belonging to that people, were also scattered throughout that region. Subsequent to 1820, however, there was a change, the tide of immigration flowing into Wisconsin from two directions—up or across Lake Michigan to Green Bay, and up the Mississippi to Prairie du Chien. Earliest among these sturdy pioneers, were a number of zealous Catholics, who, by the picturesque and interesting descriptions of the early explorers, had been induced to seek a home in this vast and almost entirely unknown region.

The first and most authentic document concerning the territory now comprising Wisconsin, is that made by Father Marquette in the Relation of 1673. This was written by him during the winter of 1673-4, and still quite well preserved, though dimmed with age, may be seen in his own chirography at the Sulpitian Convent in Montreal. Joliet, fur trader, voyager and companion of the reverend missionary, also wrote of this expedition in the following year, after having returned to France. This report is at the Sulpitian convent in Paris.

Of other valuable and highly prized relics of this period which are still to be found in the keeping of these religious institutions, are a map of Lake Superior drawn in 1671, and a map of the "Messipi" from the 42d to the 49th parallel of latitude. i. e., to the mouth of the "Wisconsing." The oldest historical relic extant is a silver monstrance made in France, which was donated to the St. Francis Xavier mission at Green Bay by Governor Nicholas Perrot. All doubt as to its claims to antiquity is set at rest by the inscription bearing the date of 1686 which is to be found on its base. The sacred vessel was kept at the mission church at DePere, which was erected by Charles Albanel in 1676. Nearly twelve months after the donation of this monstrance to the church by Perrot, the structure was burned to the ground by a number of pagan Indians.

A more complete description of this monstrance, its concealment and ultimate discovery, is written by M. J.

Butler, and appeared in the Wisconsin State Journal of July 22, 1878. This is as follows:

"1681 is the date of the oldest tombstone in Plymouth on the hill above the rock where the pilgrim fathers landed. Wisconsin has a relic as old, wanting five years, attesting the presence of European settlers within her borders. It is a memorial as indubitably genuine as the Massachusetts gravestone, and more wonderful for many reasons.

"This curiosity, by a strange good fortune, has been before me as I write. It is a silver ornament fifteen inches high, and elaborately wrought. A standard nine inches high supports a radiant circlet closed with glass on both sides and surmounted with a cross. This glass case, accessible by a wicket, was intended to contain the sacramental wafer (the Sacred Host) when exhibited for popular veneration. The sacred utensil is called a 'soleil' as resembling in shape the solar orb, and also a 'monstrance' and an 'ostensorium,' because used to demonstrate or ostentate the Holy Host.

"The antiquity of the relic before me is beyond doubt or cavil. Around the rim of its oval base, I read the following inscription, in letters every one of which, though rude, is perfectly legible: Ce soleil a este donne par Mr. Nicolas Perrot a la Mission de St. Francois Xavier en la Baye des Puants, 1686. That is in English: 'This solary was presented by Mr. Nicolas Perrot to the mission of St. Francis Xavier at Green Bay in the year 1686.'

"A lawyer full of skeptical suggestions, like the Satanic Serpent squatting at the ear of Eve, whispers that this inscription might be cut in our time as easily as two centuries ago. So, too, it were as easy to write his legal documents, if forged as if genuine, yet he believes in them.

"The ostensorium was sent to me by the Bishop of Green Bay. The inscription on it was printed by Shea, 'History of Catholic Missions' in 1855. But the shrine on which it is engraved had been ploughed up fifty-three years before, at DePere, in 1892. Such is the Catholic tradition, which we have no reason to distrust.

"Regarding Perrot, the donor of the ostensory, little was known where it was unearthed. But it is now ascertained that he was traversing the Northwest in 1663, and for a quarter of a century thereafter. He was the earliest and ablest of those French agents sent west of Lake Michigan to gather up fragments of nations scattered by the Iroquois and confederate them under French leadership against those inveterate foes of France. His adventures, largely in Wisconsin, he wrote out, not for publication, but for the information of Canadian Governors. These memoirs, laid up in Parisian archives, were never printed till 1864, and remain to this day untranslated. The date on the ostensory tallied with the period when he was Governor of Green Bay and all the Northwest. Such a present was in keeping with his devotional proclivities, his fondness for the missionaries, and his desire to make his favor for those apostles manifest to Indian converts.

"The mission at DePere—five miles above Green Bay—was the oldest west of Lake Michigan, except that at La Pointe. It was established sixteen years before the date of Perrot's present, that is in 1670. The first chapel was probably a bark wigwam, but in 1676 a fine church was erected through the efforts of Father Charles Albanel. The same year Father Silvy reported as baptized at that station thirty-six adults and one hundred and twenty-six children. But within a twelvemonth after the benefaction of Perrot, the DePere church was burned by the pagan Indians. It is natural to suppose that at the first alarm the ostensory was buried in the earth by its guardians, who sought to save it from sacrilegious hands, and who succeeded so well that they were never able to recover it themselves. The earth of DePere was a sort of Pompeii, sealing up in secrecy and safety a witness who stood much nearer the cradle of our history than Pompeii to that of Italy.

"A fac simile of the marvelous monstrance has been taken of life size by our photographic artist, Mr. Jones, and will soon be exhibited in the halls of the Historical Society. The original I restore to the Bishop of Green Bay, F. X. Krautbauer, who keeps it in his vault. On Christmas night (should read holy Saturday night), 1834 (should read 1838), it was stolen from the church by some drunken soldiers from Fort Howard, but recovered the next day. It was afterward carried to France, and brought back only a few years ago. Its weight is a trifle over twenty ounces, and the repousse work, rayonnant and flamboyant, attest that it must have been manufactured in France itself, just as the rudeness of the lettering bears witness of a Green Bay provincial goldsmith. An odd bit of proof has fallen in my way that the soleil is at least seven years older than 1686, the date of its consecration to the mission. It is this: In 1679 Louis XIV. issued a decree that every soleil should have a mark and countermark stamped on its oval base. The soleil now before me bears no such stamp. Either, therefore, it is older than 1679, or through pious fraud it evaded the royal order. The base was broken from the standard by the plough, but the fracture was well repaired.

"There are four memorials older than the ostensorium of Perrot, proving the presence of white men in Wisconsin, but they are all treasured far beyond its borders, and I fear will be for a long time. One is the original manuscript of Marquette, detailing his journey across Wisconsin and down the Mississippi, which was written at Green Bay in the winter of 1673-74. This writing is in the college of St. Mary's at Montreal. The second memorial is Joliet's notes on the same journey, written on his return to France in 1674, and preserved in the seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris. The other two are maps, both preserved in Parisian archives; one is of Lake Superior drawn up in 1671; the other, dating from 1679, 'shows the Messipi from 49 to 42, where the Misconsing comes in,' according to an inscription upon it.

"Fragments of French arms and other metallic, glass or earthen articles doubtless exist in the Northwest, that are older than the sacred silver relic of Perrot. But none known to me can be proved of so great antiquity, for none of them can bear dates that are tell-tales of their age. In Ottawa I saw a bronze cross picked up at the foot of Starved Rock, and called Marquette's; but it bears no date. There is another of silver that was found at Green Bay, and presented long ago to our State Historical Society; but how old it is, no one knows or can know.

"Some other dated native offering to the La Pointe or Green Bay missions even before 1686 may possibly have come to light; but aside from such an improbable windfall, it seems impossible that any antiquarian discovery this side of the prehistoric period, either in Wisconsin, or, indeed, out of it, in all the length and breadth of the Mississippi Valley, can ever be made that shall rival as a work of art, as a religious relic, and, above all, as an historical memorial, the silver ostensorium of Nicolas Perrot. With good reason, then, has Wisconsin fostered her Historical Society till it is preëminent throughout the West. It had the most precious memorial to enshrine."

Fearing that other depredations might be committed upon the church property and its other belongings, the missionaries dug a hole in the ground in which they placed the monstrance for safe keeping; and here, lost to memory, it was at last discovered in the year 1802, and then only by the merest accident. The property in which this valuable relic had been secreted had at this time fallen into the possession of a family named Grignon. Nearly a quarter of a century later, in 1823, a church was again erected at or near to the place where the former one had been destroyed, and within this sacred edifice the monstrance was again used. But a strange fatality seemed to follow this particular locality, for, again in 1828, the church was destroyed by fire. At about this time the monstrance, which had in the course of events come into the possession of the Rev. Stephen Badin, was donated by him to St. Ann's congregation at Detroit. Ten years later, in 1838, the Rev. Father Bonduel purchased this valuable relic for twenty-six fleurs ($13.00), and brought it to Green Bay, where it is now kept in the Cathedral as a highly-prized memento of former days.

"Catholics of Wisconsin first became subject to the diocese of Quebec, which was erected in 1674. When that portion of the territory now comprising the present commonwealth became separated from Canada, they then came within the jurisdiction of Bishop Flaget, under whose dominion were centered the entire population of the Northwest. Latterly, of course, as the country became more thickly settled, this immense territory was subdivided into other dioceses, that of Cincinnati being erected in 1822, Detroit in 1832, Vincennes in 1834, Dubuque in 1837, Chicago in 1844, Milwaukee in 1844, and St. Paul in 1850. When, in 1836, the territory of Wisconsin was created, it included also Iowa, Minnesota, and North Dakota, while the area represented by the present State comprised the counties of Brown, Crawford, Iowa and Milwaukee, containing in all an aggregate population of eleven thousand six hundred and eighty-three souls.

"At this time, also, Solomon Juneau, a trader from Montreal, Canada, resided on the present site of Milwaukee, being then the only white settler in that section of the country. By 1836, however, many settlers came to Wisconsin from the East, while two years later, so rapid had the tide of immigration become, it was deemed advisable to divide this territory into thirteen colonies, the total population of which was eighteen thousand one hundred and forty-nine. In 1840 this number increased to thirty thousand seven hundred and forty-four, and in 1844 to one hundred and fifty-five thousand two hundred and seventy-seven. Then other and still more vital improvements were gradually introduced. In 1850 Wisconsin's first railway was projected and built from Milwaukee to Waukesha; two years later a line was completed to Milton; in 1853 to Stoughton, in 1854 to Madison, and in 1856 to Prairie du Chien.

"To this country first came Rev. Martin Kundig, who at a later date (December 28, 1842) wrote to his friend, Martin Henni, of Cincinnati, as follows: 'Since June I have organized the following congregations: 1st, Milwaukee congregation, German and English. In connection with this organization we have a School for Boys and Girls, a Sunday School, a Temperance Society, Men's Society and Ladies' Society. 2d, St. Mary's congregation, ten miles southwest from here (Milwaukee), composed of one hundred and forty families, mostly English. A church has already been built at this place. 3d, Oak Creek congregation, fifteen miles south from Milwaukee, consisting of twenty-five families. 4th, Racine congregation now in course of organization. 5th, Southport (Kenosha) congregation, thirty-six miles south from Milwaukee, on Lake Michigan, consisting of one hundred families. 6th, congregation near the home of Mr. Neukirch, twelve miles southwest of St. Mary's congregation, consisting of twenty-eight English and German families. 7th, Yorkville congregation, twenty-six miles southwest from Milwaukee, with thirty families. 8th, Muskeegnac Lake congregation, ten miles west of St. Mary's, twenty-four families. 9th, Burlington congregation, thirty-six miles from Milwaukee, ten miles from Yorkville; forty German families; services once every month on Sunday. 10th, Geneva congregation, thirty-six miles southwest from Milwaukee, thirty-three families. 11th, Prairieville congregation, seventeen miles west from Milwaukee. Number of families unknown, as they are widely scattered. 12th, Mukwonago congregation, ten miles south from Prairieville, Wisconsin, twenty families. 13th, congregation at Mr. Rafferty's (town eight, range twenty), nine miles northwest of Prairieville, with twenty families. 14th, St. Patrick's congregation, fifteen miles east of Kenosha, with thirty-four families. 15th, Spring Prairie congregation, six miles from Burlington, ten German families, some Irish and Scotch. 16th, townships eight and nine, twelve miles north from Milwaukee, ninety-one German and English families, all of whom are very poor, having been in this country but a short time. 17th, township ten, twenty-four miles north from Milwaukee, with thirty-six families. 18th, Madison congregation, composed of English and German families, number unknown. Ten lots near to the Capitol were promised to me for church purposes at this place. 19th, Mineral Point congregation, German, French and English families, all well-to-do. Exact number unknown. 20th, Dodgeville congregation, number of families unknown. The last-mentioned congregations I attend quarterly, the rest monthly. Since the Rev. Father Morrissey came to assist me, I have more time to stay at Milwaukee.

"There were also in the neighborhood of one thousand Catholics residing in the vicinity of Green Bay, whose spiritual requirements were attended to by the Rev. Florimond Bonduel. There were also congregations at Cockalin, on the Fox River, whose pastor was the Rev. Theodore Van den Broek; Prairie du Chien, in charge of the Rev. Augustin Ravoux, and La Pointe, on Lake Superior, where the Rev. Frederic Baraga was in charge. Thus, according to these statements, there were six priests working in Wisconsin at this time."

A most interesting and voluminous report of the condition of the Church in Wisconsin is given by Bishop Henni in a letter written by him but a short time subsequent to his elevation to the Episcopal See at Milwaukee. In this communication, which was dated May 14, 1844, he says:

"I arrived at Milwaukee, the See of my Bishopric, which is about the same size as the Territory of Wisconsin, and which formed the northern part of the diocese of Detroit since its establishment. A few years ago the present location of Milwaukee was an uncultivated waste, the rich and fecund soil with which it abounded being undisturbed by the numerous bands of Pottawattomie and Winnebago Indians who came from other parts along the lake at stated periods to trade their accumulated stock of furs. Finally, however, in 1835, a settlement was established at Milwaukee, which has grown so rapidly that at the present time not less than seven thousand souls are living here. As regards the present condition of our holy religion and the possibilities for its future advancement, I have not the slightest doubt, after having carefully considered the matter in all of its peculiar phases, that Wisconsin will maintain its prestige in comparison with other States. At any rate, we are already ahead of all other religious denominations, as of the entire population of seven thousand souls, fully two thousand are Catholics. At the present time a majority of these people are living in the southern part of the Territory, near the coast of Lake Michigan, and in the west along the Mississippi River.

"Immediately after Pentecost I made my official tour through the country. First I went in a southeasterly direction to Sac Creek, a distance of about forty miles from Milwaukee, where there is located a large Irish settlement, and then to Racine and Southport, rapidly growing villages, whose populations are largely Catholic. At the latter place I found a large brick church, eighty feet long, in course of erection, which building, it is understood, will be completed and ready for occupation during the coming year. The same condition of affairs also prevails at Racine, where most of the Catholics, as in Burlington, are German. Farther west there are Salem, Geneva and Yorkville settlements, all having large Catholic populations, while in each of these places chapels have already been built. The same can also be said of many other settlements lying north and west of Milwaukee for a distance of about forty miles. With the exception of Prairieville and Watertown, each of these places is simply known by the name of the saint in whose honor the church erected there has been dedicated. Thus we have St. Mary's, St. Michael's, St. John's, St. Benedict's, St. Boniface's, St. Dominic's, St. Francis', St. Bernard's, and numerous others, each of which is known by no other name. In a majority of these cases, these settlements are composed entirely of Catholic families, and thus pursue their devotions without interference on the part of other denominations.

"In the month of June, I visited the western portion of my diocese, on this occasion passing through Madison, the seat of our Territorial Government, which is located in Dane County, and about eighty miles distant from here. This place is virtually in the geographical center of the Territory, and at present but very sparsely settled. It is an ideal location, being, as it is, surrounded by beautiful lakes and other natural conditions which present a handsome and interesting view. I expect to establish a church here before long, as there are already about thirty families living in the vicinity, while the unusual attractiveness of the surroundings and the excellent quality of the soil inspire me with the belief that this locality will soon be thickly settled. West of Madison, along the shore of the Wisconsin River, are the so-called Blue Mounds, while still farther west are the Lead mines. At Mineral Point, the most important settlement in Iowa County, I was made the recipient of a number of valuable lots, upon which a stone church is already in course of erection. This promising condition of affairs is due largely to the zealous efforts of the recently organized congregation, to which some of the most prominent families in the settlement belong. Catholic fervor is, in fact, very marked here, among the most recent converts to the Church being a son and daughter to Mr. Dodge, first Governor of Wisconsin, who are also educating their children in the Catholic faith. In Grant County, which is bordered on the west by the Mississippi, I found a number of quite extensive Catholic settlements. There are also two prosperous villages on the Platte River, Platteville and Potosi, the location of the latter being at the point where that stream empties into the Mississippi. Each of these places has its church, although the congregation at Potosi is certainly the stronger, as, besides making an addition to the church, the people there have recently erected a brick school house. There are also churches in various stages of completion (all of them will be ready for dedication by next summer), at Benton, New Diggings, Shullsburg, and Sinsinawa Mound, the latter an isolated elevation on the prairie which is covered with trees and brush —in fact, a second Mount Tabor. Should not this charming spot—I thought to myself when seeing it for the first time—should not his charming spot be dedicated to religion and science? And, truly, the wish was even then but little short of fulfillment, as I have since been notified that the Rev. Samuel Mazzuchelli, who has labored for many years in Wisconsin, Iowa, and Illinois, has already secured some 800 acres of land on the south side of the mountain. This desirable piece of property he purchased from General George W. Jones, ex-Member of Congress, who, although a Protestant, favors the Catholic religion, his wife and children belonging to that faith.

"Father Mazzuchelli came from Milan, Italy, from which place (to which he had been on a visit) he returned in the month of August, last year (1843), well provided with means which enabled him to buy the land. He commenced to erect a college on this property, and I can hardly imagine a more suitable location for the establishment of an educational institution than Sinsinawa Mound. North of here, and on the other side of the Wisconsin River, is Fort Crawford, its principal settlement, Prairie du Chien, wherein is maintained a garrison fort named after the county, being located on a large and treeless plain at a point where the Wisconsin empties into the Mississippi. Here a large congregation has been organized, its personnel consisting to a great extent of Frenchmen and Canadians. A few years ago, the Catholics of Prairie du Chien began the erection of a stone church one hundred feet in length, which building I found in an incomplete condition and burdened with a debt of $3,000. How they could have undertaken the erection of such a building, I cannot understand, for this congregation will never be able to pay for it; however, it is such a durable as well as imposing structure, that the money will not be entirely thrown away. While at Prairie du Chien, I confirmed a great number of persons, among whom were eleven converts. I also preached in the morning and afternoon, my congregation consisting of Catholics, Protestants and a garrison from the fort. Before taking my departure, I visited a Winnebago chief by the name of Debore. He is a very old man, yet maintains a great amount of vitality and strength. Debore, as well as his family and some of the tribe, are Catholics, and he quite frequently makes a pilgrimage to the church at Prairie du Chien, on each occasion remaining at the settlement for some time. The Bishop of Dubuque is reported to have already organized a mission among the Winnebagoes and Sioux. In my diocese there are at present only the Chippewas, Menomonees and Pottawattomies, all of whom roam around the country like the gypsies of Europe. The Chippewas are located along the shore of Lake Superior, while the Menomonees hunt and fish in the territory south of that occupied by the Chippewas, and on the Wolf and Fox Rivers, about sixty miles from Green Bay. As soon as the Indians heard of my arrival, some of them came with their best canoe, in which I was transported to Little Chute, where Father Van den Broek had organized a mission. In our passage up the Neenah and Fox Rivers, we passed the rapids des Peres, made memorable nearly a century and a half ago through the erection of a chapel by the Jesuits and the martyrdom of some of the missionaries there. It was while a mill dam was in course of erection at this place years after, that several relics of great historical value, such as crucifixes, medals, etc., were unearthed.

"On arriving at my destination, I found that Father Van den Broek had established a congregation of Menomonees on the left bank of the Neenah rapids, where they had cleared a few acres of ground, erected a chapel and platted a neat little cemetery. In company with Father Van den Broek and four half-breeds, we now passed up the Fox River and Lake Winnebago to the new Indian settlements. It was midnight when we came to the western shore of Poygan Lake, so we fired a gun to notify the people of our arrival, as our guards were unable to locate their wigwams among the dark birch woods. It was not long before a number of Indians came down to the swampy shore, one of the most sturdy of them taking me upon his shoulders, and notwithstanding my objections, bearing me to dry land. Here, then, I for the first time experienced the novelty of establishing my episcopal residence in a wigwam, in which soon after, upon a couch composed of native mats, I obtained some much-needed repose. Early in the following morning, we returned to our canoe, by means of which we journeyed a farther distance of four miles, which brought us to the center of the settlement, where all of the Indians had been notified to gather for divine service. This was on the 12th of July.

"Not far from the shore, we built a temporary chapel from branches, wherein I celebrated Holy Mass. Afterwards I addressed the Indians in English, which was interpreted for me into the Indian language, sentence by sentence. After giving the Episcopal Benediction, I left the chapel, and was led to the presbyterial wigwam, where I partook of some excellent refreshments. Soon after, the chiefs, with their attendants, came to call upon me, and after much handshaking they sat down. After a pause, the first chief began to speak, making the following requests:

"1st, that a teacher be sent to instruct their children; 2d, that permission be granted them to build a chapel; 3d, that an additional missionary be sent to them, their present pastor, owing to extreme age, being unable to attend the ever-increasing duties of his charge. In response, I gave them permission to erect a chapel in honor of St. Francis Xavier, and I also told them that I would send an English missionary as soon as I could secure the services of one. As regards a teacher, I made them acquainted with my companion, Joseph Bouglar, formerly a teacher at Little Chute, suggesting him as an altogether suitable person for that position. His services were at once accepted, more readily, perhaps, owing to the fact that his wife belonged to their tribe. At the close of the conference, we entered our canoe and began the return journey, being accompanied by thirteen other canoes bearing a number of Catholic Indians who were going with us to Little Chute, so that they might receive the Sacrament of Confirmation in their old chapel at that place. It was on a sultry summer evening that our flotilla glided down the small lake and river to Neenah, passing over the same course, in fact, taken by Father Marquette in 1672 when on his way to the Portage, at which place he carried his belongings overland to the Wisconsin. Having arrived at our point of destination, Butte des Morts, we landed and received a friendly welcome from Mr. Grignon, an old Canadian Courier des bois. I accepted his courteous invitation to stay over night at his residence, while the Indians erected their wigwam and camped between this house and the river. Mr. Grignon is a descendant of those French who came to this country one hundred years ago.

"The name Butte des Morts has its origin from the great massacre in which a large number of Fox Indians were killed by De Louvigny's expedition. These Indians had been committing numerous depredations along the territory contiguous to the Fox River, intercepting caravans, and robbing and killing the people accompanying them. As a matter of safety, the traders were compelled to resort to heroic methods for future protection. After the massacre the bodies of the slain were piled up in one great heap and covered with dirt, from which fact the name Butte des Morts, or 'mound of the dead,' is derived. On the western end of Lake Superior are living the Chippewa Indians, among whom the Rev. Frederic Baraga is expounding the Catholic faith. La Pointe, the central settlement of the converted Indians, also belongs to my diocese. I had made up my mind to visit this place, having, in fact, when at Mackinaw, promised the Rev. Father Skolla to do so. A circuitous route had, however, been taken in order to reach it, and, being unwilling to make the attempt alone, I awaited the representatives of the North American Fur Company, who, I was informed, would go there in August. In order to meet this party, therefore, I started at once for Mackinaw, but was delayed for some time at Green Bay, awaiting the arrival of a boat, so that I did not reach my destination until August 3d. There I learned that they had already started for Sault Ste. Marie.

"The following day being Sunday, I arose at four o'clock in the morning and said Mass in St. Ann's Chapel, an historic structure which had been in existence since 1690. In this vicinity, too, the mission of Michillimackinac, it will be remembered, was established by Father Marquette in 1671. This, like all the old missions in New France, had suffered severely from the constantly changing conditions, and had already on several occasions been abandoned. Finally, however, Mgr. Fenwick, afterwards first Bishop of Cincinnati, Ohio, came there, and by strenuous effort was enabled to arouse the few remaining Christians to a partial recognition of their duty to the Church. After a brief stay at St. Ann's, I started for Sault Ste. Marie, a distance of ninety miles, accompanied by three half-breeds. Then we passed onward by rapid stages, finally, after a weary voyage, arriving at the Apostle Islands, and later at Magdelena Island, the most southerly among the twenty beautiful islands at this place. We landed on the south shore of the lake at La Pointe, being welcomed by the two bells of St. Joseph's Church, a recognition due to the enthusiasm of an Indian squaw, who by signs had notified those on shore of the arrival of a Bishop in their midst. Father Baraga was overwhelmed with joy, and welcomed me heartily. Arm in arm with him I entered the church, which was filled with Indians and half-breeds, who were waiting to receive the Episcopal Blessing. The day of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary was a great festival for me, as well as for the newly converted Indians. Early in the morning these people came to the church, a building sixty feet in length and thirty feet in width. At ten o'clock I instructed those present concerning the feast, as well as regarding the proper observances of this day, Father Baraga interpreting my words into the Chippewa language. This instruction was continued through the afternoon services as a preparation for the following day, on which I confirmed one hundred and twenty-two grown persons. In the evening I was compelled to leave this place, as the 'Astor' was about to return. This made it impossible for me to visit the mission at Fort Williams and at Grand Portage, which I much desired to do. While in this locality, I received from the Indians dwelling at this place the following petition, which was translated by Father Baraga:

St. Joseph's Church at La Pointe, Madaline Island, Wisconsin.

This is the oldest church in Wisconsin; originally built by Father Marquette, about 1666; rebuilt by Rev. Frederic Baraga, 1835. It contains many precious relics of old to the present day.

"'La Pointe, August 15, 1844. Our Father, our great priest: We let you know that we at Grand Portage and at Fort Williams deserve your compassion. There are so many here who are Catholics, and so many who would like to espouse that religion; yet we cannot go to Confession. If we see a priest, it is only as he passes by, and he has hardly time to baptize our children. As there are so many Catholics at Grand Portage, we ask for a priest who can always stay with us. Many of our people die, yet there is no priest present to conduct the services for the dead. Indeed, we deserve your compassion. We will ask you, in the name of God, to send us a priest. We, the wild Indians of Grand Portage.'"

To this request, which was published in the 'Wahrheits Freund," published in Cincinnati, Ohio, the Rev. Michel Heiss added the following statement referring to Milwaukee: "Our small and insignificant chapel was enlarged to a building ninety-two feet in length, and the steeple was also remodeled. The interior, too, was changed so that the church in every respect assumed proportions more in keeping with the dignity of a Cathedral. A spacious sanctuary, with a new altar and an episcopal throne, was also added to the episcopal furnishings, much assistance being afforded in the undertaking by the German ladies of the congregation. All of these interior improvements were completed by Christmas Day, on which festival the church was crowded to its utmost capacity. At four o'clock in the morning, Bishop Henni celebrated Pontifical High Mass; at nine o'clock, there were services for the German Catholics, and at ten o'clock for the Irish Catholics. A great number went to Holy Communion, and we were hardly able to hear all the confessions. On the following St. Stephen's and St. John's Day, we also held solemn services, a great number of Catholics being in attendance. At about this time, a suitable site for a cemetery was obtained, seven acres of land being purchased. The location of this property, which is nearly two miles from the church, occupies an elevation near the Menomonee Valley. Prior to this, the dead of our congregation were interred in an open space, the owner of which was not even known; as soon as possible, a chapel will be erected in the new cemetery."

During the first decade of his episcopate, Bishop Henni was assisted by a number of able priests, among them being his old-time friend, Martin Kundig, who had worked for a considerable period among the Catholics of Wisconsin prior to the coming of Bishop Henni to Milwaukee. Others among the coterie of bright and zealous minds, were the Rev. Michael Heiss, who came with the Bishop in 1847, and Dr. Joseph Salzmann, the Rev. Fathers Anton Urbanek, Michael Wisbauer, and Fabian Bermadinger, and the theologians, Fathers Gernbauer and Fusseder, who came to Milwaukee in the fall of the same year. Of this notable addition to the clergy of Wisconsin, whom the Archbishop welcomed with great joy, Father Bermadinger was appointed assistant to his friend, the Rev. Kaspar Rehrl, at Calumet, Wisconsin; Father Urbanek was given charge of the rectorate at St. Anthony's congregation in Town 8; Father Wisbauer was sent to Burlington; Dr. Salzmann to Germantown, whence he also attended the missions of St. Hubert, St. Augustine, St. Jacob, St. Francis Xavier, and Holy Cross.

Two years prior to their coming (1845), the number of priests in the territory had been increased to seventy-eight, and in the month of July, of the same year, another noticeable advancement was made in Catholic interests

The Ancient Painting now in the Old Church at La Pointe (Near Ashland, Wisconsin.)

It is a copy of Ruben's "Descent from the Cross," and is painted on hand made canvas unlike anything that has been used for centuries. The Indian traditions say that the painting was a gift to the La Pointe Mission in the year 1669 by the world renowned Jesuit Missionary, Father Marquette.

by the dedication of churches at Shullsburg and Sinsinawa Mound. It was also in 1845, through the special and zealous efforts of Father Kundig, that the church at Kenosha was completed, the same being dedicated on the 15th of August, the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Toward the end of that year, a nice little stone church was completed and dedicated at Mineral Point as a result of the personal labors of Father Jouannault. It was also in November of that year that Father Inama, a Praemonstratensian from Austria, came to Sac Prairie (Roxbury), where he intended to erect a convent. At about this time, the Rev. Father McKernan organized a large English-speaking congregation at Watertown. But ahead of all was the congregation at Burlington, which owned a church, school house and pastoral residence. This charge was administered by the Rev. Father Kendeler, who came there from the diocese of Philadelphia. Thus it will be seen that the outlook for the church in Wisconsin was of a most satisfactory character, besides at the time stated a number of large settlements of German Catholics had sprung up within a short distance of Milwaukee.

The first ordination of record in Wisconsin was conferred by Bishop Henni upon Frank Mazzuchelli in July, 1845, the second to receive like recognition being Patrick McKernan, who was ordained on Easter, 1846. On the Saturday preceding Pentecost, John Moran and Frank Xavier Obermueller were also ordained. Excellent services were rendered to church interests by the Revs. Thomas Morrissey, of Detroit, Michigan, and James Lausse of Dubuque, Iowa, who had joined Wisconsin's working force of pastors at that time. The last-named priest had also the distinction of erecting in his parish at Potosi, Grant County, Wisconsin, the first Sisters' school in the diocese. The Sisters to whose care this work was entrusted came from the convent but recently established at Dubuque, and they, being zealous and energetic in the work, not only directed the education of those sent to the school, but also erected a more enduring monument to their Order in the establishment of the Academy of St. Matthew's. Another noticeable and valued innovation at this time was the pensionate of St. Joseph's for ladies, which was built by the Sisters from Emmittsburg, Maryland. A High School for boys was also started at St. Peter's Church. During the week preceding Pentecost, the priests of the diocese had a retreat directed by Pere John Timon, a Lazarist Father, at the end of which twenty-seven decrees were promulgated, which at present comprise the fundamental laws of the dioceses of Milwaukee, La Crosse and Green Bay.

In the fall of 1847, a college was opened at Sinsinawa Mound by the celebrated Indian missionary, Samuel Mazzuchelli, a Dominican, who was appointed Provincial of his Order in the United States. In September a still further addition was made to the priestly forces of the diocese by the ordination of James Colton, P. J. Fander, John Healy, Michael Beitter and Michaed McFaul. The Rev. Father Colton also became assistant pastor of St. Peter's Church, and Father Beitter at St. Mary's Church, while the Rev. Fathers Fander, Healy and McFaul were appointed to respective charges at Racine, Watertown and Greenfield.

On September 12, 1847, the feast of the Holy Name of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Bishop Henni dedicated St. Mary's Church at Milwaukee. These services, which began at six o'clock in the morning, were not concluded until half-past ten, after which Pontifical High Mass was celebrated. On this occasion, the Rev. Father Shaw, professor at South Bend, Indiana, delivered the festival sermon, taking as his subject the "Infallibility of the Church." After Vespers Father Carius, of Fort Wayne, Indiana, delivered a discourse in German on the "Destination of Man." On the day following All Souls' Day (November 3), Bishop Henni visited St. Lawrence's congregation, in Town 10, of which the Rev. Father Schraudenbach was then rector, and confirmed eighty-six persons. On the next Sunday, he confirmed seventy-five at Burlington, where Father Wisbauer was stationed, and a week later confirmed twenty-nine in the Cathedral at Milwaukee. On December 5, 1847, Bishop Henni laid the foundation stone of the present Cathedral. The building was planned to be 155 feet in length, 75 feet in width, and 50 feet in height, with a steeple 210 feet high. Of the labor incurred by the Bishop in this undertaking, the almost insurmountable difficulties with which he was at times compelled to struggle and his ultimate triumphant success, it is inconsequent to refer at the present time, the matter having received due and adequate consideration elsewhere. It is sufficient, therefore, to state that he returned from a self-imposed pilgrimage during the spring of 1849 in time to attend the Provincial Council at Baltimore, commencing May 6, 1849, at which Archbishop Kendrick, of St. Louis, and twenty-four Bishops were present. At this Council many vital points in ecclesiastical government were fully discussed, and emergencies provided for, among the latter being a division of the country into the four Provinces of Baltimore, Cincinnati, New York and New Orleans. It was also decided that all Church property not belonging to a religious community should be deeded to the Bishop of the diocese in which it was located, and that no Bishop should be empowered to dismiss a priest without first having provided a place for him within another diocese. In 1847 the population of Wisconsin amounted to 210,000 inhabitants, the Territory being divided into twenty-eight counties, and under the administration of Governor Nelson Dewey. During the year preceding, Milwaukee was incorporated, and Solomon Juneau, who had already the distinction of being its first settler and postmaster, also became its first mayor. Three years later (1849), the census showed a population of 18,000 inhabitants in five wards.

In the meantime work steadily progressed on the Cathedral, besides which the erection of Holy Trinity and St. Gall's Churches was begun. In the Cathedral parish cemetery numerous improvements were also made, noticeably the erection of a chapel, which was in due time dedicated to the Resurrection of Jesus Christ. To further facilitate matters in Milwaukee, Dr. Salzmann was recalled from his parish at Germantown, and entrusted with the erection of that of Holy Trinity. For this particular period were the ordination of the Rev. Matthew Gernbauer on July 25th, and the purchase by the Bishop (August 3) of a substantial brick house and eight lots on Van Buren street, to be used by the Jesuit Fathers for a dwelling and as a site upon which to erect a college. At this time the theological students of the diocese were attending the University of Notre Dame, Indiana, there being as yet no place suitable for their proper instruction for the priesthood in Wisconsin. During the fall a number of Franciscan Brothers and Sisters came from Bavaria, to assist in conducting the this purpose a suitable piece of property was purchased on the corner of Greenbush and Park streets, building plans having been prepared for a structure 120x56 feet. The corner-stone of this church was laid by Bishop Henni on July 15, on which occasion the Rev. Father McLaughlin, assistant pastor at the Cathedral, preached on the "Catholicity of the Church." Dr. Salzmann also made this the occasion for an interesting and instructive discourse on the significance of such ceremonies. Then Bishop Henni addressed the people, expressing his unqualified joy at the establishment of the new congregation. Other incidents pertaining to German missions in and about Milwaukee, which by this time had become quite numerous.

The Rev. Fathers Anthony Keppler and Matthias Steiger, who were at the head of this community, purchased thirty-eight acres of land at Nojoshing, on Milwaukee Bay, upon which they erected a convent, the priests residing there taking charge of the German congregations located in that neighborhood. Father Keppler was stationed at New Coeln, and died within a year (September 8, 1850) of cholera, and three years later his companion, Father Steiger, died, also, from the same complaint.

On December 8, 1849, Bishop Henni dedicated St. Gall's Church, being assisted in the services by the Rev. Fathers Callanan, Beauprez, Putnam and McFaul. Just a year prior to this interesting event, ten Sisters (the first of their Order to do so) of Notre Dame arrived in New York; four of this number came to Milwaukee in 1850, to take charge of St. Mary's School, and in the following years they erected a convent there. It was also in the earlier part of 1850 that Bishop Henni purchased a small frame house near to St. Peter's Church, which was used as a refuge and home for orphans. From this date, therefore, may be said to have originated the now famous St. Aemilianus' Orphan Asylum. Later a building was erected near the Cathedral as a home for girls, and was given in charge of the Sisters of Mercy, who had already established their right to recognition by the founding of St. John's Infirmary (May 15, 1848).

It was now owing to continued failing health that Father Heiss was compelled to seek recuperation in a tour of Bavaria, his native country, Dr. Salzmann assuming the pastorate of St. Mary's thus made vacant, and having as his assistant the Rev. Father Bermadinger. On August 18, 1850, the Rev. Frank Fusseder, having been ordained, was sent as assistant to the Rev. Father Wisbauer, assuming those duties on the feast of St. Matthew's. Somewhat later, the Rev. Adolph Scheppert, formerly a Protestant minister, and the Rev. George Rehrl, a brother of Kaspar Rehrl, were ordained. On September 22d, Holy Trinity Church was dedicated, Father Jarbon, Superior of the Dominican Convent at Sinsinawa Mound, preaching the sermon in English. Eight priests assisted the Bishop in conducting these services, and, after the Gospel, Father Joseph Sadler, newly appointed rector of the congregation, discoursed on the blessings of Christendom. On All Souls' Day the chapel in the cemetery was dedicated, prior to which occasion, however, the Rev. Fathers Beauprez and Frederick Huebner, S. J., had been buried there.

In 1851 the first Catholic paper, the "Seebote," was published in Milwaukee. At that time there existed four German papers in Wisconsin, two dailies in Milwaukee, "Das Banner," then in its seventh year, which was edited by Mr. Aigner, and published by Mr. Schoeffler, and "Der Volksfreund," edited and published by Franz and Herzberg. In Racine there was the weekly "Wisconsin Bote," and at Sheboygan "Der Wisconsin Republikaner"; originally the "Seebote" was also a weekly paper. When Father Heiss returned to Milwaukee in November, 1852, he was elected President of the stockholders of the "Seebote" property. Then, at a later date, the only remaining stockholders were Dr. Salzmann and A. Greulich, and finally the entire property passed into the hands of P. V. Deuster. During the winter of 1852-3, Bishop Henni went to Mexico and Cuba, and upon returning brought back with him the celebrated Jesuit missionary, F. X. Weninger, who began his missionary work in Washington and Sheboygan Counties. On June 9, Bishop Henni confirmed one hundred and one persons in St. Mary's Church, going afterwards to South Bend to confer the rites of ordination upon the theological students, Messrs. Doyle, Dougherty, Smith and Dael. On July 13, Michael Obermueller was ordained in St. Mary's Church, Milwaukee, and on October 21st Martin Weiss and Sebastian Seif were also admitted to Holy Orders. The mortuary record at this time noted the recent decease of the Rev. Fathers Keppler, Steiger, Van den Huvel, Bullock, O. P. Callanan, Beauprez, and Frederick Huebner, S. J., all of whom had been active and successful workers in their chosen field. In this year, also, Sisters of St. Brigetta, from Tullow, Ireland, came to Kenosha, and opened St. Marcus' School. Father McFaul intended, also, to introduce the School Brothers of that Order, but the latter undertaking was, at least for the time being, postponed. A little later Bishop Henni confirmed one hundred children at Kenosha, besides dedicating a large church for the recently established German congregation at that place. This parish he gave into the charge of Father Kaspar Rehrl. In the following year, Father Weninger held a mission at Kenosha, at the conclusion of which the German parish was enabled to erect a substantial school building. Other similar successful missions were also held at Calumet, St. John the Baptist, St. Ann's, St. Nicholas, Fond du Lac, Oshkosh, Queen River, and numerous other places.

On May 9, 1852, Bishop Henni attended the first Plenary Council at Baltimore, at which, with the consent of the Bishop of Detroit, he caused the appointment of an Apostolic Vicar in the person of the celebrated missionary, Frederic Baraga, for the northern region of Wisconsin and Michigan. This territory was particularly familiar to the appointee, who had labored among the Indians of that region since 1835. Other and most important decrees of this council were: The exclusive use of the Roman Ritual; the appointment of Consultors and Chancellors for the Episcopal Administration; the division of the dioceses into decanates; the erection of parochial schools near each church; the erection of a Priest's Seminary, at least in each Province, and the publication of the promise of marriage. On the 6th of December Bishop Henni dedicated St. Magdalene's Church at Sheboygan, where Father Gernbauer was stationed, being assisted on that occasion by the Rev. Fathers Fusseder, Deberge, and Bermadinger. From there he went to Madison and Sauk City, where he confirmed thirty-three persons, and, also, to St. Norbert's Convent chapel at Roxbury, where he performed a like service for thirty-seven. On All Souls' Day he dedicated St. Boniface's Church at Germantown, where Dr. Paul Huber was stationed, and toward the end of November he dedicated St. Francis of Borgia's Church at Newland, Washington County, where Father Colton was rector. On December 19, 1852, he ordained Richard Dumphy and Peter Deberge, and on February 19, 1853, the Rev. Nicholas Pfeffer. St. John's Cathedral was dedicated July 31, 1853, by the Apostolic delegate, Cajetan Bedini, Archbishop Hughes delivering the sermon. This service lasted until three o'clock in the afternoon. An hour later Father Weninger, S. J., preached in German in the presence of an immense concourse of people.

A few days prior to the dedication of St. John's Cathedral, Dr. Joseph Salzmann and Father Heiss bought forty-eight acres of land near St. Francis Convent in Nojoshing. Many of the priests of the diocese were then in retreat, at the close of which they held a meeting to consider the propriety of erecting a seminary, to which undertaking they subscribed three thousand dollars. In March, 1854, the Rev. Thomas Keenan and the Rev. H. J. Holzhauer were ordained, the former becoming assistant pastor of St. Gall's and the latter of St. Mary's. At this time the Neoprysbter Father Lawrence Conrad came to the United States from the diocese of Wuerzburg, locating in Wisconsin, where he attended, successively the congregations of St. Martin's at Springfield, St. Mary's, at Cross Plains, and St. Xavier's, at Perry in Dane County. In the meantime, Dr. Salzmann was actively engaged in securing funds for the completion of his seminary, thus necessitating an extended tour throughout the Northern States. Others, too, were greatly interested in the work, the Franciscan Brothers personally assisting in making the brick for this building, the lumber for which was shipped from Sheboygan. This, it will be readily seen, was no small undertaking, the size of the proposed building being 160x50 feet, four stories high.

In September the Rev. Michael Heiss arrived with the theologians, Hieronymus Bergmann, Francis P. Weinhardt and Joseph Minderer, at the Brother house at Nojoshing, where they opened a school of instruction for students in theology. On May 24 of the following year, fifteen Sisters of Notre Dame took the habit, on which occasion Bishop Henni, assisted by Dr. Paulhuber, the Rev. Father Urbanek, spiritual director of the Sisters, the Rev. J. Donahue, assistant pastor at the Cathedral, and the Rev. Michael Obermueller, rector of the congregation at New Coeln, performed the ceremonies. In August, Bishop Henni took up his residence just south of the Cathedral, where he continued to live until the time of his death. On July 15, the corner-stone of the Priest's Seminary was laid, the ceremony being followed by Pontifical High Mass, celebrated in the open air by Bishop Henni, who was assisted by fifteen priests. The Bishop also addressed the people in German, expressing his pleasure at the completion of this building, in addition to which he said: "As I have now seen this day, I can die in peace, and in this place, in this chapel, my remains shall await the Day of Resurrection."

It was undoubtedly the original intention of Bishop Henni to devote this seminary entirely to the use of German students, he having also completed arrangements with the Rev. William S. Murphy, S. J., Provincial of the Jesuits, for the Order to assume charge of St. Gall's congregation, and direct a college to be used by students of other nationalities. With this understanding, then, the Rev. Fathers De Coen, S. J., and Kenny, S. J., were stationed at this church. On All Saints' Day the new chapel of the Notre Dame Sisters was dedicated. This Order had already erected an academy for young ladies in Milwaukee in connection with the mother house, the number of pupils at that time being thirty-five. They also conducted the parochial school connected with St. Mary's Church, where there were one hundred and seventy-five children; Holy Trinity school, with one hundred and thirty-five children; St. Anthony's Church, in Town 8, with one hundred and twenty scholars; St. Caecelia's Church, at Mount Carmel, with sixty children; a school in Town 12 with one hundred children, and St. Mary's and St. George's School at Kenosha. The Boys' Orphan Asylum was now transferred to Nojoshing and placed under the supervision of the Franciscan Sisters, while in the western part of the diocese the Dominican Sisters erected the Academy of St. Clara, at Benton, Lafayette County.

On January 29, 1856, it being the feast of St. Francis of Sales, the Priests' Seminary was dedicated, the Rev. Michael Heiss becoming rector and Dr. Salzmann procurator of the same. On October 18, following, St. Joseph's Church was dedicated, the sermon on that occasion being delivered by the Rev. Michael Heiss. A few days later, the churches at East Troy and Eagle Center were also dedicated. A few weeks prior to this time, a new church at Kewaskum was dedicated and the cemetery consecrated. Following closely upon these incidents, came the dedication of St. Bernard's Church at Green Bay, and the confirmation of two hundred and twenty-five persons in Holy Cross Church, the dedication of St. Ignatius Church at DePere, at which the Rev. Father Galtier was rector, the dedication of St. John the Baptist Church at Duck Creek, the confirmation of two hundred and seventeen children at Little Chute, the dedication of Holy Angel's Church at Engeldorf, and of St. Charles Borromeo's Church at Menasha, and the confirmation of one hundred and thirteen people at the latter place. On the Sunday following, Bishop Henni confirmed one hundred and thirty persons at St. Peter's Church at Oshkosh, where the Rev. Father Fusseder was stationed. Father Weninger was working in Wisconsin that year, holding missions at Racine, Caledonia, Franklin, and St. Joseph's Church at Milwaukee. It was also in 1856 that Joseph Stucky, Thomas David, P. J. Farrel, P. F. Montague, Max Mueller, Frank Jacob Bloesinger, F. X. Pfaller, and the Dominican Fathers Louis, Bernard and Benedict were ordained. On the third Sunday after Easter, April 25, 1857, the Bishop confirmed eighty-two persons at St. Joseph's Church in Milwaukee, eighty-four in St. Gall's Church, and fourteen pupils in the mother house of the Notre Dame Sisters. From May 8 to 11, he was in Watertown, where he conferred the Sacrament of Confirmation at St. Bernard and St. Henry's Churches, besides dedicating St. Malachia's Church at Horicon. On July 11, one hundred and twenty-nine persons were confirmed at St. Mary's Church, Racine, and ninety-five in St. Ignatius' Church. On October 18, Leonard Batz and Patrick McGuerk were ordained to the priesthood, the former becoming a professor in the Seminary at St. Francis, while Father McGuerk was appointed assistant pastor at St. Peter's Cathedral. November 14 is the next date of interest, it being the occasion when Bishop Henni dedicated the new church at Greenfield, where the Rev. Father John McGowan was stationed, and also confirmed two hundred children there. During this month, Father Weninger held missions in several of the churches in Milwaukee. In the year 1857 several deaths occurred among the working forces of the diocese, among the number being that of the Rev. John Healy, rector of St. Mary's Church at Waushara, June 1, 1857; the Rev. William O'Brien, rector of St. Matthew's Church at Oak Creek, June 10, 1857, and the Rev. Anton Urbanek, spiritual director of Notre Dame Convent, who lost his life in the blowing up of the Mississippi steamer "Pennsylvania," June 13, 1857.

On January 19, 1859, the brick church at Jefferson, formerly owned by the Universalists at that place, and which had been purchased by the Catholics there, was dedicated to divine services. In the following September, the Bishop for the first time visited the northwestern portion of his diocese. At Hudson, on the St. Croix River, he dedicated a new church on the 10th of that month, and confirmed one hundred and nineteen people, while, on December 8, he consecrated the Immaculate Conception Church at Burlington, a stone building 118x50 feet, and on the 11th performed similar services for a church of the same name at Portage City. Bishop Henni was now on historic ground, and, while there, sought by every means in his power to obtain some clue to the labors and location of the first missionaries. In this he was only partially successful, discovering, however, that Father Marquette had been there in 1663, at which time he built a chapel in honor of the Immaculate Conception, and laid out and consecrated a cemetery for the interment of Indians and Canadian voyagers who had received the Sacrament of Baptism.

At Portage City Bishop Henni confirmed one hundred persons, after which he returned to Milwaukee, where, on December 16, he ordained fourteen aspirants to the priesthood in St. John's Cathedral, this being the largest number ordained at one time up to that period. The candidates on this occasion were Joseph Albers, who now lives in Racine, Wisconsin, retired from service on account of old age; Kilian Flasch, who died as Bishop of La Crosse; Leonard Hackhofer, who died in 1864 in his native country, Bavaria; Michael Heiss, Jr., since deceased; Joseph Hermon; Lawrence Kenney, who died February 25, 1870, at Meeme, Manitowoc County, Wisconsin; John Kinsella, who died March 4, 1879, at Franklin, Wisconsin; George Matthews, who died January 27, 1886, at Racine, Wisconsin; Patrick Petit; Henry Roche; Richard Roche, who died at Mauston, Juneau County, Wisconsin, in 1861; George Strickner, who returned to Europe in the summer of 1897; Richard Sullivan, who died at Beloit, Wisconsin, June 18, 1883; and Peter Voissem, who died at Paris, Wisconsin, July 14, 1874.

On January 17, 1860, occurred the death of the Rev. George Rehrl, a young priest of great promise; he was buried in the Sisters' Cemetery at Elm Grove. Two of his brothers were also priests, one in the diocese of Salzburg, the other, Kaspar Rehrl, having been one of the pioneer missionaries of Wisconsin, to which territory he came as early as 1844. Another energetic priest who met with an early death was Father Hieronymus Bergmann, of West Granville, who died April 13, 1860. On May 5, 1860, Bishop Henni confirmed one hundred and ten children at Brighton, Wisconsin, where Father Beiter was then stationed. On the next day he confirmed one hundred and sixteen people at Kenosha, speaking, afterwards, to a large number of people present, in both English and Latin. On June 5 the Bishop dedicated a new church at Springvale, and confirmed eighty-two persons there, and on the next day he confirmed two hundred and eighty-six persons at Fond du Lac, thirty of whom were converts. One of these was afterwards the Very Rev. George Willard, Vicar-General of Dakota. On Corpus Christi Day Bishop Henni officiated in the chapel at Mount Calvary Convent, the resident Capuchins there at that time being Fathers A. Maria Gachet, Franciscus Haas, Bonaventura Frey, two novices and three Brothers. He celebrated High Mass in the open air on an altar built of stones, and afterwards confirmed a class of one hundred and five children. In the afternoon he confirmed another class of eighty-two in St. John's Church, and on the next day one hundred and nineteen at St. Mary's Church, in addition to a number from St. Anna's; the Bishop also confirmed a class at Cascade, Wisconsin, on June 17th, and in Mitchell, Sheboygan County, on the 19th. On July the 8th he laid the corner-stone of St. Mary's Church at Port Washington, where the Rev. Father Weikmann was rector, and on August 1, 1860, dedicated the church at Greenfield, a stone structure, 90x30 feet, the erection of which was begun by Father Weinhardt and completed by Father Jansen; he also conferred the Sacrament of Confirmation.

A little later, in company with the Bishop, Father Weninger made a tour of Wisconsin, holding missions at Caledonia, Milton, Kilbourn Road, Racine, Franklin, and Greenfield. At the Bishop's request, the missionary also visited the western portion of the diocese, preaching in La Crosse, Madison, Sauk City, and other places. In December Bishop Henni conferred holy orders upon Wendelin Bernard, Pancratius Wigert, and Arthur Fagan. At that time the diocese numbered a working force of one hundred and seventeen priests, maintained two hundred and fifteen churches, and supplied spiritual consolation to a Catholic population of one hundred and ninety thousand, the census at that time giving the total population for Wisconsin of seven hundred and seventy-seven thousand souls, and Milwaukee of forty-one thousand one hundred and seventy-four. On June 30, 1861, the Bishop consecrated the chapel at the Priest's Seminary, St. Francis, Wisconsin, the entire structure, after a protracted and zealous struggle of six years, having been finally completed. From the 8th to the 13th of the following month, Father Weninger gave a retreat for the German priests of the diocese, while the Rev. Father Smarius, S. J., afforded a similar function, from the 15th to the 19th, for those speaking the English tongue. On July 15th the new brick church at Port Washington was dedicated, and a week later one erected under the administration of Father Kinsella was made the subject of similar religious observance. Then followed a number of official acts on the part of the Bishop, among which were the dedication of St. Ignatius' Church, Racine, September 1, and of St. Patrick's Church at Ripon, and confirmation of seventy people September 8th; dedication of a new stone church at St. Marie in honor of "Sancta Maria ad fontem," about the middle of September, the exact date being unknown; dedication of St. Andrews' Church in Buffalo town; confirmation of a class of sixty-eight, and celebration of Pontifical High Mass, assisted by the Rev. Fathers Weinhardt, Inama and Strucker, on October 19th; confirmation of a class of fifty-six at St. Norbert's, Roxbury, on October 21st; confirmation of a class at St. Martin's, on October 22d; dedication of St. Mary's Church, on October 25th; confirmation of classes in Holy Saviour and St. Raphael's Churches, at Madison, October 27th. Before the close of the year Bishop Henni also paid official visits to West Granville, Horicon, Mayville, Theresa, Oconomowoc, Elba, Beaver Dam, Lyndon, Kilbourn, and Baraboo.

In March, 1863, the first Bohemian congregation was organized at Milwaukee by the Rev. J. F. Zastera, their first services being held in the old St. Peter's Cathedral. Father Zastera also organized congregations in Racine, Rochester, and Waterford. On May 11 Bishop Henni confirmed ninety-nine people at St. Mary's Church, and seventy-nine at St. Patrick's Church at Racine, and also visited the newly acquired property of the Dominican Sisters at Regensburg. These Sisters came to Wisconsin in May, 1862, at the invitation of Bishop Henni, and erected their mother house at Racine. About a month later (June 12) the Bishop confirmed one hundred and one persons at Belgium, Wisconsin, and on the day following performed the same office for a class at St. Nicholas' Church, Decada. On June 14th, he dedicated Holy Cross Church, a stone building, 155x50 feet, and also confirmed one hundred and forty people. On the 15th he confirmed a class of fifty at Port Washington, and on the 16th and succeeding day performed like ceremonies for classes of one hundred and fifty at Menasha, Cedarburg, and St. Michael's. On the 29th of the same month, Anton Foekler, Henry Korfhage and William O'Connell were ordained to the priesthood at the Salesianum. Then, toward the middle of the month following (July 13), St. Joseph's Church, at Waupun, Dodge County, was dedicated, and seventy-four persons were confirmed. Two days later, St. Mary's Church, at Watertown, was dedicated, the same having been erected by Father Max de Beke. On the 28th of the month, Bishop Henni consecrated Holy Cross Church, at Fond du Lac, Father Kaspar Rehrl, who, twenty-eight years before, had erected a log chapel on the same spot, being present at the dedication. Then, on August 9th, St. Lawrence's Church, at Jefferson, was dedicated, and seventy-one persons confirmed, while on the 15th of the same month the Bishop confirmed a class of fifty-seven at Barton, and on the following day dedicated Holy Trinity, at Kewaskum, and confirmed a class of seventy-one. On the 17th he dedicated St. Matthias' Church, in the town of Barbara. It was on the 3d of the following month that George L. Willard, afterwards a professor in the Salesianum, was ordained to the priesthood. On October 11, the Bishop dedicated a church at Shullsburg, while soon after he confirmed a class of one hundred and sixty children from the missions of Dunleith, St. Mary's, St. Rosa's, Hazel Green, and Vinegar Hill, in St. Dominicus' Church, at Sinsinawa Mound, on which occasion, also, Father Mazzuchelli preached to those assembled in English. On December 27th, I. A. Birkhaeuser, D. McGinnity, Eugene McGinnity, Peter Schwaiger, Anton Verberk, and William W. Verbort were ordained. From June 4 to July 9, 1865, the Tenth General Convention of the German Roman Catholic Central Society held its annual session in the new St. Gall's Academy, Milwaukee.

At the Plenary Council held in Baltimore, Maryland, in October, 1866, Bishop Henni petitioned that Wisconsin be divided into three dioceses, and with the assistance of the Bishops present arranged for a proper distribution of the priests of Wisconsin among the Sees. This petition was sanctioned by Papal decree, under date of March 3, 1868, through which the country lying north and west of the Wisconsin River and north of the Fox and Manitowoc Rivers should form the diocese of Green Bay, while that bounded on the east by the Wisconsin River, on the west by the Mississippi, on the south by the Wisconsin to where it empties into the Mississippi, on the north by Lake Superior, and that part of Michigan stretching from Lake Superior to Lake Michigan should constitute the diocese of La Crosse.

The newly elected Bishop of Green Bay, Joseph Melcher, for some time previous Vicar-General of the diocese of St. Louis, was consecrated July 12, 1868. Upon arriving there, he found the diocese to consist of a working force of twenty-six priests and a Catholic population of forty thousand. The new Bishop of La Crosse, the Right Rev. Michael Heiss, formerly rector of the Salesianum, had at his command a working force of fifteen priests and a population of twenty thousand, while the diocese contained altogether forty-seven churches. Bishop Heiss was consecrated at St. Joseph's Cathedral, September 6, 1868. It was on the 19th of the following March that the twenty-fifth anniversary of the episcopal consecration of Bishop Henni was also celebrated at St. Joseph's Cathedral, a large number of priests assisting in the ceremonies. The occasion was also made notable by a present of $2,000 from the clergy of the diocese to Bishop Henni as a token of their esteem and in recognition of his eminent services to the Church. During the same year, a number of Franciscan Sisters located at Silver Lake, Manitowoc County, Wisconsin, where they erected a mother house. General improvements were also made to the diocese and property (1869-70) by the erection of St. John's Cathedral School and Bishop's Hall. At about the same time, and by order of Vicar-General Kundig, two oil paintings were executed, one representing Bishop Henni seated on the Episcopal throne in St. John's Cathedral, the other Father Kundig kneeling before the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Copies of these pictures were afterwards sold throughout Wisconsin, as well as in other States, the net proceeds thus paying all expenses incurred in the erection of Bishop's Hall. A little later the Teachers' Seminary, at St. Francis, Wisconsin, was built, King Louis I., of Bavaria, donating three thousand florins toward the enterprise. The corner-stone of this building was laid by Bishop Melcher on Holy Trinity Sunday, June 12, 1870, and the dedicatory services were celebrated January 2d of the following year. The Seminary was opened with an attendance of nineteen candidates. During the year following, Pio Nono College was built, and in 1875, under the supervision and direction of Father Theodore Bruener, the Deaf and Dumb Institute at St. Francis was also erected. In connection with these numerous additions and improvements made to the property of St. Francis, it is also desirable to remember that the American Caecelia Society was founded at the Seminary, by Mr. John Singenberger, in 1873.

When Archbishop John McCloskey, of New York, became a Cardinal, in 1875, the dioceses of Boston, Philadelphia, Milwaukee and Santa Fe were made Provinces and their Bishops were elevated to the Archiepiscopate. At this time the Province of Milwaukee comprised the four dioceses of La Crosse, Green Bay, St. Paul and St. Cloud, their respective Bishops being the Right Rev. Michael Heiss, F. X. Krautbauer, Thomas Grace and Rupert Seidenbusch, Vicar-Apostolic of North Minnesota. The Breve and Pallium were delivered to Archbishop Henni by the Papal Ablegate Msgr. Roncetti, on June 3d of the same year, the delivery of the archiepiscopal insignia taking place in St. John's Cathedral in the presence of two hundred priests and a like number of students from the Salesianum. On this occasion, also, Bishop Henni celebrated Pontifical High Mass, while Bishop Ryan, of St. Louis, delivered the sermon. On June 29, 1875, Bishop Henni consecrated F. X. Krautbauer as second Bishop of Green Bay, at St. John's Cathedral, Milwaukee, there also being present Bishops McQuaid, of Rochester; Dwenger, of Fort Wayne; Foley, of Chicago; Mrak, of Marquette, and Seidenbusch, of St. Cloud. On February 8, 1877, the church of St. Franciscus, at Milwaukee, was dedicated by Bishop Henni, assisted by Bishops F. X. Krautbauer and Seidenbusch, in the presence of forty members of the priesthood. The nomination of St. Francis de Sales as Father of the Church by Pope Pius IX., in 1877, was celebrated by the Archbishop with appropriate festivities. He also celebrated High Mass in the chapel at St. Francis' Seminary, in the presence of Bishops Heiss, Dwenger, Foley, Krautbauer, Borgess, Ryan and Mrak. On February 2, 1879, he celebrated his Jubilee Mass in the chapel of Notre Dame Convent, whilst Vicar-General Kundig performed similar services at St. John's Cathedral, where Father Garesche, S. J., delivered the festival sermon. On February 6th the Golden Jubilee of Archbishop Henni was publicly solemnized in the Cathedral, there being present on that occasion the Most Rev. J. B. Purcell, Archbishop of Cincinnati; the Right Rev. Thomas Grace, Bishop of St. Paul; the Right Rev. Michael Heiss, Bishop of La Crosse; the Right Rev. F. X. Krautbauer, Bishop of Green Bay; the Right Rev. Ignatius Mrak, Bishop of Marquette, Michigan; the Right Rev. Rupert Seidenbusch, Bishop of St. Cloud; the Right Rev. John Hennessey, Bishop of Dubuque; the Right Rev. O'Connor, Bishop of Nebraska; the Right Rev. Joseph Dwenger, Bishop of Fort Wayne; the Right Rev. Alexias Edelbrock, Abbot of St. John's Abbey, Minnesota. In honor, also, of this occasion, there was a grand torchlight procession in the evening, there being not less than five thousand men in line. Vicar-General Martin Kundig died March 6, 1879, and was buried in Calvary Cemetery, Milwaukee. He was succeeded as Vicar-General of the diocese by the Rev. Leonard Batz.

In March, 1880, Bishop Heiss was appointed Coadjutor of Archbishop Henni, with the right of succession granted by the Holy See. Events in the history of the archdiocese of Milwaukee and associate dioceses which followed were the consecration of the Rev. Kilian Flasch as Bishop of La Crosse, on August 24, 1881. A few weeks later, September 8th, occurred the death of the venerable Archbishop Henni. Two days later the funeral ceremonies of this venerable and much-loved prelate were observed in the St. John's Cathedral, his remains finding their last resting place in a vault immediately beneath the episcopal chapel. There were present on this solemn occasion the Bishops of the Church Province of Milwaukee, Archbishops Borges, of Detroit; Spalding, of Peoria; McMullen, of Davenport, Iowa; Hennessey, of Dubuque, Iowa; one hundred and fifty members of the priesthood, and all of the students from St. Francis' Seminary. In 1883 the lamented Henni's successor, Archbishop Heiss, went to Rome to attend a convocation of Archbishops. In the following year, he attended the Plenary Council at Baltimore, and in May, 1886, presided at the Provincial Council at Milwaukee. On September 21st of the same year, the Rev. F. X. Katzer was consecrated Bishop of Green Bay, remaining as such until after the death of Archbishop Heiss, which occurred March 26, 1890, the remains being entombed in the chapel of the Salesianum, at St. Francis, Wisconsin. In December, 1890, Bishop Katzer was appointed as successor to the Archiepiscopate, assuming the duties of that office August 21, 1891. On December 14th of the same year, the Rev. Sebastian G. Messmer was appointed Bishop of Green Bay, while the Right Rev. Kilian Flasch, whose death occurred on August 3d of that year, was succeeded as Bishop of La Crosse by the Rev. James Schwebach, who was consecrated February 25, 1892.

Freedom of Worship in Wisconsin.—Know-Nothings.—The A. P. A. Movement.—The Bible in the Public Schools.—The Bennett Law.—Bishops Protest.—The Marquette Statue.—The Catholic Press of Wisconsin.—The Summer School.—The Catholic School System in Wisconsin and Summary.

SOME years ago John Gilmary Shea, in an article published in the American Catholic Quarterly Review, described the difficulties encountered in getting permission to afford to Catholic inmates of public reformatories and prisons ministrations in the religion to which they belonged. This question was made a feature in political campaigns that transpired in New York, Ohio and Kentucky. Finally in all these States, after much controversy, freedom of worship bills were enacted.

For many years there was a discussion before the public boards controlling the Waukesha Industrial School as to the advisability of Catholic priests entering the school and ministering to the Catholics there confined in accordance with the dictates of their religion. When the late Edward O'Neill was on the board governing the Industrial School at Waukesha, this permission was granted to the Catholic clergy as well as to other clergymen. Subsequently appeals and evasions of various kinds were interposed. About the year 1882, however, these vexatious quibbles were withdrawn, owing to a strong presentation of the Catholic case before the Board.

The right of freedom of worship, however, no longer depends upon the indulgence of the State Board; in the Legislature of 1891 a freedom of worship bill, drawn and introduced by H. J. Desmond, of Milwaukee, then a member of the Assembly, became a law. The very reasonable provisions of this law are herewith subjoined:

"Chapter 300. An act to secure religious freedom in public reformatories and prisons.

"The people of the State of Wisconsin represented in Senate and Assembly do enact as follows:

"Section 1. All persons committed to any reform school, prison, or other place of confinement or commitment in this State, shall be allowed spiritual advice and spiritual ministration from any recognized clergyman of the denomination or church to which such persons so committed may respectively belong, or to have belonged prior to their being so committed or confined. Such advice and ministration shall be given within the reform school, prison, or other place of confinement, in such manner as will secure to such persons the free exercise of their belief, and under such reasonable rules and regulations as the officials in charge of such place of confinement shall prescribe.

"Section 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and publication.

"Approved April 17, 1891."

Know-Nothings.

There was a large foreign element in the original settlement of Wisconsin at the period of its admission as a State, which was contemporaneous with the beginning of a large Irish and German immigration to this country, that the Know-Nothing sentiment found little encouragement in Wisconsin. So in 1856, out of one hundred and nineteen thousand votes cast in the presidential election in Wisconsin, but five hundred and seventy-nine votes were counted for Fillmore, the American candidate for President. There were, however, several Know-Nothing lodges in Wisconsin during the '50's, and some of the old constitutions and by-laws are still extant.

The A. P. A. movement, which cropped out in the years 1893-94-95, attained a wider support. It propagated itself among the foreign element even more than among the native element. It developed strength among the unassimilated Norwegians and the less enlightened German Lutherans, besides counting among its supporters a large understratum in our native population that has among its inheritances an unreasoning suspicion of the Catholics. At one time there were upward of one hundred A. P. A. councils or branches throughout Wisconsin; they imported certain ex-priests, and one Simms, of Michigan, and, of course, provoked considerable counter agitation by such demonstrations. Letters against the new Know-Nothingism were elicited by the "Catholic Citizen" from Governor Peck, Senator Vilas, Governor Altgeld, of Illinois, and others. In Milwaukee the Catholics organized into what they called "The Columbian League," and held large mass meetings in different parts of the city. The organs of public opinion came to quite generally discountenance the A. P. A., although at first a certain mysterious neutrality was observed by the daily press. The more mischievous activity of the A. P. A. was manifested in capturing many Republican political primaries by surprise and landing into office a show of small fry politicians. With the discouragement openly shown to the organization by the Republican leaders in the presidential election of 1896, the A. P. A. went into a general decline.

The Bible in the Public Schools.

Among the many notable incidents associated with the growth and progress of Catholicity, not merely in Wisconsin, but throughout the entire country, which have long since gained a world-wide notoriety for significance as regards the use of the Bible in the public schools is the famous "Edgerton Bible Case," as which it is referred to by Donahoe's Magazine in an article upon that subject, and a general review of the case published in 1890. "This case," remarks our authority, "which has been pending in the courts of Wisconsin for over three years, came up for final argument recently before the Supreme Court at Madison. Catholic residents and parents at Edgerton had objected to the reading of the King James version of the Bible during school hours in the public schools of the district. Failing to obtain relief from the School Board, they sought to obtain a permanent injunction against Bible reading from the Circuit Court of Rock County. Judge Bennett decided against their petition, and they appealed to the Supreme Court, which, after a careful review of the whole question, reversed Judge Bennett's decision, and gave to the Catholic petitioners the injunction prayed for.

"The argument in the case hinged on the question whether Bible reading in the public schools was sectarian instruction—the constitution of Wisconsin plainly prohibiting all sectarianism therein."

The Court, in rendering the decision filed by Justice Lyon, said: "That the reading of the Bible in the schools, although unaccompanied by any comment on the part of the teacher, is 'instruction,' seems to us too clear for argument. Some of the most valuable instruction a person can receive may be derived from reading alone, without any intrinsic aid by way of comment or exposition. The question, therefore, seems to narrow down to this: Is the reading of the Bible in the schools—not merely selected passages therefrom, but the whole of it—sectarian instruction of the pupils? In view of the fact already mentioned, that the Bible contains numerous doctrinal passages upon some of which the peculiar creed of almost every religious sect is based, and that such passages may reasonably be understood to inculcate doctrines predicated upon them, an affirmative answer to the question seems unavoidable. Any pupil of ordinary intelligence who listens to the reading of the doctrinal portions of the Bible will be more or less instructed thereby in the doctrines of the divinity of Jesus Christ, the eternal punishment of the wicked, the authority of the priesthood, the binding force and efficacy of the Sacraments, and many other conflicting sectarian doctrines. A most forcible demonstration of the accuracy of this statement is found in certain reports of the American Bible Society of its work in Catholic countries (referred to in one of the arguments), in which instances are given of the conversion of several persons from 'Romanism' through the reading of the Scriptures alone; that is to say, the reading of the Protestant or King James version of the Bible, converted Catholics to Protestants without the aid of comment or exposition. In those cases the reading of the Bible was certainly sectarian instruction. We do not know how to frame an argument in support of the proposition that the reading thereof in the district schools is not also sectarian instruction."

The argument of counsel referred to in the foregoing paragraph was that of H. J. Desmond. We subjoin the passage in question from his address before the Supreme Court:

"I will assume that I am to prove the sectarian character of the King James Bible to the satisfaction of the American Bible Society, who publish the same.

"The Mexicans and Pan-Americans, among whom the American Societies send their publication, seem to object, through their clergy, to accepting the work.

"But perhaps this is a prejudice entertained by the Mexican and South American priesthood. It may be asked whether all religion is not founded on the teachings of the Bible; whether it is not the basis of our common Christianity. Can a truly Christian and Biblical religion be injured by its perusal? Will those objecting, therefore, show to the American Bible Society how this book injures them; why it is a sectarian book, and why they have any reasonable grounds for objection towards it?

"Those objecting might then proceed to say that the Protestant Bible has, in their view, many errors of translation; that these mistranslations are made designedly against many Catholic doctrines, so as to raise in the mind of the reader an impression that some Catholic teachings are not Scriptural; that the Protestant Bible, furthermore, omits some seventy chapters of the inspired canon; that when Catholics can obtain the correct translation, and the whole Bible, their Church cannot, as a religious guide, advise them to receive a mutilated and prejudicial version any more than it can advise them to accept a creed with some of its essential portions omitted, and the meaning of other portions affected by a warped rendering; that the Catholics, having a Bible of their own which they are taught to revere and study, and having a Church which interprets it for them, it is neither in accord with their faith nor prudent for them to take a book printed and circulated by another religious organization, and printed and circulated to be used in the Protestant way; that while the Protestant and Catholic Bibles have much in common, just as the Catholic and Protestant creeds have much in common, their points of difference are not the less marked than the points of difference between the two creeds, and these points of difference go inseparably with the respective versions, but the Protestant principle of private judgment, too, determining the use of the Protestant Bible and the Catholic doctrine of the Church as the interpreter of the Bible, being preliminary to the right use of the Bible by Catholics.

"But these reasons might not satisfy the American Bible Society. It is extremely difficult for men of one zealous order to consider as reasonable what may be weighty considerations with men of another zealous religious body.

"Suppose, however, we appeal to the reports of the Bible Society itself. What do these reports testify? In one instance, we have a letter from Bishop Reilly, of the Methodist Church, laboring in Mexico for the conversion of its benighted inhabitants from the errors of Romanism to those of Methodism. There is a Methodist Church fund at his disposal for this purpose. He writes the Bible Society that he believes he can employ the fund so donated in no way that will more nearly fill its object than by buying a consignment of Bibles from the Bible Society. The circulation of the Scriptures is the surest method of overthrowing Romanism. The good Bishop's letter is printed in the reports as an incitement and a stimulant to donors who are similarly minded. 'Are you zealous against Romanism? Then contribute to get the Scriptures read and circulated in Papal lands, for that is the most effective method of extirpating the Catholic belief.' Such is the unwritten moral.

"In the sixty-fourth report, at page 99, the agent of the Society in Uruguay reports two conversions from Romanism, 'By the power of God's spirit attending the perusal of the Scriptures, without ever having the opportunity to hear a Gospel sermon preached.' Fifty-sixth report, page 94: 'At our Communion last Sabbath two conversions from Rome were received on confession of the faith. The case of one of these was an interesting testimony in favor of Bible distribution.' Fifty-eighth report, page 102 (from Rome), records one hundred and fifteen conversions from 'Romanism' amongst the Italian soldiers, through the aid of the Bible reading. Fifty-eighth report, page 93, relates a touching incident respecting Senor A, who purchased a Bible from a colporteur. He read it nightly to his household. 'These readings resulted in the three women seeing the errors of Romanism, and the two younger women began attending Protestant churches, about that time started in Toluca.'

"(I make some ten similar references to these reports in my printed brief. The reports are on file in the State Historical Library.)

"Here, then, is testimony that renders it altogether needless to go into elaborate argument with the Bible Society touching the sectarian character of their publication.

"Presuming that the Bible Society is composed of honest men; presuming that they agree, as all honest men must, with the Supreme Court of Ohio, when it says (230 S., 211) that 'to tax a man to put down his own religion is the very essence of tyranny,' I will ask them what do they think of taxing the 'Romanists' to pay teachers and to warm school-houses, where a book is used that, according to their reports, exposes the errors of Romanism and tends to destroy and obliterate that creed; a text book whose mere reading (as in the Uruguay case above noted) without any gospel sermons by way of note or comment, overthrows the Catholic faith in those that listen to it?

"If I were addressing the American Bible Society, and asking them to decide the question that this Court is now debating, I anticipate that, as honest men, their decision would be thus:

"'We have reiterated in our reports that the circulation and reading of our particular version of the Bible in Papal lands is injurious to the Catholic creed, and helpful to Protestantism. We use the King James version of the Bible as our great misisonary text-book in those lands against Romanism. See our reports.

"'Such being the case, we cannot, as honest men, pretend that our version has not an anti-Catholic influence when read in the common schools.

"'We should be hypocrites to say it is an unsectarian work. We should be double-dealers after what we have printed in our reports to ask any board of education to continue its use in the public schools as a book equally fair to Catholics and Protestants, and as a work to be used in a school system that attracts Catholic pupils by advertising that its instruction and its books are unsectarian. If we should say that our version of the Bible is death to Romanism in Mexico, and yet harmless to Romanism in Wisconsin, we should be nothing better than common deceivers, equivocators and liars.'

"I dwell thus at length on the position of the American Bible Society because it is the printer and publisher of every Bible that seeks admission as a textbook or reading manual into the public schools.

"If the printer and publisher must take this position, and no sane man who is honest enough to face a fact without winking can doubt that the American Bible Society must take that position or stultify itself, who is there left to claim that this Bible version is an unsectarian book?"

In a further opinion in this case, filed by Justice Cassoday, it is also argued that Bible reading in the public schools may be worship in a sense which would make the school room a place of worship, and to such use of the public schools the taxpayers have a right, under Section 18, Article 1, to object; and such Bible instruction would also make the public school a religious Seminary, for the support of which no money shall be drawn from the public treasury. The force of this reasoning would exclude the Bible from the public schools of any State, even where the prohibition against sectarian instruction is not in the constitution of the statutes; for in the constitution of all the States, as Judge Cooley says, "compulsory support, by taxes or otherwise, of religious instruction is not permitted." The Wisconsin case is generally regarded as establishing a trend of judicial decision on this question. Briefs and arguments in this case were submitted by John Winans, H. J. Desmond, and J. H. Wigman in behalf of those objecting to the Bible in the public schools, and by J. P. Towne and A. A. Jackson on the other side. The case, which is entitled "State ex rel Weiss and others, appellants, vs. the District Board of School No. 8 of the city of Edgerton," is found fully reported in the 76th Wisconsin, page 177.

The credit of making this fight against sectarianism in the public schools was largely due to the Rev. James F. Bowe, then pastor at Edgerton, Wisconsin. Father Bowe felt that the rights of his people were imposed upon, and having taken up the contest he pushed it to a conclusion with a vigor and energy. The fund which enabled him to do so was raised by Edward A. Bray, through the columns of the Catholic Citizen.

The Bennett Law.

But a short time previous to his death Archbishop Heiss held a prolonged and serious consultation with the other Bishops of Wisconsin, the Right Rev. F. X. Katzer, of Green Bay, and Kilian Flasch, of La Crosse. The principal object which called into active service the failing energies of the dying prelate was the Bennett Law, an obnoxious and un-American measure which had passed the Legislature of Wisconsin in 1889. Regarding this law, and its evident venomous purpose, Father Schinner says:

"Schools were attached to all the Catholic Churches in the city and to many in the country. These schools were continually aiming at a higher standard; their teachers were well trained, for the most part women or men who considered the profession of teaching the one end of their lives. Children could attend these schools with very small expense; for the poor, all things, even books, were free of charge. Still it was thought advisable to make the schools free for all; the movement was begun and gained ground. At the Cathedral a society was organized in the year 1883 called St. John's Cathedral School Society; its purpose was to 'support and maintain a free school for all the children of the Cathedral parish, and to promote and encourage Catholic education for all the Catholic children.' It received the approbation of Rome and many spiritual favors. All was prosperous and augured well. An overt act of hostility could not injure them; to do this a measure was necessary that concealed hostile designs and gave color to them. That such was the purpose of the Bennett Law,[1] was the conclusion of many after that law had been traced to its source.

(1) The Bennett Law.—Laws of Wisconsin, 1889, Chapter 519.—AN ACT concerning the education and employment of children. The people of the State of Wisconsin, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1. Every parent or other person having under his control a child between the ages of seven and fourteen years, shall annually cause such child to attend some public or private day school in the city, town or district in which he resides, for a period not less than twelve weeks in each year, which number of weeks shall be fixed prior to the first day of September in each year, by the Board of Education or Board of Directors of the city, town or district; and for a portion or portions thereof, to be so fixed by such boards, the attendance shall be consecutive and such boards shall, at least ten days prior to the beginning of such period, publish the time or times of attendance, in such manner as such boards shall direct; provided, that such boards shall not fix such compulsory period at more than twenty-four weeks in each year.

Section 2. For every neglect of such duty the person having such control and so offending shall forfeit to the use of the public schools of such city, town or district, a sum not less than three dollars ($3.00) nor more than twenty dollars ($20.00); and failure for each week or portion of a week on the part of any such person to comply with the provisions of this act, shall constitute a distinct offense: provided, that any such child shall be excused from attendance at school required by this act, by the Board of Education or School Directors of the city, town or district in which such child resides upon its being shown to their satisfaction that the person so neglecting is not able to send such child to school, or that instruction has otherwise been given for a like period of time to such child in the elementary branches commonly taught in the public schools, or that such child has already acquired such elementary branches of learning, or that his physical or mental condition is such as to render attendance inexpedient or impracticable, and in all cases where such child shall be so excused, the penalty herein provided shall not be incurred.

Section 3. Any person having control of a child who, with intent to evade the provisions of this act, shall make a wilfull false statement concerning the age of such child or the time such child has attended school, shall, for such offense, forfeit a sum of not less than three dollars ($3.00) nor more than twenty dollars ($20.00) for the use of public schools of such city, town or district.

Section 4. Five days prior to the beginning of any prosecution under this act such board shall cause a written notice to be personally served upon such person having control of any such child, of his duty under this act, and of his default in failing to comply with the provisions hereof, and if, upon the hearing of such prosecution, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court, that before or after the receipt of such notice such person has caused such child to attend a school as provided in this act in good faith and with intent to continue such attendance, then the penalty provided by this act shall not be incurred.

"The provisions of this law seemed reasonable and harmless; reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and United States history, were to be taught in English. This was captiously put in the foreground and concealed the real issue. Other provisions were not so harmless. The children were to attend school within their district; hence, not a parochial school if not within these limits; the School Board was to judge which schools fulfilled the requirements and which children should be permitted to attend; hence, that board could interfere with parochial schools; virtually, its members had discretionary power, unlimited control. Implicitly, the right was granted them to enter any school, tantalize the teacher, prescribe the text-book; in truth, it would have been difficult to assign the limit where their power ceased; and all this with regard to schools erected and supported without the assistance of the State by parents who paid tax for the public schools and taxed themselves for their own. The plea was made that children were neglected. One may be permitted to say that it is difficult to put so much irony in so few words when one hears it asserted that politicians, with all the possible tendencies that word suggests, have greater solicitude for children than the parents who for their sakes impose upon themselves a double burden. The opponents of the law readily grant the majority of its supporters to have been led by conviction, and they wish to believe the prime movers to have been actuated by honesty and patriotism, although a great difficulty here presents itself; for patriotism will not defame its own State, and, by ludicrous assertions, make it the butt of ridicule; neither will honesty raise a false issue, as was done by parading the 'Little School House,' and insinuating that the enemies of the law wished to proscribe the English language, and threatened the very existence of the public schools. Lutherans and others combined with Catholics to antagonize the measure. They would not brook interference, and considered their school their castle, as the Englishman does his home. Knowing full well that the educational institutions of the State have been invaded by politics and are in the hands of aldermen who are sometimes very ignorant; recognizing the impossibility of a pledge that the members of school boards will always be competent men, or of a guarantee that they will be guided by honesty and fairness, that they will view things in their real light, not in the color of preconceived ideas and inveterate antipathies, the opponents of the law refused to surrender their liberty. Asserting that the education imparted by their institutions is not inferior to that imparted by the State, they challenged criticism. And indeed the friends of parochial schools may with pride refer their enemies to the success achieved by these schools at the World's Columbian Exposition.

"In short, the Bennett Law seemed the narrow end of a wedge designed to lay the schools open to the chicanery of enemies; it was a blow aimed at religion; religion attacked by politics had a right to defend itself by means of politics. This the Bishops of Wisconsin recognized, and, though reluctantly, from the bed of the Section 5. No school shall be regarded as a school, under this act, unless there shall be taught therein, as part of the elementary education of children, reading, writing, arithmetic and United States history, in the English language.

Section 6. Prosecutions under this act shall only be instituted and carried on by the authority of such boards, and shall be brought in the name of said boards, and all fines and penalties, when collected, shall be paid to the School Treasurer of such city, town or district, or other officer entitled to receive school moneys, the same to be held and accounted for as other school moneys received for school purposes.

Section 7. Jurisdiction to enforce penalties herein described in this act is hereby conferred on justices of the peace and police magistrates within their respective counties.

Section 8. Any child between the age of nine and fourteen years, who, without leave and against the will of his parent, guardian or other person having the right to control such child, habitually absents himself from the school to which he is sent or directed to be sent, and is beyond the control of his parent or guardian or other person having the right to control such child in that regard, and wanders or lives in streets, alleys or other public places, shall be deemed a truant child, and on such truancy being alleged and proved, such truant child shall be adjudged a dependent child in like manner as is now provided by law for the adjudication of dependent children, and on being so judged dependent may be committed in like manner for such time not exceeding two years, as the judge or court having jurisdiction of the matter may determine. Any child so committed may, upon proof of amendment, or for after sufficient cause shown upon a hearing of the case be discharged by such judge or court at any time, but such child shall not be so confined after the age of fourteen years, nor shall he be bound or apprenticed nor placed out of any school to which he shall be committed. Officers appointed by the Board of Education or School Directors shall have power and authority to take a truant child found on the streets, alleys or other public places during school hours to such school conveniently located to the home of such child, as may be designated and requested by such parent, guardian or other person having the right to control such child, and such officers shall ascertain from such parent, guardian or other person having the right to control such child, the school which he desires such child shall attend; or in case of refusal to designate and request, by the parent, guardian, or other person having the right to control such child; or in case such child has no parent, guardian or other person in control, then to the public school situated in the district where such child lives, or to such public school as such board may direct.

Section 9. No child under thirteen years of age shall be employed or allowed to work by any person, company, firm or corporation at labor or service in any shop, factory, mine, store, place of manufacture, business or amusement, except as hereinafter provided.

Section 10. The judge of the County Court in the county where the child resides and is to be employed or to work, may, by order of record, grant a permit to any child over ten years to be exempt and in such county from the operation of this act as to such employment, and to such extent, and for such times and on such terms as may be named in such permit, on its being shown to his satisfaction that such child can read and write the English language and that it is fit and proper considering the lack of means of support of the family of which such child is a member, that such permit should be granted, and such permit may be rescinded by any such judge on written notice to such child, or to any person having control of or employing such child. Such permit must state the age, place of residence and the amount of school attendance prior to the granting of such permit. A record of such permits to be kept in such court. The court may, when the business of the court requires, appoint a suitable person to hear and report on all applications for the issuance and recision of permits, and may, on hearing such report, grant or refuse such application. Such person to be paid a reasonable compensation by the county, to be fixed by the County Board. Such person shall be an officer of the Court, and removable by an order of Court at any time. No charge or fee shall be required in any matter under this section.

Section 11. No child shall be so employed or work who does not present such permit, and every person, before employing or permitting such child to so labor, or be at service, shall require and retain such permit, and shall keep the same together with a correct list of all children so employed posted in a conspicuous manner in the place of employment, and shall show such list on demand, to any school officer or teacher or police officer.

Section 12. Any person, company, or corporation, who employs or permits to be employed or to work any child in violation of this act, and any person having the control of any such child who permits such employment or work, shall, for every offense forfeit a sum of not less than ten dollars ($10), nor more than fifty dollars ($50), for the use of the public schools of such city, town or district, and every day of such illegal employment shall constitute a distinct offense.

Section 13. Any person having control of or in his employ a child, who, with intent to evade the provisions of this act, shall make a false statement concerning the age of such child or the time such child has attended school, or shall instruct such child to make any false statement, shall, for such offense, forfeit a sum of not less than ten dollars ($10), nor more than fifty dollars ($50), for the use of the public schools of such city, town or district.

dying Archbishop issued a combined protest. The blame, if blame there must be for this action, rests upon those who forced it upon them."

At the gubernatorial election in November, 1890, the Bennett Law being the issue, the Democratic candidate poled one hundred and sixty thousand three hundred and eighty-eight votes to one hundred and thirty-tow thousand and sixty-eight for Hoard, Republican candidate, Peck's plurality being twenty-eight thousand three hundred and twenty. Hoard's plurality in 1888 was twenty thousand two hundred and seventy-three. Peck increased the Democratic vote about five thousand over what it was in 1888, while on the part of Hoard there was a falling off of fully forty-three thousand votes. Analyzing results, the general impression is that a very full Democratic vote was poled, owing to the vigorous opposition put in on the part of the German Catholic churchmen, and that many of those Republicans, Lutherans, who had heretofore voted the Republican ticket, voted this time for Governor Peck, while perhaps as large a number had abstained from voting.

Urging the Catholics and friends of religious liberty to defeat this law at the ballot-box, the Bishops of Wisconsin laid bare its weak points and sinister designs by means of a very able and effective protest, which was as follows:

Bishops' Protest.

As Bishops of the Catholic Church in Wisconsin, we feel called upon to make an official declaration concerning the Bennett Law—in fact, to enter our protest against it. If this law were of a purely political nature, we would not have a single word to say about it; but as it touches upon questions of the greatest interest to our Catholic Church and our Catholic homes, we consider ourselves in duty bound to express and explain, even at some length, our opinion concerning the same. After calm and careful study of the Bennett Law, we hold that it interferes with the rights of the Church and of parents. We, moreover, conscientiously believe that the real object of this law is not so much to secure a greater amount of instruction in and knowledge of the English language, as rather to bring our private and parochial schools under the control of the State. And in this attempt we cannot but apprehend the ultimate intention gradually to destroy the parochial school system altogether.

The impression which a close study of the law leaves on our minds is this: That in the eyes of its framers the parochial school exists by the grace and toleration of the State, and may continue to exist, if it humbly submits to the discretionary powers granted to school boards institution, as old as the State itself, and deriving its existence from the free will and the generous efforts and sacrifices of hundreds of thousands of citizens acting in full accord with the dictates of their conscience and the through the Bennett Law, but not as a free, recognized spirit of the free institutions of our State and country. In this, our general view of the law and its object, we are strengthened by the personal knowledge which we have, from actual observation, of our schools. For we are certain that in them the English language is used and taught to at least as great an extent as the Bennett Law requires.

After this general observation we enter our most earnest protest against the Bennett Law for the following particular reasons: We consider the Bennett Law

1. An unnecessary law;
2. An offensive law;
3. An unjust law.

Ad. 1. We have in our three dioceses 264 parochial schools, 14 colleges, academies and select schools, 9 orphan asylums. To the best of our own personal knowledge, the English language is used and taught in all of them, even for a longer time each year than the 12 or 24 weeks required by the Bennett Law. The exceptions, if any, are so few, that no special legislation is needed as a remedy; and, certainly, not a law so harsh and so severe as the Bennett Law, fairly bristling with threats of prosecutions and fines. We know, it is true, of some districts in the State where, on account of hardly any English being spoken at home, the children make but little progress in English at school. But this is precisely as true of the children who attend the public schools in those districts, as it is true of those who attend the parochial schools. The fact that our mixed and fast-growing population is in no part of the State of a really remote and, in many, of a very recent date, sufficiently accounts for this defect. The natural causes of this defect being beyond the control of Legislature, we may, from general development and improvement, safely expect the disappearance of this defect without any legislative provisions.

Ad. 2. In the second place, we consider the Bennett Law an offensive law.

We have at least 350,000 Catholics in Wisconsin. They are as good, law-abiding citizens as any. Except in some places in which parochial schools are impossible, and in some cases of carelessness, they send their children to the parochial schools. All these schools have been built and are maintained by the parents themselves, often at a very great cost and sacrifice. Never, as far as we know, has the State been asked to appropriate one single dollar for these schools. A great number of them have been in operation for more than twenty-five or thirty years. They have turned out hundreds of thousands of as good and useful citizens as any. It is, consequently, an outrage upon the intelligence and good character of our Catholic people, to interfere with their schools. Are the 50-60,000 Catholic fathers and mothers of families so ignorant and stupid that they do not know what kind of education their children need; or are they so destitute of love and interest for their children that they would not be willing to provide proper education for them? Have they deserved to be treated as persons who cannot or will not take care of the interests of their children, so that the State has to step in and act as guardian for them? Such, indeed, is the appearance of things, when the State attempts to force upon so many of its citizens a law of which not one in ten, and perhaps not one in a hundred, had an idea, or felt the want, when they sent their representatives to Madison—a law against which thousands upon thousands of the State's most industrious and conservative citizens, outside of our religious communion, most unanimously and vigorously protested, as soon as they got knowledge of that law. It is a well-known fact that, in the same Legislature which passed the Bennett Law, the Pond Bill had to succumb to the pressure of remonstrances against it from all parts of the State, though that bill provided for State supervision of private schools for the sole purpose of obtaining reliable statistics. Towards the close of the session, when bills of any great importance naturally cannot command the consideration which they deserve, the Bennett Law was substituted for the Pond Bill. That the citizens at large would have tried to prevent its passage, as well as that of the Pond Bill, is evident from the fact that they began to protest against the law as soon as it was published. From all this, it is but too clear that the Bennett Law must be called an offensive law. But it is also

3. An unjust law. And on this account we object to it still more strongly than on any other.

The Bennett Law is an unjust law because

a. It interferes with the sacred, inalienable rights of parents.

b. It threatens penalties which are really beyond all equity.

c. It opens every avenue to partiality and injustice, to strife and disorder.

Ad. a. Parents have the duty to educate their children because, under God, the children belong to parents who have to give to Him an account for them. This most sacred duty necessarily gives them also the inalienable right to educate their children. If any one, the State not excepted, takes away from parents this right or interferes with it, he violates one of the first principles of the natural order. There may be cases in which parents either grossly neglect this duty or positively abuse this right, for the damage or ruin of their children. It is only in such cases that the State, as the custodian of the rights of its citizens, is justified and obliged to step in and make parents do their duty or punish them for the abuse of their right. The cry has been raised that, as to education, Catholics, and especially their Bishops and priests, deny every right to the State and assume every right for the Church, that they want to make Catholic parents free from the State and slaves to the Church. Here may be the proper occasion to place this question in its true light and meaning before the public at large. Indeed, we deny to the State the right to educate the children of those parents who are willing and able to do so themselves. If parents want to delegate the exercise of their inalienable right to the State—as those parents do who send their children to the public schools—the State acts simply by delegated power, as the agent or functionary of those parents, not above them, but for them. If other parents, and there are thousands upon thousands, do not want to delegate the exercise of their right, they are perfectly free to retain it for themselves. All the State can demand of such parents for the common good is that they do not allow their children to grow up in ignorance or to acquire such knowledge as would make useless or dangerous citizens of their children. Now, whereas our Catholic parents provide an education for their children which not only not endangers but promotes the welfare of the State, their schools should not be molested by any interference on the part of the State. The conduct of our children in and out of school, the character of the younger generations which have passed through our schools, their standing and success as farmers, mechanics, business men and professional men should be sufficient guarantee to the State that our parents have not neglected their duties toward the State in the education of their children. Official inspection and supervision by Boards—the members of which are generally not better posted on school matters and certainly not more interested in school children than the parents themselves—should be left aside; for friendly visits of fellow-citizens or State officials our schools shall be open.

As to the position of the Church:

She insists, indeed, on parents giving their children not only a secular, but also a religious education. This obligation of parents, however, is not chiefly the result of a positive Church law; but it is an obligation incumbent on Christian parents by the natural and divine law, independent of the action or law of the Church. It is a most sacred and indispensable duty of Christian parents to educate their children in the knowledge and fear and love of God—to provide religious instruction for their children, a duty which they cannot neglect without guilt. The Church merely urges parents to comply with a duty imposed upon them by divine law, and every Catholic parent will acknowledge that it is his conscientious duty to save and protect the faith of his children, to have them well instructed in it, both theoretically and practically.

No one can be a true member of the Church and at the same time hold a different view or follow a different practice from this. "The Church," says the III. Plenary Council of Baltimore (No. 194), "whose mission on earth, above all, is this, to lead every man, regenerated in the Baptism of Christ, even from the first use of his reason, in the ways of truth and justice to his supernatural end, can by no means allow that Catholic parents —whose natural and divine right, as well as duty, is to provide a Christian education for their children—procure for them a merely secular education; because such education cannot equip them with the means necessary to know and reach their last end." The Church, then, teaches distinctly that the Christian education is the natural and divine right and duty of the parents, which they have anterior to and independent of any law and action of the Church.

But how can they fulfill this their sacred duty? The public schools professedly and exclusively give only a secular education; the parochial school is established and operated to give both a secular and religious education, and is, in our present time and circumstances, the ordinary, and, we may say, almost the only means for securing to Catholic children the necessary religious education. For these reasons the Church urges and obliges parents to send their children to parochial schools, for whosoever is bound to the end is also bound to the means. The Church does not hereby violate the rights of parents, in any sense whatsoever, but simply insists on the parents doing their God-given duty.

So much to show that the Church by no means interferes with parental rights, by insisting on parents doing their natural and divine duty, whilst the State, through the Bennett Law, attacks these rights, by interfering with the parochial, that is, the parents' school. It will not do to object that the Bennett Law, or at least the one official explanation of it, given by the State Superintendent, assures us "that there is no attempt or purpose to ostracize, antagonize or in any manner or degree to interfere with parochial or any other form of private schools"; that "the law has due regard for the rights of conscience and holds parents alone responsible, and requires of them only that they provide for their children, somehow or somewhere, that secular education which the State deems necessary for its own prosperity and for the welfare of its citizens." For in the very next sentence the State Superintendent explains that parents, even though they provide for the education of their children in private schools—certainly then "somehow or somewhere"—may be summoned by the School Board and "must show sufficient reason for non-attendance of their children upon the public school." In the one part of his explanation, the State Superintendent fully asserts the right of parents and in the very next he denies the same entirely, by making parents liable to be summoned for making use of it. This is direct interference with parochial and private schools, the schools of the parents, and, consequently, the rights of the parents.

But not only in the general principle, also in various details, are the rights of parents attacked by the Bennett Law.

Sec. 1. provides that the children must attend school "in the city, town or district in which the parent resides." According to this, parents could not send their children to the parochial school, if it so happens that it is outside of the district in which they reside. Nor could they send any of their children to a boarding school outside of the city, town or district in which they reside. In both cases they would have first to obtain permission from the School Board of the district. They would have to apply for a like permission, if, as so many country parents do, they wanted to send their children to town for at least some months previous to first Holy Communion, if that period of time should fall within the weeks fixed by the School Board for consecutive attendance upon some school in the district. Again, the law does not allow parents to have anything to say as to the time of the year during which the twelve or twenty-four weeks of compulsory attendance should be fixed. It is the School Board that decides all; the parents have nothing to say.

Sec. 5 goes even so far as to leave it to the decision of the Board, whether a school is to be regarded as a school at all under this Law, or not. We have, indeed, nothing against the demand that reading, writing, arithmetic and United States history be taught in the English language. But we do object to the power granted by this provision to School Boards to decide whether our schools have a right to exist before the law or not.

Ad. b. The Bennett Law is, furthermore, an unjust law, because of the fines which it threatens. We do not hesitate to call them ruinous fines. If any one will take the trouble to calculate the fines which a parent might have to pay for one single child during a single year, he will find out that the amount is simply apalling. It will come to hundreds of dollars, and all that within the letter of the law. It will not help much to say that such exorbitant fines will never be collected, or that it is not even the spirit of the law that they should be collected. They stand as a part of the law, and either have not been well considered, or they must have been intended as a threat by which to scare timid people into a trembling submission to an unjust law.

Ad. c. Finally, we consider the Bennett Law unjust, because it opens every avenue to partiality and injustice, to strife and discord.

Sec. 6 speaks of prosecutions under this law on the part of the School Boards.

But neither here nor anywhere else is it defined that and when they must prosecute. They may and they may not.

This evidently gives the parents entirely over to the discretionary powers of the School Boards, opening every way to partiality and strife. In cities with large parochial schools, in which there are many children of influential citizens, the School Board will probably be rather slow about prosecuting. In rural districts, as the experience of our neighboring state, Illinois, plainly shows, they may annoy and vex parents to their hearts' content, all in the name of the famous Bennett Law of the State of Wisconsin. It may be claimed that, inasmuch as the School Boards are not appointed by the Government but elected by the people, they will naturally be inclined to act agreeably to the wishes of their constituents. But no matter how fairly they may be disposed, no officer should have any more discretionary powers than absolutely necessary; otherwise he is apt to act arbitrarily and to exceed the wishes and wants of his constituents.

It is possible that some may attempt to weaken the force of our protest, by the insinuation that it is dictated perhaps as much by the German Catholics' interest in the German language as by our zeal for the intact preservation of parental rights. We hereby declare, most unequivocally, that such is not the case, though we fully concede to every non-English speaking nationality in our State the right to preserve their language, as long as they believe this to be for the best interests of themselves and their children. As the English language is the official language of our country, our schools will and must use and teach it, even to a greater extent than the Bennett Law requires, not only for twelve or twenty-four weeks of the year, but all the year round. As long, however, as any other language—be it German, French, Polish, Dutch, Bohemian or any other—is in many parts of our State the language of home and family, we consider it a great advantage for children to know, besides the English, the language of the home circle, and we cannot possibly see what disadvantage to State and society there could arise from the instruction of our children in more than one language.

It is not our concern about any language, but the defense of God-given rights and duties which has prompted this, our protest. Our exclusively English parochial schools are as much affected by the Bennett Law, in principle, as our mixed schools, though probably, for reasons of prudence, they would be allowed, for the near future at least, not to feel its effects, if the law should remain a part of the legislation of our State. But we confidently hope that not only our Catholic voters but all friends of parental rights will stand together for the repeal of this law.

It is certainly no pleasure for us to come out with this protest. Nothing but our duty, well considered before God, could have prompted us to enter it. Neither we, ourselves, nor our beloved clergy, nor our faithful people, have invited the necessity of this protest; it is forced upon us.

We want to live in peace and good fellowship with all our fellow-citizens; if strife and discord has been stirred up, the fault rests not with us. We teach by word and example, respect and obedience to law and government; no law should be forced upon us for the repeal of which we would have to raise our voice.

The youngest of us have lived and worked in our State nearly twenty-five, the oldest almost fifty years. We have labored incessantly for the education of our youth; we shall continue to do so to the end of our days. Under God we have always relied on the zeal of our priests and the generosity of our people. We have never received one single cent of State help for our schools—we want no State interference with them, either.

MICHAEL HEISS,
Archbishop of Milwaukee,
KILIAN C. FLASCH,
Bishop of La Crosse,
F. X. KATZER,
Bishop of Green Bay.

Regarding the ultimate repeal of this law, the Hon. H. J. Desmond, who was Chairman, in 1891, of the Assembly Committee on Education, furnishes us the following interesting information:

"There was among the American delegation in the Assembly in 1891 no little competition for the honor of presenting the bill for the repeal of the Bennett Law. Conrad Krez, who had distinguished himself on the stump through the campaign, had such a bill in his pocket; but the speaker's eye was caught by Assembly-repeal of the law was promptly reported for passage man Schmitz, of the Ninth Ward, whose bill for the by the Committee on Education. The task of drafting a substitute law fell to me, as Chairman of the committee. I drew a substitute law, with the aid of a number of proposed measures of the same nature submitted in other States; then I sent copies of my draft to various school officials, to the prominent Lutheran ministers who had taken an active part in the campaign, and also to prominent Catholic authorities, asking at the same time from all of these parties suggestions, and urging them to carefully examine the provision of the draft, to see that no personal rights were infringed. The draft came back to me from these various quarters with very slight and immaterial amendments. We called a caucus of the Democratic members of the Assembly and Senate, and while there was considerable variety of opinion the caucus finally decided to endorse the measure proposed. In the end the bill passed both the Assembly and Senate with very little opposition, the majority of the Republicans in the Senate voting for it. This compulsory education law, described in the papers at the time as the "Desmond Law," remains on the statute books to-day. Its provisions against truancy are, perhaps, its most valuable feature, and these have been acted upon by the school boards of Milwaukee and other cities, and, at least so far as these provisions are concerned, it is not what most compulsory laws are, and what the Bennett Law always was, a dead-letter law."

Columbian Catholic Summer School.

On May 11, 1892, at the headquarters of the Catholic Club in New York, a meeting of the Catholic clergymen and laymen decided upon the establishment of a Catholic Summer School, an undertaking which had long been advocated by numerous Catholic periodicals throughout the country. The location of the first meeting was New London, Connecticut, where, between the 1st and 20th of August of that year, the daily average attendance was not less than five hundred. This, be it understood, was far beyond the estimate made by the managers of the undertaking. Thus, as in the case of the Chautauqua movement, everybody at once realized that it was simply a question of time when the organization would have acquired a development so extensive that other locations would have to be selected, so that schools might be held in different sections of the country at the same time. The movement resulting in the fulfillment of this belief was brought about by the selection of Plattsburg, in the extreme northeastern part of New York, as the permanent site and location of the first school; for it was then that the Catholic press took up the cry advocating the immediate establishment of a similar organization more convenient to the Western territory.

The Western School originated at the "Lilacs," Dr. Egan's cottage near Notre Dame, Indiana. It was the result of a social evening, at which were present Maurice Francis Egan, Dr. Zahm, and H. J. Desmond, the latter, who was then on a visit to Notre Dame, being delegated to arrange a future meeting at Chicago. In pursuance of these arrangements, a number of Catholic clergymen and laymen met at the Columbian Club, Chicago, on June 14, 1894, for the purpose of establishing a Summer School during the succeeding year. An Executive Committee was appointed, of which the Hon. W. J. Onaham was Chairman, the Committee being authorized to select a temporary or permanent site, and to make all necessary financial arrangements. This Committee met again on October 11, 1894, when, after a thorough canvass of the matter, Madison, Wisconsin, was unanimously selected as the site of the first session of the Summer School, and active committees were appointed to assure the success of the project.

In the meantime assurances of coöperation and unquestionable interest in the project came from all quarters, the undertaking meeting with the warmest support from clergy and laity alike. At a subsequent meeting, a permanent organization having been perfected, a constitution was adopted providing for the government of the school by an association consisting of annual members, paying an annual fee of ten dollars, and a limited number of life members at fifty dollars each. This entitles them to all the privileges of the school, as well as a voice in its management. Since the time of its organization, the annual sessions of the school have been held at Madison, which has consequently had the benefit of that gathering during the years 1895-96-97.

The Summer School combines instruction and profit with recreation and rest. Its lectures are selected for their well-known ability and thorough understanding of the subjects upon which they treat. The scope of instruction at the Madison Summer School includes a discussion of topics such as the following: Church history, political economy, ethics, relations between labor and capital, Christian doctrine, church music, sacred Scriptures, Church and State, and a variety of single lectures are given on topics along these and other lines, such as Christian science, historical criticism, Eastern schism, science and religion. The Western School was incorporated in 1896. The present officers of the organization are: President, Bishop Messmer; First Vice-President, Conde B. Pallen, St. Louis; Second Vice-President, Rev. J. J. Keogh, Milwaukee; Treasurer, D. H. McBride, Columbus, Ohio; Secretary, John A. Hartigan, St. Paul.

The Marquette Statue.

During the session of the State Legislature in 1897, the A. P. A. sentiment cropped out in a determined effort to cast obliquy on the fair name of Wisconsin by removing from Statuary Hall, Washington, the beautiful statue of Pere Marquette, which Wisconsin has placed in one of its niches, and to replace it by the statues of General J. M. Rusk and General Lucius Fairchild. The bill asking Congress to make this change was introduced by Assemblyman Sweeting of Manitowoc County.

There was immediately a storm of protest from all over the State. The opposition was determined, but it was scattered, and it looked for a time as though the Sweeting Bill would become a law. At this juncture, the Marquette College Alumni Association of Milwaukee took up the fight and unified an opposition to the measure. It presented the following strong petition signed by thousands of voters of all faiths and creeds, to the legislature:

"Whereas, the Congress of the United States, by joint resolution adopted March 3, 1893, specially authorized the State of Wisconsin to erect in the old hall of the House of Representatives, a statue of Pere Marquette, and

"Whereas, the people of the State of Wisconsin in Senate and Assembly represented, in accordance with this resolution, have caused to be placed in this old hall of the House of Representatives a statue of this illustrious explorer, which gift has been accepted, on behalf of the nation, by the Senate of the United States, and

"Whereas, a memorial has been introduced in the Wisconsin State Legislature, proposing to revoke the people's gift and requesting the Congress of the United States to return to the State of Wisconsin the statue erected in pursuance of the resolutions above referred to. The reasons of such proposed action being:

"First. That there is in course of erection at the State Capitol a building for the Wisconsin State Historical library to be devoted exclusively to historical purposes.

"Second. That Pere Marquette was an historical character, rather than a citizen of the State recognized for distinguished civic or military services.

"Third. That the State of Wisconsin contemplates placing in the old hall of the House of Representatives, statues of General Jeremiah M. Rusk and General Lucius Fairchild, distinguished citizens of Wisconsin, lately deceased, and

"Whereas, we believe that the reasons given do not justify such proposed unprecedented action—

"First. Although Wisconsin has in course of construction a building for the historical library of the State, devoted exclusively to historical subjects, this is no reason, in our opinion, why a great and sovereign State should withdraw a gift solemnly conferred upon the nation, unless Pere Marquette be proved unworthy of the high honor which Wisconsin and the United States Congress have bestowed upon him.

"Second. While Marquette cannot be considered as a citizen of Wisconsin, which did not exist as a State in his time, yet his statue was accepted by special enactment of the Congress of the United States, March 3, 1893, to stand as a memorial of his 'work among the Indians, and explorations within the borders of said State.'

"Third. While we fully recognize the merits and services of General Jeremiah M. Rusk and General Lucius Fairchild, still, as citizens of the State of which they were proud and to which they rendered generous services, we feel confident that it would be a poor tribute to their distinguished worth to honor them in a way which their honest sense of propriety would condemn if they were living; and,

"Whereas, statues have been placed in the old hall of the House of Representatives of other men, such as Roger Williams and John Winthrop, who, like Pere Marquette, were not citizens of the State which thus honored them,

"Be it resolved, that we, the undersigned, as citizens of the State of Wisconsin, earnestly protest against the passage of said memorial; and,

"Be it furthermore resolved, that these resolutions be presented to the Wisconsin State Legislature.

The petitions poured in from all parts of the State and they kept coming for weeks so persistently that the assemblymen and senators thought that the whole State had risen up against the Bill. There were several hearings before the Committee on Federal Relations, to which had been referred the Sweeting Bill. Mark Barnum, the Sage of Wausau, John T. Kelly of Milwaukee, John A. Aylward of Madison and Lawrence A. Olwell of Milwaukee made the fight before the Committee for the retention of the statue, while the fight for its removal was made by Henry Sanford of Manitowoc County.

After weeks of delay, the Committee reported the bill back without recommendation. It was defeated by a vote of 78 to 3, Mr. Sweeting, who introduced the bill and who explained that he had done so upon request, himself voting against it.

The Catholic Press of Wisconsin.

The Catholic Citizen, established in 1870, is the oldest Catholic paper published in Wisconsin. It was evolved out of a number of differently entitled journals, whose continuity it preserves. The first of these was the "Star of Bethlehem," first published by the St. Louis Brothers in October, 1869, as a monthly review of Catholic news and events. Subsequently it passed into the possession of Messrs. E. A. Bray and R. B. Johnson. Meanwhile on the third day of November, 1870, the Rev. John Casey began the publication of the "Catholic Vindicator," at Monroe, Wisconsin, where he was stationed as pastor. Father Casey had the assistance of Dr. D. W. Nolan, at the same time a practicing Catholic physician at Monroe. Both followed the paper to Milwaukee, whither his office was transferred at the request of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Henni after nearly a year's publication at Monroe. In Milwaukee Dr. Nolan gave his whole time and attention to the editorial and office work of the paper, sharing with Father Casey the proprietorship of the business. Until the Hoffmann building was made ready, the Sivyer block on Broadway was the home of the "Catholic Vindicator."

Soon after removing from Monroe to Milwaukee, the "Star of Bethlehem" was consolidated with the "Catholic Vindicator," and from that time, October 19, 1871, until May 2, 1872, were published as one paper under the title of "The Catholic Vindicator and Star of Bethlehem," when the form of the paper was changed from a folio to a quarto size, with Father Casey and Dr. Nolan as editors, R. B. Johnson business manager, and E. A. Bray, secretary. In a "Greeting" published in the "Catholic Vindicator and Star of Bethlehem," November 2, 1871, the following paragraph is found:

"We have recently consolidated with the "Star of Bethlehem," which as a monthly was a predecessor of the 'Vindicator' in the interests of our faith. The consolidation was not to lessen our energies, but to increase them, to unite the influence, the energies, the means and the powers of both in one, thereby hoping the more securely to accomplish the end intended by both and to give no occasion to our people for a division of interest or of support."

In the latter part of the year 1874, the Rev. J. Casey, owing to excess of parochial labor, severed his connection with the business duties and responsibilities of the "Catholic Vindicator," upon whose resignation the paper passed into other hands, Dr. Nolan assuming all liabilities and responsibilities. Later (November, 1878) the Rev. George L. Willard and Mr. E. A. Bray became proprietors and changed the name from the "Catholic Vindicator" to the "Catholic Citizen."

The incorporation of the "Citizen" Company occurred in April, 1891, the paper continuing under the same editorial management.

For many years the editorial work of the "Citizen" was largely done by H. J. Desmond, of the Milwaukee Bar. Mr. Desmond became the proprietor of the paper in 1891, and continues to direct its policy.

Father Casey is now stationed at South Milwaukee; Mr. Bray has resided since May, 1891, at Los Angeles, California; Dr. Nolan died some years ago in Chicago, and Father Willard died in the midst of missionary labors in California.

The "Citizen's" circulation passed the ten thousand mark in 1892, and has grown steadily since. It is recognized as having done valiant service to the Church in Wisconsin. To further emphasize its efforts in this direction, we may state that it led to the movement which repelled church taxation, and with such effect that, whereas ten years ago church taxation bills came within a few votes of enactment in the Legislature, for the last ten years no such measure has been reported.

It forced open the doors of the public reformities of Wisconsin and Illinois to Catholic clergymen. It stood back of the wronged Catholics of Edgerton, and raised the fund which carried the case of the Bible in the public schools to the Supreme Court and victory, dealing a blow at sectarian ascendancy in public education under which the bigotry of every State is still reeling.

It coöperated in the campaign against the Bennett Law, rightly seeing in that measure, not a patriotic purpose, but rather the expression of a narrow nativism (surcharged with the spirit of Know-Nothingism), aiming at the very existence of parochial schools.

It contributed to the enactment, in the Wisconsin laws of 1891, of a Liberty of Worship Act.

By weekly reminders directed to the State Democratic Administration of Wisconsin, it contributed to the enforcement of the law for the erection of the Marquette statue, that law having lain dormant since 1887.

By specific and detailed attacks, it drove Compayre's bigoted pedagogy out of the Normal schools.

Its active agitation led to the establishment of the Western Catholic Summer School, which institution has done so much to spread an interest in Catholic literature.

It also made a great fight against A. P. Aism, not merely defensively, but aggressively, with vigor and energy, scattering two great special editions of forty thousand copies throughout the Northwest, evoking letters against the New Know-Nothingism from Governors, Senators and other prominent men in American public life.

The present editor and proprietor of the Catholic Citizen, the Hon. Humphrey J. Desmond, of Milwaukee, was born near Cedarburg, in Ozaukee County, Wisconsin, where his grandfather had settled in territorial days. In 1866 he removed with his parents to Milwaukee, where he has since resided. His earlier education was obtained in the common and high schools of that city, after which he took a complete course at the State University at Madison, graduating from the same in 1880, after which he entered upon the active practice of his chosen profession, the Law. He served as a member of the Milwaukee School Board in 1883, and was reappointed to that position in 1885, 1888 and 1890. In the latter year he was elected as Democratic member of the Assembly from the First District of Milwaukee.

During his term of service, Mr. Desmond was Chairman of the Committee on Education and also a member of the Judiciary Committee. Aside from his well-known and widely recognized capabilities as a lawyer, Mr. Desmond is regarded as one of the most pleasing as well as trenchant writers in the West.

The "Katolic" (Polish) was established in January, 1897, its first issue being printed and given to the public on the 15th of that month. The sole object of placing this publication in the field was to defend what is most dear to the Catholic—his religion and his rights. Hence its foundations and principles are purely Catholic. The "Katolic," at the beginning of its existence, was the property of the Polish Publishing Company, and until May 15, 1897, it appeared as a tri-weekly. The editorial chair was at first occupied by Professor Alexander Jaworuickia, a native of Warsaw. He was born June 19, 1849, of noble parents. At the age of seventeen he was admitted to the University of Warsaw, pursuing also the studies of law, history, and philosophy at the University of Paris. After his return to Warsaw, Jaworuicka was admitted to the Bar. The diocese of Paris, desirous of securing the control of certain territory in Africa, entrusted Mr. Jaworuickia with the mission to renew the treaties with the chiefs of the local tribes, and investigate that country with regard to the religious customs and culture of the inhabitants. After two years of serious investigation and research, he returned to Paris to present his experience to the French.

During his further sojourn in his native country, Mr. Jaworuickia devoted himself entirely to literature and journalism. Here he attracted the attention of the Russian Government, in consequence of his associations with political suspects. Wherefore, he left Poland for America, arriving in this country in 1896. Soon after coming to America, he was entrusted with the editorial work of the "Katolic," but retired after a brief service.

From May 15, 1897, the "Katolic" was changed into a weekly publication, with the Rev. B. M. Skulik, D. D., as chief editor. Father Skulik is a native of Silesia, Germany. He was born on the 20th of August, 1867, at Szopienice. From early boyhood he pursued his studies at Rozdriu, Scopienice, Lemberg, Cracow, Racur and Riette. While in Rome, Father Skulik attended the Vatican College, the Gregorian and Minerva Universities during five years, spending three years at the Seminary at Riette, where he was ordained to the priesthood on December 19, 1891. After his ordination, Father Skulik still pursued his studies for two years longer, when, on the 9th of March, 1893, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him at the Roman College. The young priest did not labor for any considerable length of time in his mother country, for the zeal for the glory of God goaded him on to work of greater sacrifice beyond the Atlantic. He came to America, and spent a year as pastor at Passaic, where he erected a church and school. A beautiful church at Shamokin, Pennsylvania, gives assurance of the industry and sacrifice of the young priest. After a year of service at Brightom, Iowa, Father Skulik came to Milwaukee in 1896, since when he performs the duties as assistant at St. Josephat's Church.

Besides great diligence and time sacrificed to the faithful performance of his priestly functions, Father Skulik devoted a greater portion of his time to literature and journalism. In the former some very instructive works have left his pen, and as a journalist he is founder of four publications, the "Polskai Litwa" and the "Saturday Weekly" at Shamokin, the "Przyjaciel" at Mount Carmel, and an Italian periodical, the "Civilita Catholica," at New York. Having retired from the active editorship of these papers, Father Skulik continues still to contribute liberally to Polish, German and Italian papers.

In November, 1897, the "Katolic" became the property of the Rev. William Grutza, with Professor John Kuk as manager. Professor Kuk was born December 6, 1841, at Siedliska, a town of Western Galicia. His early education was obtained partly under the supervision of his mother and partly in the school of his native city. Upon completing a course at the Gymnasium, he turned his attention to the university at that place, where he obtained sufficient knowledge to enable him to follow the vocation of teacher. For twenty-one years he has occupied the position of professor of literature, history, mathematics, and other branches at Tarnow, but at the end of that period severed his connection with that institution, and removed to this country, where he arrived in 1892. Here he at once became associated with the "Kuryer Polski," of Milwaukee, of which he was managing editor for two years. Subsequently he published a religious periodical at Manitowoc, Wisconsin. At present Mr. Kuk occupies a professor's chair at St. Josephat's Polish Normal School at Milwaukee. He is an eminent scholar and a man of great literary tastes. Besides the efficient and meritorious work accomplished by him in the school room, he has also enriched his native literature to a marked extent.

These, then, are the men who have been, and are at the present time, at the head of the "Katolic," a paper which, since coming into the possession of the present management, has gained rapidly in popularity, so that at the present time its circulation numbers not less than three thousand. That its mission is being well conducted and fulfilled is evident from the havoc the paper has already caused in independent Polish circles throughout the country.

Another widely known and justly popular Catholic publication is the "Excelsior," a German Catholic newspaper which was founded on September 8, 1883, by the Excelsior Publishing Company, and incorporated March 3, 1886. The "Excelsior" is to-day the leading German Catholic paper of America, and has a large circulation in the State of Wisconsin, and everywhere, in fact, among the Catholic clergy in the United States.

Not a little of the deserved popularity of this publication is due to the editor-in-chief, Mr. J. M. A. Schultheis, whose able work has gained for him a most enviable recognition throughout the country. The business management of the paper is under the direction of Mr. Joseph Springob.

An offshoot of the "Excelsior" is the "La Crosse Patriot," which was founded by the Excelsior Company on November 24, 1888, especially for the diocese of La Crossé. Of this publication Mr. Gustav Keller is the local editor.

Another publication issued by the same company is the "Excelsior-Calendar," a yearly publication which has been in existence since 1893. It contains considerably more than one hundred pages of nicely illustrated reading matter, and is issued about September 1 of each year.

The "De Volksstem" (Hollandish), a Catholic publication was established at DePere, Wisconsin, in March, 1890, by J. B. Heyrman and J. A. Kuypers, both formerly connected with the DePere "Standard," the former as one of the publishers, the latter as one of the editors. This paper is largely read by the Hollandish and Flemish American Catholics in nearly every State of the Union, although the majority of its readers reside in Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, Minnesota and Iowa. Its purpose is to spread and defend the Catholic religion among people of that nationality. Besides editorials on the leading religious and other topics of the day, the paper gives the Catholics the general news of this country and the Old Country, and a large amount of miscellaneous matter, making it a Catholic family paper in every respect. It has the approval of several Archbishops and Bishops, and numbers many members of the priesthood among its contributors. The circulation of the paper at the present time is fifteen hundred.

Mr. John B. Heyrman, senior member of the firm, is a native of Belgium, having been born in the town of Bornhem, Province of Antwerp. After obtaining a liberal education in his native country, he came to the United States, and finally to Wisconsin. During the first twelve years of his residence in this State, he lived on the farm with his father and brothers, after which, having married, he kept a general store at Bay Settlement. Having experienced the various ups and downs pertaining to commercial life in the earlier days, he finally entered the field of journalism, establishing the DePere "Standard," at that time the only Catholic newspaper in the United States published in the Hollandish language. Twelve years later he sold out his interest in this publication, and in January, 1890, in company with John Anton Kuypers, purchased the Brown County "Democrat," and shortly afterwards they commenced the publication of the "Volksstem."

John Anton Kuypers is also a native of Holland, the place of his nativity being Oeffelt, North Brabant, where he first saw the light March 2, 1869. He also received a generous education in the schools of his native country, after which he came, with others of his family, to the United States, where they arrived January 25, 1886. They then at once came West, locating in the city of DePere, Wisconsin, where, soon after, young Kuypers entered the employ of the Standard Printing Company, with which he remained in one capacity or another until forming his present partnership with Mr. Heyrman.

In addition to the publications already mentioned, are the following now in circulation, concerning which we have failed to receive the necessary data: "The Catholic Sentinel" (English), published weekly at Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin; circulation, 2,800; "Annals of St. Joseph" (English), published once a month at Green Bay, Wisconsin; "Chairman," published weekly at La Crosse; circulation, 1,500; "Our Young People" (English), juvenile semi-monthly, published at Milwaukee; circulation, 4,500; "Columbia" (German), published weekly at Milwaukee; circulation, 8,300; "Caecilia" (German), published monthly at St. Francis, Milwaukee County, Wisconsin; circulation, 1,200; "Young Eagle" (English), published monthly at Sinsinawa.

The Catholic School System in Wisconsin.

The growth of the Catholic school system in Wisconsin has been markedly steady and progressive. This is scarcely to be wondered at, being, as we are, aware of the fact that it is an institution which not only the authorities of the Catholic Church deem a necessary and indispensable means for the preservation of the Faith in our Catholic youth, but of which laymen of all classes and conditions have a just appreciation. In the eye of the Church, these institutions are void in both practice and intent of questions, issues, aims or speculations, national or political, their purpose being solely, while giving the educational advantages afforded by similar public or private establishments, of propagating the Catholic faith, and inculcating those principles of Catholicity dominating the teachings of the Church, in the acceptance and practice of which one cannot fail in being loyal to the Faith in which he was born. The enforcement, as far as possible, of these principles is but a logical sequence to a code of moral ethics with which all true and consistent Catholics are bound to accord, and in which the liberal and unprejudiced mind can see naught but what is absolutely compatible with the nation's best interests. Wherever a church has been raised to the worship of God, there, too, wherever practicable, has been erected a school for the moral as well as material benefit of the children. Bishops and priests alike have long since realized how much more easily are the moral faculties to be dealt with when reached through a channel of mental enlightenment, and thus hail with gladness every addition to those educational facilities by means of which these ends are obtained. In other words, the parochial school is the dominating factor in the promotion and expansion of Catholicism.

But there is still stronger evidence forthcoming to establish that fact. The First Plenary Council, held in 1852, enacted as follows (V. XIII. Decree): "We exhort the Bishops and, in view of the very great evils that are wont to follow from the neglect of a proper education of youth, we entreat them by the bowels of the mercy of God to see to it, that in their dioceses schools be connected with every single church, and to make provision, that, if need be, and circumstances allow it, from the income of the church to which the school is annexed, able teachers be employed."

The Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, held in 1866, says in No. 420: "The best, and, in fact, the only means left by which those great evils and harms (viz.: the pernicious infection of indifferentism and corruption of morals deplored by the Fathers of the Council in No. 426) can be met, appears to lie in this, that in every single diocese near every single church schools be erected in which the Catholic youth be instructed in the secular branches as well as in religion and good morals."

The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore, held in 1884, is still more explicit and emphatic. In No. 199 it reads: "We ordain and decree: First, near every single church where it does not already exist a parochial school must be erected, within two years from the promulgation of this Council, and forever maintained, unless the Bishop judges that, on account of too great difficulties, a delay may be granted.

Second. A priest who, within this time, through his own negligence, hinders the erection or maintenance of a school, or, after repeated admonition of the Bishop, does not care for the same, deserves to be removed from his church.

Third. A mission or parish which fails to support the priest in the erection or maintenance of a school, to such a degree that on account of such supine negligence a school cannot exist, is to be reprehended by the Bishop and by the most prudent and efficient means to be induced to furnish the necessary help and means.

Fourth. All Catholic parents are bound to send their children to the parochial school, unless they efficiently and evidently provide for the Christian education of their children at home, or in other Catholic schools, or be allowed to send them to other schools for a sufficient reason approved of by the Bishop and with suitable precautions and remedies. It is, however, left to the judgment of the Ordinary to decide what school is a Catholic school."

From such legislation as that just quoted, in addition to which might be given an endless array of similar expressions from Provincial Councils and Diocesan Synods, it will readily be inferred that, in the eyes of the Church, no mission or parish is complete without a school. This is indeed the keynote to Catholicity's progression, for as the late Bishop Flasch has been wont to say: "The school is the heart of the Catholic congregation."

The Catholic Church has in fact always taken an unbounded interest in prompting the education of the young. Wherever there is a congregation at which it is at all feasible, there also it will be found ample provision is made for the education of the children. A close scrutiny of the history of the Catholic Church in this country but verifies the fact that from its very inception the principal efforts put forth by the Bishops and clergy as to advance the interests of education and strengthen wherever possible in number and character all the institutions of that kind. They realized that it was necessary for a person to be educated in order that he might fully appreciate the benefits of religion, and believing this, left no stone unturned in order that the good work might be carried to a satisfactory fulfillment. And the history of the country has been that of Wisconsin, parochial schools having been in active operation within the limits of the State for over half a century, although many of those built in earlier times were void of some of the necessaries and all of the luxuries pertaining to such institutions at the present day.

Education received additional impetus at the coming of Bishop Henni to Milwaukee, while most of those associated with him in the work were remarkable for the fervor and interest exhibited by them in everything pertaining to educational matters. Indicative of this sentiment are the words of Dr. Salzmann, who on taking charge of the congregation at Germantown in 1847 asked first of all that a School might be established there. The same intense interest was also exhibited by the Rev. Michael Heiss, rector of St. Mary's congregation, Milwaukee, and numerous others. With such an extensive and universal sentiment prevailing, it is little to be wondered at that the education of the laity was not neglected. It was but shortly before Christmas, 1850, that Bishop Henni established the convent of Notre Dame in Milwaukee, an institution which has since sent forth hundreds of willing and laborious workers whose hearts and interests are all centered on education of the Catholic young. Then followed the Priests' Seminary, now of world-wide reputation, which was erected in 1853, from which members of the clergy of all degrees have been sent forth. This was followed by the erection of the Teachers' Seminary, also at St. Francis in 1870, a result of special efforts on the part of Dr. Salzmann, and the Deaf Mute Institute, which was built some six years later as a result of the unremitting energy of the Rev. Theodore Bruener, rector of the Teachers' Seminary at that time. Outside of Milwaukee, the line of educational progress is marked by the erection of a college at Mt. Calvary in 1861, by the Capuchin Fathers. Of other institutions of similar character in the city of Milwaukee and Milwaukee diocese are, Marquette college, erected by the Jesuits in 1880; an institution of the same kind at Watertown, Wisconsin, which is under the direction and able management of Fathers of the Holy Cross; the Reform and Industrial school, one of which is at St. Francis and one at Manitowoc for boys, and the Institute of the Good Shepherd in Milwaukee for girls. There are also at the present time in Milwaukee diocese one hundred and forty-two parochial schools having an average attendance of twenty-six thousand scholars. In addition to these, there are numerous institutions for the education of young ladies, such as Notre Dame Institute at Milwaukee, directed by Sisters of Notre Dame; St. Joseph's Academy at Greenfield Park, Milwaukee, directed by Sisters of St. Francis; St. Catharine's Academy at Racine, directed by Sisters of St. Dominic; St. Clara's Academy at Sinsinawa Mound, directed by Sisters of St. Dominic of the Third Order; Sacred Heart Academy at Madison, directed by Sisters of St. Dominic of the Third Order; Holy Name Institute at Alverno, directed by Franciscan Sisters, and Our Lady of Angels Academy at Milwaukee, which is also under the direction of the Sisters of that Order.

In the diocese of Green Bay there are at the present time seventy-one parochial schools, having an average attendance of twelve thousand children. In addition to this, there is at Marinette an educational institution for young ladies which is under the direction of Sisters of Notre Dame, and an industrial school for Indian boys at Keshena,

In the diocese of La Crosse there are sixty-three parochial schools, having an average attendance of nine thousand one hundred scholars. Besides these there is the Sacred Heart college at Prairie du Chien, which is in charge of the Jesuits, and St. Mary's Institute at the same place, which is under the direction of Sisters of Notre Dame and devoted entirely to the education of young ladies. There is also an Industrial school for Indian girls at Bayfield, Wisconsin, which is in charge of Franciscan Sisters.

The educational interests of Wisconsin are, therefore, represented in entirety by one Priests' Seminary, six colléges for young men, eight academies for young ladies, five industrial schools and two hundred and seventy-six parochial schools, the latter having a total attendance of forty-seven thousand one hundred scholars.

The complete representation of the Catholic Church in the State of Wisconsin at the present time is as follows: Archdiocese of Milwaukee: Archbishop, one; secular priests, two hundred and forty-five; priests of religious Orders, forty-four; total, two hundred and eighty-nine. History of the Catholic Church in Wisconsin.

PART V.

The Archdiocese of Milwaukee.

Papal Brief for the Erection of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee. Pope Pius IX.

BE it known to future times: §1. The prayers of venerable prelates for the good of the Lord's flock, We, holding on earth the place of the eternal Shepherd, grant with a most willing heart. Whereas, the venerable brothers, the Archbishops and Bishops of the ecclesiastical province of St. Louis, in the United States of North America, assembled in special meeting, are of opinion that for the great advantage of the Catholic religion the aforesaid ecclesiastical province should be, on account of its wide extent, divided into three separate provinces, and, whereas, they have addressed to Us a most urgent request for this purpose, We have long and with earnest attention, deliberated on the matter with Our venerable brothers, the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church belonging to the Congregation for the Propagation of Faith, and have decided to consent to the wishes of the aforementioned bishops.

§2. Now, therefore, by the advice of the same Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, Our venerable brothers, and by Our apostolic authority, We divide by these presents the ecclesiastical province of St. Louis, in the United States of North America, into three provinces. One of these shall retain the name of St. Louis, that city to be the Metropolitan See, etc. * * * The other shall have the Church of Milwaukee for a Metropolitan See, and shall comprise the following suffragan sees: St. Paul,[1] Sault Ste. Marie and Marquette (which until now belonged to the ecclesiastical province of Cincinnati), then La Crosse, Green Bay and the Vicariate Apostolic of Northern Minnesota. The third province, finally, shall have its Metropolitan See at Santa Fe, New Mexico, etc. * * *

§3. Such is Our will and command. We also decree that these, Our present letters, shall forever be in force, valid and effective, and obtain their full and entire effects, etc.[2]

Given at St. Peter's in Rome, under the Fisherman's ring, the 12th February, 1875, in the twenty-ninth year of Our Pontificate.

The Archdiocese of Milwaukee.

On June 3, 1871, the Pallium, emblem of archiepiscopal dignity, was solemnly laid on the shoulders of Archbishop Henni, by the Papal Ablegate, Monsignor Roncetti, and Milwaukee became an Archdiocese. To the minds of all who had followed the history of the Catholic Church in Wisconsin, and particularly in Milwaukee, this was but a fitting recognition of those dauntless spirits who had pioneered the Faith successfully, in spite of obstacles which to the ordinary or only partially persistent mind must have appeared insurmountable. Yet to Milwaukee alone by no means belonged the honor, the success and final triumph of the Church in her march of progress and work of evangelization. Men of a mould equally heroic, equally self-sacrificing and self-ignoring, were to be found on every hand; fearlessly, unquestioningly and uncomplainingly doing the Master's bidding, in spite of consequences to either safety, comfort, or even life. But once before, when the location of Wisconsin's first diocese lay trembling in the balance, Milwaukee had given abundant evidence of her fitness, in location and in many other particulars, as the metropolis of the Church of Wisconsin. This further honor, then, may be said to have come to her as a matter of course, and there was no dissenting voice, only words of praise and gratulation being heard when it was known of Milwaukee's proposed advancement to the Archiepiscopate.

Of the earlier history of the Church in Milwaukee, there is much of interest to be gleaned, more particularly so, perhaps, as we note how under the spread and dominance of Christian influence her material condition became improved. This necessarily takes us back to the earlier years of the present century, when, still figuring as a French possession, Milwaukee was, according to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, a dependency of the diocese of Quebec. In 1810, however, it became a subject to the diocese of Bardstown (Louisville), Kentucky, and still later to those of Cincinnati and Detroit, which were respectively erected in the years 1822 and 1832. It was while under the jurisdiction of the latter-named diocese, however, that the history of the Church in Milwaukee may be said to have begun. For at this particular period, the place took on the form and semblance of a settlement, which after long and toilsome years has assumed the dignity and proportions of a metropolis, is known the world over as a commercial center, and is recognized as a city of homes, enterprise, benevolence and religious culture. Through all of the different phases pertaining to the growth and prosperity of Milwaukee, the Church has taken no uncertain part, sharing the trials and vicissitudes naturally pertaining to the earlier periods of Western civilization, and receiving her portion of the benefactions accruing with modern and maturer times, and thus, hand in hand, as they ever should be, religion and progress have glided down the years together; the former, through its educational influences and self-sacrificing devotion to humanity, broadening the mind of man, strengthening his purpose to do good to others as well as to self, and in so doing aiding to no limited extent in the establishment and building-up of a material welfare unsurpassed by that of any other nation in the world.

The growth of the Church in Milwaukee, as in all newly settled countries, was slow at first, and it was many years after the Word was first carried to her midst that she received her first permanent pastor. While still subject to the diocese of Detroit, Milwaukee was also subordinate to Green Bay, to whom, for a number of years, she looked for spiritual aid and assistance, either at the hands of priests residing there or from those visiting the Bay from Detroit. Necessarily these visits were few and far between, for the way was long and dangerous and the times treacherous at best, so that those godly, self-sacrificing men who ventured to make the journey veritably took their lives into their own hands.

The first Mass said within the limits of Milwaukee was celebrated by the Rev. Father J. Bonduel, in August, 1837, at the house of Solomon Juneau, which stood on the spot now occupied by the Mitchell building on East Water street. During the same year, the Rev. Patrick O'Kelly arrived and became the first resident pastor, in which position he remained for the following five years. For some time subsequent to the arrival of Father O'Kelly Mass was said regularly at the Court House, where also the various other denominations held their services. Then Solomon Juneau donated lots 10 and 11, block 73, for church purposes, the deed conveying them to the Rt. Rev. F. Résé, Bishop of Detroit, bearing the date of July 13, 1837. The property thus secured to the Church is situated on Martin street at the corner of Jackson.

Two years later, Father O'Kelly built an unpretentious little chapel on this land, the same afterwards being dedicated to St. Peter. The subsequent history of this building is interesting, as it was afterwards enlarged so that a portion might be used for school purposes. The main portion of this building, however, served as cathedral for Bishop Henni. Afterwards, from 1863 to 1866, it was used by a Bohemian congregation during its period of organization, and still later, was a place of gathering for the Sunday School. A few years ago, this building, with the ground upon which it stood, passed into the hands of the Right Rev. L. Batz, who transferred it to another location, where it still remains. "It will forever be regretted," writes Father Schinner, "that the chapel was separated from the site to which it had been wedded, and that the ground which was hallowed by the sweat of the early missionaries and the sacrifices of the early settlers, must fulfill the prosaic office of supporting tenement houses. Still, the Catholics are grateful that so much has been saved and the cradle of the infant Church preserved." During Father O'Kelly's time, the Rev. Thomas Morrissey is also mentioned in connection with the parish. The history of the church was made memorable in the year 1841 by the arrival of the Right Rev. P. O. Lefevre, of Detroit, who was the first Bishop to visit these parts. He was accompanied on that occasion by Father Kundig, who afterwards became so closely allied with the growth and progress of Catholic interests in the State. One of the first things done by Father Kundig after his permanent settlement here, in June, 1842, was to establish a school, which was placed in charge of a Mr. Murray, who was aided in the work by his sister. Thus this work of Christian effort grew and prospered to a remarkable degree, so that it was not long before the name of Milwaukee became well and favorably known throughout the rapidly increasing settlements. Then arose the question of a Bishop for the Territory, but still other places were mentioned in that connection as the possible site of the episcopate. The entire enthusiasm was aptly turned in favor of Milwaukee, the importance of which as a religious, as well as commercial center, was rapidly becoming recognized. So it was designated as the Cathedral City of the diocese of Milwaukee, being erected May 16, 1843. Of this diocese, the Right Rev. John Martin Henni was appointed first Bishop, he being consecrated to that office on March 14, 1844, and assuming the duties of his office in person on May 3d following.

The Most Rev. John Martin Henni, Archbishop of Milwaukee, was a native of Switzerland, having been born at Oberstantzen, in the canton of Graubuenden, on June 13, 1805. After acquiring his rudimentary education at the gymnasia of St. Gall and Zurich and becoming satisfied that his future vocation was that of the priesthood, he went to Rome, where in 1824 he began the study of philosophy and theology. It was during this particular period that his career may be said to have been mapped out, for it was at Rome that he, in 1827, met Bishop Fenwick of Cincinnati, with whom young Henni volunteered to return to America. Shortly after making this decision, he came with the Bishop to the United States and at once entered the seminary at Bardstown, Kentucky, where he was ordained priest on February 2, 1829. He was now assigned to the spiritual charge of the German Catholics of Cincinnati as well as to the professorship in the Athenæum in that city, a Catholic High School which has since been developed into St. Xavier's College. He remained in these positions, however, but a short time, being sent by the Bishop to Canton, Stark County, Ohio, from where the territory under his immediate supervision extended throughout the greater portion of the northwestern part of the State. In 1834, Bishop Purcell, successor to the lamented Fenwick, recalled him to Cincinnati, placing him in charge of Holy Trinity congregation and making him Vicar-General of the Diocese. During the following year, Father Henni paid a hurried visit to Europe, and while there issued a pamphlet in German setting forth the unusually promising condition of the Church and its affairs in Southern Ohio. In 1836, Father Henni founded the "Wahrheits-Freund," a German Catholic paper, of which he was for some time editor. He was in every respect a faithful and energetic worker in the cause of religion, and during his residence in Cincinnati, which extended over a period of ten years, aided largely in advancing the religious and material welfare of German-speaking emigrants who flocked to that section of the country.

In 1843 Father Henni attended the Fifth Provincial Council at Baltimore, as theologian to Bishop Purcell. That organization, readily recognizing a future of almost illimitable possibilities for the Territory of Wisconsin, petitioned the Pope to erect a new See at Milwaukee, recommending Father Henni for the Episcopate. The request was granted, and on March 19, 1844, in the Cathedral at Cincinnati, John Martin Henni was consecrated Bishop of Milwaukee by Bishop Purcell, assisted by Bishops O'Connor of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, and Miles of Nashville.

From the moment of his arrival in Milwaukee, Bishop Henni's entire life consisted in one grand effort to build up the Church, strengthening its general condition, enlarging its field of usefulness and expanding to the utmost its influence throughout the length and breadth of the territory consigned to his keeping. In all of this, he was unqualifiedly successful, although the duties to perform and obstacles to overcome in its accomplishment were of a character to overwhelm a man of even his determination. Three years from the time of his arrival the number of priests had been increased from four to thirty-four, and still the Catholic population so far outstripped them that more had to be secured. At about this time St. Mary's was opened and work in earnest begun on the new Cathedral and hospital, the latter being placed in charge of Sisters of Charity. In 1848 the Bishop, during his visit ad limina, went to Munich, Bavaria, where he secured a colony of School Sisters of Notre Dame for the purpose of establishing a house of their Order in Milwaukee. On his return, he at once set about the erection of St. Gall's and Holy Trinity, while still urging along with unabated vigor the completion of the Cathedral. In futherance of this, he made a tour through Mexico and Cuba, thereby securing enough funds to finish the work. At last it was done, and on July 31, 1853, the Papal Legate, then in this country, consecrated the new building. A year later, and this tireless and indefatigable worker was engaged, heart and soul in the erection of the Salesianum, which was opened in 1855.

Nor was this all, for, during this marvelous tendency to progress in a local way, the Church was making giant strides throughout the entire See; so much so, in fact, that, at the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, held in 1866, Bishop Henni suggested the necessity of two new Episcopal Sees in the State, which were erected at Green Bay and La Crosse, respectively, two years later. This being accomplished, Milwaukee was raised to the dignity of a Metropolitan See, the Pallium being conferred on Bishop Henni in July, 1875, by the Papal Ablegate, Monsignor Cesare Roncetti. For a little over six years, he enjoyed what may in a measure be called the full fruition of his life's labors, passing finally to his everlasting reward on September 7, 1881.

Archbishop Henni died full of those honors which the accumulation of years but vivifies and strengthens. From a mere existence, he brought the Church into a condition of permanent success, healthful progressiveness and limitless resources. By his own acts of marked devotion and unswerving confidence in the cause, he built up a corresponding faith in the hearts of others, a stronger bulwark of protection and guarantee of work yet to be done than an unlimited store of material aid could have alone accomplished. As evidence of these achievements, this lamented prelate left behind a powerful commonwealth, consisting of three dioceses, one hundred and eighty-five priests, two hundred and fifty-eight churches, one hundred and twenty-five schools, twenty-five religious and charitable institutions and two hundred thousand Catholics.

At the time of his coming, the Bishop was accompanied by his friend and secretary, the Rev. Michael Heiss, who afterward succeeded him. He also met here with his old-time friend and companion, Father Kundig, both having been born and educated in the same country, besides being fellow-students at St. Gall and Rome. Both also decided to devote their lives and services to the American missions, coming to this country together. "If Bishop Henni, at his arrival, was in doubt as to the life that awaited him," says Father Schinner, "his doubts were quickly to be dispelled; his life was to be an almost continuous exemplification of the words of the Scripture: 'I mingled my bread with weeping.' Whilst he was taking his first repast in his new home, a note was presented for payment. Before departing from Cincinnati, he had received a purse of $500 from his former parishioners, and that just sufficed to cancel the note, leaving him penniless. The incident was a forecast of the future. Ever ready to alleviate the wants of others and offering his notes when money failed, he was constantly in financial embarrassment. Still, he was not disheartened. A great work was before him; great in suffering, but great, also, in opportunities. His diocese comprised the Territory of Wisconsin; the Catholics numbered about five thousand; for this extensive field he had six priests. And so, amidst the ever-varying scenes of this growing Western metropolis, he took up his life's work, devoting his entire time and energies to the fulfillment of his multitudinous duties as head of the Church in Wisconsin. The tide of immigration also began to increase, a large number of those coming here being from Germany, so that at length it became necessary for the establishment of a church for German-speaking Catholics. For this purpose, a subscription was taken up during the latter part of 1845, by means of which a church was erected. This edifice, when completed, was dedicated to St. Mary, on September 12, 1847, the Rev. M. Heiss, at that time private secretary of the Bishop, being appointed its first pastor.

"The Church being cosmopolitan," says Father Schinner, "adapts itself to the different countries and peoples. Aware that her mission is 'to minister, not to be ministered unto,' her duty to avoid offense, she has always been anxious to preach the Gospel in the tongue most familiar to the respective peoples, the tongue, moreover, which recalls the scenes, the innocence and fervor of childhood. Hence, the separate churches throughout the United States for the various languages. When these languages shall have been immersed in the one tongue, the English, these churches shall have accomplished their end."

Bishop Henni attended the Sixth Provincial Council at Baltimore, which convened May 10, 1846, and to him on that occasion was awarded the duty of preparing an address of thanks for kindnesses already rendered, and a request for future similar recognition to the Leopoldine Society of Vienna. This society was organized by the Cardinal Archbishop of Olmutz, on May 13, 1829, its purpose being to aid and establish missions in foreign countries. In this direction it did an immense amount of good, as also that similar society named after Louis I. of Bavaria. In these benefactions Milwaukee, and indeed the entire diocese, prospered to a noticeable degree. During the year 1847, there was celebrated at Milwaukee the first synod of the diocese, on which occasion twenty-seven decrees were promulgated. And so the Church developed in spiritual strength, a feeling of certainty obtaining in all of the deliberations which mark the further advancement of the cause. It was at about this time that Bishop Henni's own peculiar theme—to which in hope he had clung through times of greatest depression, on which his greatest energies had been expended—took form, and the new Cathedral became an assured fact. And so, one good but heralds the advent of more to come. While visiting Europe, intent upon securing the necessary means with which to carry out his project, he resolved to erect within his own diocese a seminary for the education of priests, which afterwards found an active existence in the now world-famed Salesianum at St. Francis. He also, when at Munich, gained the assistance of Sisters of Notre Dame, who have since done so much to advance the interests of Catholic education in America.. "In the meantime," writes Father Schinner, "besides the educational institutions, others had arisen by which Christian charity seeks to mitigate suffering and want. Whilst Catholic schools could not exist but for the religious communities of self-sacrificing women, the charitable institutions of Milwaukee are entrusted to them exclusively. In them the Church calls into action the exalted qualities, a height of nobility and perfection that was considered beyond the human frailty until the Church demonstrated its possibility. A community with the modesty of the vestal, the compassion of the Samaritan, and the discipline of the soldier, they, who are styled the weaker sex, undergo hardships and practice a neglect of self that might daunt the courage of many a stronger brother. If the Church could boast of nothing else, by these Orders alone she would be one of the benefactors of the human race."

An event to be carefully noted in the history of Catholic interests at that time, was the erection of the first hospital in Milwaukee by Sisters of Charity, which was thrown open to the public on May 15, 1848. This institution, which was located on the corner of Jackson and Oneida streets, was designated St. John's Infirmary. Then, in quick succession, followed other similar and benevolent institutions. St. Rose's Orphan Asylum for Girls and St. Aemilianus' Orphan Asylum for Boys, both of which were the outgrowth of consistent Christian effort on the part of the good Bishop and his co-laborers. The actual condition surrounding these really laborious undertakings find ready example in the words of our former authority, who says: "There was a scarcity even of chairs, so that the orphans could be seated only alternately. The Bishop was a daily visitor, and often did service at the sick beds of the homeless boys. At the same time, he was chaplain of the School Sisters of Notre Dame. One day he found them disconsolate because of their penury and the debts they had incurred in erecting a dwelling; he told them to be of good cheer—although he had not a shilling—and he would provide them with means. He appeared at a bank, and, giving his note as security, obtained the sum required. It was a time of scarcity and privation for all engaged in the work of religion."

But in this era of hard-earned prosperity, there were other difficulties aside from those of poverty to overcome.

For, anomalous as it may seem, bigotry and scepticism also found place amidst the tide of advancing civilization, endeavoring, with puerile and abortive efforts to obstruct the labors of the Church. Fortunately, this period was of but briefest duration, those most active in vituperative effort against the work finding their reward in contumely and final oblivion.

One of the most active and zealous clerics of that time was the Rev. Dr. Salzmann, who figured so prominently in the furtherance of Catholic affairs in the State.

The birth-place of this zealous pioneer-missionary is Muenzbach, in Austria, where he was born August 17, 1819, his parents being Frank Xavier and Magdalena Salzmann. The first year of young Salzmann's school life were spent at the parochial school of his native village, where he excelled in all branches taught. Even at this time, he showed, in many ways, an inclination for his future vocation, and it was his greatest pleasure to serve Mass, being in attendance almost every day in the church. In 1829 he came to Linz to pursue his studies, and there finished his classical course, obtaining the highest honors every year. His studies were finally completed under somewhat distressing circumstances, the money used by him to pay for books being earned by him as a teacher. After finishing his classical studies, he came to the Seminary at Linz, where he was ordained by Bishop Gregorius Thomas Ziegler, August 8, 1842, and on the 15th of August following he celebrated his first Mass at Muenzbach, his native place. To obtain a diploma as Doctor of Theology, he came to the Clerical Institution of St. Augustin at Vienna, where he gained admission through the special influence of Bishop Ziegler. On January 16, 1846, the title of D. D. was conferred upon him, after which he worked as assistant priest at Glienk, at Wolfgang near Ischl, and at Ried. His acquaintance with the Capuchin priest, P. Fabian Bermadinger, who was corresponding with the Rev. H. Caspar Rehrl, an American missionary, had much influence in his decision to become also a missionary in the New World. Strengthened in his purpose by the Jesuit, John N. Stoeger, he made preparations for his departure. At Ried and the surrounding places he preached about the missions in America and collected money as well as church ornaments, books and pictures. In this work he was very successful, collecting seven thousand florins in money and four thousand florins' worth of church articles. Accompanied by the Revs. H. Anton Urbanek, Mathias Gernbauer, P. Fabian, F. Fusseder, M. Wiesbauer and others, he started for America July 17, 1847, leaving Bremen on August 2d in the sailing vessel "Rhone," and reached Baltimore on September 18th. From there he came almost immediately to Milwaukee, where he was gladly welcomed by Bishop Henni and the Rev. Michael Heiss, at that time pastor of St. Mary's Church and secretary to the Bishop. On the same day he was entrusted with the missions Germantown, St. Hubert, St. Augustin, St. Joseph, St. Jacob, St. Xavier and Holy Cross. In 1849 he became assistant priest of the Rev. M. Heiss, pastor of St. Mary's Church; at the same time he organized Holy Trinity congregation on the South Side. In 1850, when the Rev. M. Heiss went to Europe on account of ill-health, Dr. Salzmann succeeded as pastor of St. Mary's Church. Through his special efforts, the corner-stone of Trinity Church was laid July 8, 1849. In order to erect this church, Dr. Salzmann traveled through the Eastern States, securing donations for the completion of the work. On September 22d, the consecration of the building took place, Bishop Henni officiating. During his pastorate at St. Mary's Church, Dr. Salzmann waged a continuous warfare upon the so-called Free-thinkers, who were more than ordinarily offensive at that time. Dr. Salzmann's name became prominent through the establishment of the "Salesianum" and "Teachers' Seminary," for which institutions he in 1853 collected large amounts. The corner-stone for the former building was laid on July 15, 1855. On returning from one of these collecting tours to the seminary, he wrote to a friend: "When I saw the building I was compensated for the many hardships I had undergone; the structure is already sixty-four feet high; when standing on the top of the building in company with the Rev. M. Heiss I became dizzy by the thought of the great debt which was lying on my shoulders." December 16, 1859, the first ordination of priests took place, fourteen candidates taking holy orders. In 1865 Dr. Salzmann went to Europe to take up collections for the Seminary, and he was again very successful. When the Rev. M. Heiss became Bishop of La Crosse, September 6, 1868, Dr. Salzmann succeeded him as rector of the Salesianum. With indefatigable zeal he urged on the spiritual labors of his students, though at no time losing sight of or neglecting their material welfare. In the interest of erecting a teachers' seminary he had also worked for many years, raising funds for its completion and endowment whenever practicable. This institute was consecrated January 2, 1871, and he thus became the spiritual father and benefactor of two institutions of almost immeasurable value to the Church. He died January 17, 1873, after a life heroic in deeds and full of noble results. According to his wish his remains were placed under the Sanctuary of the Salesianum.

The Catholic population of Wisconsin was now showing a marked increase in numbers, a result soon felt, owing to the first great scarcity of priests in the diocese. A partial relief from this difficulty, however, was found in the "Seminary," which was dedicated and opened with twenty-five students January 29, 1856. During the same year, Milwaukee made a most important acquisition in the establishment of the Society of Jesus in the city. This was arranged for at the First Provincial Council of St. Louis, which convened on October 7, 1856, the Superiors of the Order yielding to the earnest entreaties of Bishop Henni, who was present at their deliberations. So they came to Milwaukee and took charge of St. Gall's parish, which had been organized in 1849, having as an additional incentive for so doing the promise that a college for higher education should also be conducted by them. And so, amidst trials and privations, the work continued, the arduousness of the task telling severely upon the physical resources of the Bishop. Referring to this, he at one time was wont to exclaim: "Our hair, whitened more by the continuous cares and embarrassments than through old age, does not bear the imprint of easy days. God knows it."

In 1863, the first Polish congregation was organized in Milwaukee by the Rev. B. Buczynski, the original movement having been brought about by the Rev. J. Palack during the preceding year. Three years later, these people purchased a church on Grove and Mitchell streets, dedicating it to St. Stanislaus. A Bohemian congregation was also organized in March, 1863, the first pastor of which was the Rev. J. F. Zastera, and place of worship St. Peter's Chapel. Five years later, the members of this organization purchased the property still occupied by St. John Nepomucene's congregation, which is situated on the corner of Fourth and Cherry streets.

Some relief was now obtained by Bishop Henni, owing to the action of the Second Plenary Council at Baltimore, convened in 1866, at which it was decided to erect a diocese of Green Bay and La Crosse, in Wisconsin. Three years later, in the month of March, this revered prelate celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination, amidst great rejoicing, felicitations pouring in from all parts of the country. Toward the end of the same year, the Bishop went to Europe, where he participated in the Vatican Council, the first to be convoked since that of Trent, which was summoned to meet at Rome on December 8, 1869. In the meantime, affairs were progressing favorably at home, another educational institution with Normal School of the Holy Family at St. Francis being begun and partially completed.

When, on September 6, 1868, the Rev. Michael Heiss was consecrated first Bishop of La Crosse, Dr. Salzmann became rector of the Salesianum. Here he at once threw new life and vigor into the work entrusted to his fatherly care. But not content with having provided for the education of an American Catholic clergy, he now, too, turned his attention to the welfare of the Catholic school by providing for the erection of a Catholic Normal School. In this he met with innumerable difficulties, in spite of which, however, he succeeded, the corner-stone of the building, in the absence of Bishop Henni, being laid by the Right Rev. J. Melcher, first Bishop of Green Bay, June 12, 1870. On its ultimate completion, the building was dedicated by Bishop Henni, on January 2, 1871. There were now of the regular clergy in Milwaukee, a number of members of the Society of Jesus, while in the year following (1869), the Capuchin Fathers also established themselves there. Of the first of this Order to come were the Rev. Bonaventura Frey and the Rev. Ivo Prass, who built a frame church on Fourth street and annexed a convent to it.

As it was now giving every evidence of healthfulness and progressive activity the diocesee of Milwaukee was deemed deserving of more extended recognition, in consequence of which it, together with those of Philadelphia, Boston, and Santa Fe, was made an archdiocese. The provinces thus created included the dioceses of Green Bay, La Crosse, Marquette, Michigan, and all of Minnesota and Dakota. Of this vastly increased ecclesiastical territory Bishop Henni—now Archbishop—was made the head. Then followed a season of increased activity, a number of new religious orders locating in the archdiocese and numerous buildings being erected there, among them St. John's Institute at St. Francis, for the instruction of deaf mutes, the House of the Little Sisters of the Poor, a refuge for aged persons, St. Vincent's Asylum, the House of the Good Shepherd, and others of lesser note.

Surrounding the latter days of Archbishop Henni's life, there was much that was beautiful to remember, yielding, as they did, so many evidences of absolute and well-directed purpose, and culminating in the expression of affectionate regard on the part of those among whom he lived and labored that could alone have emanated from hearts spirited by the utmost veneration. Of this period, Father Schinner writes: "The night was preceded by a beautiful sunset; being draped in darkness, the lowering horizon appeared in glowing splendor. It was the Golden Jubilee of Archbishop Henni, the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood. Everyone knew it was the last opportunity one would have to give expression to one's love to render the venerable prelate and make him forget the sorrows of a long life. On Sunday, February 2, 1879, the real anniversary day, the Archbishop said a low Mass in the convent chapel of Notre Dame; Father Kundig, also a jubilate, having been ordained with Archbishop Henni, celebrated Mass at the Cathedral. The 6th of February was fixed for the solemnity at the Cathedral. Archbishop Purcell, who had proposed Father Henni for the archbishopric of Milwaukee, and consecrated him, pronounced the Jubilee sermon. In the afternoon, the Sisters of Notre Dame entertained the guests with a musical and declamatory programme. In the evening, a torchlight procession of unprecedented dimensions filed past the residence of the Bishop and cast its lurid light on the feeble frame of the metropolitan. In a voice trembling with emothion, the Archbishop expressed his thanks, and concluded saying: 'It is time that I depart from you. Therefore, tell my people that I am grateful for this brilliant proof of their affection, and that I pray for them that all my children may persevere to the end in their old faith. But, pray also for me, that I may be worthy to celebrate the eternal Jubilee of Heaven, where I hope we shall see one another again.'

"It was the last time the people beheld him. The shadows of death were deepening about him. A month after the celebration, on March 6th, the death approached and snatched from his side the companion of his youth, the sharer of his labors in manhood, the solace of his old age, his Vicar-General, the saintly Father Martin Kundig."

The Rev. Martin Kundig was one of the seven priests who administered to the wants of the Catholics of Wisconsin when Bishop Henni was elected, in 1843, to the Episcopal See at Milwaukee. He was born November 19, 1805, at Schwyz, Canton Schwytz, Switzerland. His classical and theological courses he acquired at Einsiedeln and Lucerne. In 1827 he went to Rome to continue his theological studies, and there became acquainted with the late Archbishop, John Martin Henni, who was also studying theology there. During that time Bishop Edward Fenwick, of Cincinnati, came to Rome on a visit and persuaded the two young candidates for priesthood to follow him to his diocese and both consented to become missionary priests in America. Christian Brentano, a brother of the celebrated poet Brentano, who had conceived a great interest in the American missions, also advised them to do so. In June, 1828, they came to New York and went at once to Cincinnati, where Bishop Fenwick sent them to the Priests' Seminary at Bardstown, Kentucky. There Father Kundig was ordained deacon and subdeacon by Bishop Flaget of Bardstown. On February 2, 1829, he was ordained priest by Bishop Fenwick. For one year after he was rector of St. Peter's Church at Cincinnati, and afterwards for two years mission-priest in Wayne County, which is now in the diocese of Cleveland. Here he erected two churches and a school. Up to the death of Bishop Fenwick in 1832, Father Kundig was a traveling missionary, visiting Catholic families in the diocese in localities where, at that time, no resident priest was located. Towards the end of 1833 he came to Detroit, where he was pastor of St. Ann's congregation for nine years; in Detroit he erected St. Mary's Church and also began the erection of Holy Trinity Church. When in 1834 the cholera broke out, he administered spiritual and material help to the poor, visiting places where others, fearful for the consequences, absolutely refused to go. At the beginning of 1842 he came to Milwaukee, the greater part of which was at that time no better than a wilderness. Here he completed the erection of St. Peter's, the first Catholic church in Milwaukee. From this point he attended to the spiritual wants of the Catholics within a radius of thirty miles. Through his special efforts Milwaukee became the metropolis of Wisconsin, although Prairie du Chien, which already had a stone church, expected to get the Episcopal See. To accomplish this, the Rev. Father Kundig arranged a great demonstration on St. Patrick's Day, to which all Catholics were invited in order to show their preference for Milwaukee. He attained his end, when Milwaukee was elected as metropolis at the Fifth Plenary Council at Baltimore in 1843. He was also most pleasantly surprised upon learning that his old-time friend, John Martin Henni, was to become the first Bishop. When Bishop Henni entered on his duties in 1844, the Rev. Father Kundig was made Vicar-General of the diocese. In this position he worked till his death, organizing many congregations and erecting churches for them. Thus he built the churches at Racine, Kenosha, Waukesha, Oak Creek, Menomonee, Hartford, Horicon, Beaver Dam, Elba, Burlington, Waterford, Geneva, Beloit, Franklin, Greenfield, Granville, Cedarburg, and so forth. Also a number of ecclesiastical institutions were established by him. The Rev. Father Kundig led a strict and holy life. Every day he arose early in the morning and was absorbed in prayer before the altar in the Cathedral till he said Mass. After a laborious life, he died March 6, 1879, at 10 o'clock in the morning. Monsignor L. Batz administered the Last Sacraments in presence of Archbishop Henni. According to his last request, the remains of this Reverend Father were interred at the Calvary Cemetery.

As successor to the deceased Vicar-General, came the Very Rev. Leonard Batz, pastor of St. Peter's Church. At the same time, also, the Rev. Patrick Donahoe was created Vicar-General, the functions of which office, owing to extreme age, he conducted for but a short while. He was born at Kingston, Dublin County, Ireland, in 1810. When twenty-four years of age, he came to America and was ordained to the priesthood in Philadelphia on September 8, 1837. After accomplishing considerable work in the East, he removed to Milwaukee in 1852, where he was made rector of the Cathedral, remaining as such until July, 1880. He died on the morning of July 16, 1889.

On March 14, 1880, the Right Rev. Bishop Heiss, of La Crosse, was appointed Coadjutor to Archbishop Henni, with the right of succession. As a matter of fact, he was practically the ordinary, increasing infirmities confining the venerable Archbishop to the house. On August 28, 1880, Archbishop Heiss consecrated the Right Rev. Kilian Flasch his successor as Bishop of La Crosse, while on the 15th of the same month of the year preceding, he had blessed the corner-stone of Marquette College. In the interim, and immediately succeeding this period, numerous improvements were made to the diocesan property, among them the erection of Holy Trinity Church, St. Joseph's, the Immaculate Conception, St. Hedwig's, St. Anthony's, Holy Name, St. Patrick's, and, in 1883, a second hospital, St. Joseph's, which was opened by the Franciscan Sisters on Fourth street. After the death of Archbishop Henni, his successor at once assumed the responsibilty and multifarious duties accruing to that office. Of his eminent fitness for that exalted position everybody seemed convinced, as he was regarded by many as the most learned of the American prelates, a distinction of extraordinary merit among so many of known quality and worth.

Archbishop Michael Heiss, one of the first pioneer missionaries and a most important factor in spreading the Catholic faith in the Northwest, was born April 12, 1818, at Pfahldorf, in Bavaria. When nine years of age, he commenced the study of Latin and finished his classical course at Neuberg on the Danube. In 1839 he visited the University at Munich, where he studied philosophy and theology under the eminent Professors Goerres, Moehler and Doellinger. On October 18, 1840, when but twenty-two years of age, the future Metropolitan of Milwaukee was ordained priest by the subsequent Cardinal Reisach. When Bishop Purcell from Cincinnati was visiting Munich in 1838, the young candidate of the priesthood became familiar with the idea of spending his future life in the mission field of America. The commandment of the divine Lord, "Ite in universum mundum"—"Go ye into the whole world"—stood always before his mind. Having received the permission from his Bishop, who was Prefect of the Propaganda in Rome, an institute to which the Church affairs of America were subjected, Father Heiss embarked November 3, 1842, at Havre and reached New York December 17, after a prolonged and dangerous voyage of forty-five days. At first he went to Louisville, Ky., and afterwards to Covington, where he began his missionary work. At the urgent request of Bishop J. M. Henni, he came to Milwaukee on May 3, 1844, and there began his missionary life in Wisconsin, his sphere of action comprising fifty-six miles north and west of Milwaukee. In 1846 he erected St. Mary's Church in Milwaukee, the first building of brick and stone erected here. St. Mary's congregation consisted of German Catholics who had belonged so far to St. Peter's Church. Finally, ill-health induced him to make a visit to his native country in search of repose and strength. He left Milwaukee in 1850, but returned again to his field of labor in 1852. Dr. Joseph Salzmann became his successor as pastor of St. Mary's Church. Having returned from Europe, he was entrusted with the foundation of that institution of learning from which so many young priests have come forth. At first a house was rented where Father Heiss instructed the candidates for priesthood; afterwards the Seminary found a permanent place where the Salesianum now stands. The Rev. M. Heiss became the first rector and spiritual father of this great institution whilst Dr. Salzmann provided the material means for erecting the building by collecting throughout the United States and even Europe, in which undertaking he endured many hardships and distresses. Like soul and body, the two founders of the Seminary worked hand in hand. Besides, the Rev. Father Heiss became famous through his celebrated works, "The Four Gospels," and "On Matrimony." When the new See at La Crosse was erected, the Rev. M. Heiss was chosen by the Holy See as first Bishop of this place. On September 6, 1868, he was consecrated and immediately took up his residence at La Crosse. But what a residence! Here he found the same poor circumstances which prevailed in Milwaukee when Martin Henni came there as Bishop. His residence was a crude frame building and his Cathedral hardly any better. Bishop Heiss was not only a man of great learning, but also of great business talent. Thus the diocese of La Crosse grew rapidly in spiritual and material welfare. During the twelve years of his administration a great number of churches and religious institutions were erected and the benevolent influence of his wise administration was felt throughout the whole diocese. But his activity was not limited by his diocese. Already as priest he took part in the consultations of the Council of Baltimore in 1849, at St. Louis in 1855 and at Baltimore again in Archbishop Michael Heiss.

1866. He was also appointed member of the Committee on Dogmatic Questions in the Vatican Council in 1869-70, this being a great honor for the Bishop as well as for the diocese. In the year 1880 Bishop Heiss was elected Coadjutor of Archbishop M. Henni with the right of succession to the Archiepiscopal See and the title of Archbishop of Adrianople, I. P. I. In September, 1881, Archbishop Henni died and was succeeded by the Most Rev. M. Heiss. With great zeal and fervor he performed his responsible duties, doing his best to promote the growth and spiritual welfare of Catholic life. In 1883 Bishop Heiss went to Rome again to take part in the consultations to which all Archbishops were invited by Pope Leo XIII. In the year 1884 he attended the Council of Baltimore, and in May, 1886, he presided at the Provincial Council held at Milwaukee. In the beginning of the year 1890, he went to La Crosse on account of ill-health, where he died March 26. He was well prepared for the final change, and was well aware of the near approach of death. With great resignation to the will of God, he gave up his spirit to Him to whom his whole life had been devoted. The funeral services took place in St. John's Cathedral, attended by a great number of archbishops, bishops and priests. His remains found their last resting place in the Chapel of the Salesianum by the side of his intimate friend, Dr. Joseph Salzmann. Archbishop Heiss was a man of science and extraordinary piety. The whole course of his life was full of noble deeds and pious actions.

The first great effort put forth by Archbishop Heiss and Vicar-General Batz was to reduce the indebtedness of the Archdiocese, for which purpose a meeting of the diocesan clergy was called in 1882. The plan there agreed upon was that each pastor should contribute a stipulated sum annually for this purpose, to which both the Archbishop and Vicar-General donated their entire salaries until the full amount should be paid. So admirably did this plan work, and so readily did the clergy respond, that by 1887 the entire indebtedness had been removed—the Archdiocese was in verity free. Soon after this undertaking had been accomplished, the Archbishop removed his place of residence to a property on Jackson street, which he had purchased out of his own personal means, with the exception of a few voluntary contributions made by the diocesan officials and other bureaus.

Among other matters pertaining to the interests of the Archdiocese at this time, Father Schinner tells us that, preparatory to the Third Plenary Council at Baltimore, the Archbishops of the United States were summoned to Rome in the year 1883 for preliminary arrangements and deliberation. After leaving Rome, Archbishop Heiss was taken seriously ill; there was much anxiety, but his strong constitution, though weakened by age, was powerful enough to overcome the malady. The Third Plenary Council was held the following year. The learning that Archbishop Heiss evinced at this meeting astonished even those who knew him well and appreciated his ability.

It was one of the enactments of the Plenary Council that Provincial Councils should be convoked to promulgate the Baltimore decrees and make such provisions as were necessary for the peculiar conditions of each province. The Provincial Council of Milwaukee (the first) began its sessions under the direction of Archbishop Heiss, May 23, 1886; it ended May 30. Five bishops, one administrator and one abbot attended; they were: Bishops Seidenbusch, Ireland, Vertin, Flasch and Marty; Administrator of Green Bay, the Very Rev. F. X. Katzer, now Archbishop, and the Abbot Edelbrock.

The first Provincial Council of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee was held in the city of Milwaukee, from the 23d to the 30th of May, 1886. On the 20th of the preceding month, Archbishop Heiss prepared and forwarded to the bishops, vicars-apostolic, abbots, superiors of religious orders and convents, rectors of the priests' seminaries of the Province of Milwaukee, and to all ecclesiastical dignitaries, whose duty it is to be present at such times, a letter inviting them to be present at a council the principal object of which was to take under consideration the advisability of promulgating certain decrees which had been adopted by the Plenary Council at Baltimore, and recognized by the Holy See.

The preliminary meeting of the bishops was held on the morning of May 22, all with the exception of the Right Rev. Thomas L. Grace, senior Bishop of the Province of St. Paul, being present. There was, also, in attendance at this council, the Rev. F. X. Katzer, Administrator of the diocese of Green Bay. At this gathering Archbishop Heiss, as praeses of the council, spoke at length concerning the principal object of the convention, proposed the names of the ones he desired named officers of the council and read to those present a telegram received, in which his Holiness, the Pope, sent to the council his benediction. On the afternoon of the same day, all of the delegates assembled in the Cathedral, there being present: Archbishop Michael Heiss, praeses of the council; the Most Rev. Rupert Seidenbusch, vicar-apostolic of Minnesota; the Most Rev. John Ireland, bishop of St. Paul; the Most Rev. John Vertin, bishop of Marquette; the Most Rev. Martin Marty, abbot of the Benedictine Order and vicar-apostolic of Dakota; the Right Rev. Kilian Flasch, bishop of La Crosse; the Right Rev. Frederick Xavier Katzer, administrator of the diocese of Green Bay; the Right Rev. Alexius Edelbrock, O. S. B., abbot of St. John's, Minnesota; Msgr. Leonard Batz, vicar-general of the archdiocese of Milwaukee; the Very Rev. Francis Haas, provincial of the Capuchin Order; the Very Rev. F. John Gaffron, praeses of the Order of the Franciscan Brothers; the Very Rev. F. Dixehan, prior of the Dominican Order; the Rev. Stanislaus Lalumiere, S. J., superior of the Jesuits; the Rev. Anselm Leiter, S. J., superior of the Jesuits; the Rev. William Corby, superior of the congregation of the Holy Cross; the Very Rev. August Zeininger, rector of St. Francis Seminary; the Very Rev. Thomas O'Gorman, rector of St. Thomas Seminary, St. Paul; the Revs. Lawrence Conrad, Adolph Birkhaeuser, James J. Keogh and Thomas Fagan, theologians for Milwaukee diocese; the Revs. Joseph Buh and Frederick X. August Stemper, theologians for the vicar-apostolic of Minnesota; the Revs. Aloysius Plut and John Shanly, theologians for the bishop of St. Paul; the Revs. Edward Jacker and Frederick Eis, theologians for the bishop of Marquette; the Right Revs. Georgius L. Willard, vicar-general, and Otto Zardetti, theologians for the bishop of the vicar-apostolic of Dakota; the Right Rev. James Schwebach, vicar-general, and the Rev. Charles F. X. Goldsmith, theologians for the bishop of La Crosse; the Revs. Nicholas July and Elzear De Wilt, theologians for the bishop of Green Bay. The officers of the council were: Promoters, the Vicar-Apostolic of Dakota, and Bishop of Green Bay; Judges of Complaint, bishop of St. Paul, bishop of Marquette, the Right Rev. Alexius Edelbrock, O. S. B., abbot of St. John and Msgr. Leonard Batz; Notary, the Very Rev. August Zeininger; Secretaries, the Revs. P. M. Abbelen, Joseph Rainer and Simon Lebl; Deputy Notaries, the Revs. Charles F. X. Public sessions of the council were also held on the mornings of the 4th and 5th Sundays after Easter, while on Friday morning preceding the latter a Requiem High Mass was celebrated in memory of the deceased bishops of the Province. On the afternoons of Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday during the convention, special meetings were held by the theologians present, while general meetings of all of the delegates convened during the afternoons of Wednesday and Friday. The bishops also went into private sessions each day, Friday excepted. A special session was held on the 4th Sunday after Easter, on which occasion Archbishop Heiss celebrated High Mass and Bishop Ireland preached the sermon. The services concluded, the Professio Fidei was proclaimed, all the members of the council being present.

The first private session of the council was held on Monday morning, all of the bishops assembling at the bishop's house. At this meeting was formulated and dispatched a letter to Archbishop James Gibbons, congratulating him upon his elevation to the cardinalate. Matters of graver import were also taken under consideration. There were seven private meetings in all during the entire session, at which principles outlining the Church policy set forth or endorsed by the council at Baltimore were duly considered. In addition to this, the following questions were also brought under discussion: First, at what age can children be admitted to their First Holy Communion; second, whether it would be best for collections taken up at Mass to form part of the pastor's salary, or whether his services should be recognized by a stipulated sum, to be paid out of the general funds of the parish; third, whether the collections taken up on Christmas Day and upon Easter should belong to the rector of the congregation; fourth, whether the salaries of priests in cities should be fixed at $1,000 per annum, and those conducting country pastorates at $800. The first of these propositions passed unchallenged, but regarding the second it was decided that collections taken up in church should belong to the church. The remaining questions were also satisfactorily disposed of, including, also, that of parochial schools, which was vigorously considered and discussed in all of its phases. The last session of the council was held on the 5th Sunday after Easter, on which occasion High Mass was celebrated by Bishop John Vertin, of Marquette, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Father Fitzgerald, S. J., rector of Marquette College, Milwaukee. The council concluded its session with an announcement made by Archbishop Heiss, who declared the decrees of the Third Plenary Council at Baltimore as valid and binding for all the dioceses and vicariates apostolic in his province as well as the decrees of the Oecumerican Vatican Council, which treat concerning the primacy and the infallibility of the Pope.

During the council at Milwaukee the degrees of precedence in the clergy were also defined as follows: 1, Vicar-Generals; 2, Consultors; 3, Rectors of the Clerical Seminaries; 4, Deacons; 5, Immovable Rectors and Professors of a Clerical Seminary; 6, Rectors of Congregations; 7, Vicars. Within these degrees precedence is taken according to the time elapsed since the date of ordination.

Of the duties of deans, the Third Plenary Council at Baltimore decided as follows: It is the duty of the deans to visit the churches and schools of the congregations of their district and to investigate the temporal condition of the same each year; also to consider the spiritual welfare of the members of those congregations. The dean is expected to make a report of the spiritual and temporal condition of his district to the bishop of his diocese once each year.

Regarding the examination of clerics, the same rules were observed, or rather, decided upon, as those provided by the Second Plenary Council at Baltimore; while similar sentiments prevailed concerning regulations providing for the support of the clergy. Additional rules promulgated by the Third Plenary Council and adopted by the Milwaukee Council as valid referred to the management and conduct of parochial schools, celebration of feasts and holy days, church songs, cemeteries and funerals, church property and secret societies. All of these decrees, having been adopted by the Council, were read to the public in the Cathedral at Milwaukee on May 30, 1886. The decrees thus adopted were approved by the Holy See April 26, 1888.

The period covering the administration of Archbishop Heiss is marked by a number of notable improvements to the property and general condition of the church. Thus, there were built, in addition to those already mentioned: St. Hyacinth's Church (1882), St. Michael's and St. Wenceslaus' (1883), Holy Rosary (1885), St. Augustine's, St. Rose's and St. Vincent's (1888), St. Boniface's, St. Josaphat's, St. Lawrence's and SS. Peter and Paul's (1889). And so, with the knowledge of a life's duty well performed, having worked tirelessly and zealously for the lasting good of the Church, seeing around him so many evidences of much that had been accomplished, and feeling beyond all those twin elements of strength and unity of purpose, and an abiding faith, Archbishop Heiss passed into the great beyond, his death occurring March 26, 1890. His passing occurred at the most critical moment in the history of the Church, when warring elements made vigorous, yet futile, battle against those sacred rights of liberty to obtain which the country had made a great and noble sacrifice.

For some time following the death of Archbishop Heiss, the administration of the Archdiocese remained in the hands of the Right Rev. August Zeininger, whom the dying prelate had named as his administrator. In December, 1890, however, the Right Rev. F. X. Katzer was promoted to the Archiepiscopate, although for some months following he remained at Green Bay. So it was not until June 30th of the following year that he assumed the duties of his office. In July, 1892, Archbishop Katzer convoked a synod "intended to supplement the Provincial Council of Milwaukee as that had supplemented the Plenary Council at Baltimore." At this, the second, though first formal, gathering at Milwaukee, regulations were provided for more uniform practice in both churches and schools. When Archbishop Katzer first came to the city, he was without a home, that formerly occupied by Archbishop Heiss having been donated by him towards a fund for the maintenance of disabled priests. Before long, however, the new prelate secured an ideal and delightful location on Chestnut street, the grounds of which extend to Cold Spring avenue and from Twenty-second to Twenty-third streets.

Since the elevation of the present incumbent to the Archiepiscopate of Milwaukee, the work of progress has gone on, the spirit and life of a genuine enthusiasm marking the growth and upbuilding of the Church throughout the entire extent of his jurisdiction.

Frederick Xavier Katzer was born February 7, 1844, at Ebensee, a town of Upper Austria, son of Charles and Barbara (Reinhardtsgruber) Katzer. The father was a native of Moravia, but emigrated at the age of twenty-two to another province of the Austrian Empire, of which he was a resident for many years. Most of this time he was located at Gmunden, where he was for years a trusted and valued employe in a cotton factory. It was here, too, that young Katzer obtained his earlier education, attending, first, the primary, and, later, the High School at that place. At the age of twelve he was sent to Linz, where he began his classical studies at the gymnasium under the direction of the Fathers of the Society of Jesus. Here his brilliant abilities soon attracted the attention of the faculty, who still hold him in kindly memory and highest repute. Whilst studying he read the urgent call of an American missionary, then visiting in Austria, for candidates to the priesthood, and following the invitation, he left Linz and came to America, arriving in May, 1864. Here his intention was to enter the Society of Jesus, but, instead, completed his studies at the Seminary of St. Francis, Milwaukee, and was ordained to the priesthood on December 21, 1866. He then accepted the Professorship of Theology at the Salesianum. In this he proved more than successful, his happy methods of imparting information lending a charm to subjects which otherwise might have appeared both dry and uninteresting. While at St. Francis, he also developed an unusual amount of poetic and dramatic ability, particularly emphasized in a religious drama, written at that time, in which the struggle of the Church against its enemies was tellingly portrayed. This drama has been twice presented by the students of the Salesianum, once soon after its completion, the second time not many years ago, in honor of the author's promotion to the Archiepiscopal See of Milwaukee. In 1875 the Rev. Professor Katzer became secretary to Bishop Krautbauer, and rector of the Cathedral of Green Bay. Four years later he was appointed Vicar-General of the diocese of Green Bay, and on the death of Bishop Krautbauer, December, 1885, became Administrator. In May, 1886, he was elected Bishop, being consecrated September 21, 1886. In this new and difficult field he speedily gained the esteem and attachment of the priests for his uniform sense of justice and regard for the rights of others. His work also soon became visible in the well-regulated affairs of the diocese, the flourishing condition of the churches, and the general harmony existing throughout his domain. His promotion to the Archdiocese of Milwaukee, made vacant by the death of Archbishop Heiss in December, 1890, was an event for many earnest and heartfelt congratulations from those who, though missing him sorely, became willingly reconciled in so marked a distinction shown to one whom they both loved and admired. The Pallium, emblem of this new dignity acquired, was conferred with all due solemnity on August 21, 1891. Here, too, his work, though of limited duration, is already showing the most gratifying results. One of his distinguished characteristics is clearness of thought and purity of style. Years of study and labor amid men and scenes of national importance has enriched his mind and strengthened his powers, so that now, as Archbishop, he is in the zenith of his fame.

Archbishop Katzer particularly enjoys the study of theological principles and their application. He studies the literature as well as philosophy of theology, and in so doing his learning strengthens the argument his logic inspires. He works out his results as a religious student as the artist works out his conceptions from the quarried marble, leaving no field unexplored that can shed light upon his pathway.

The Rev. A. F. Schinner, present secretary to Archbishop Katzer of Milwaukee, was born in that city, May 1, 1863. He acquired his education for the priesthood at St. Francis Seminary, and was ordained by Archbishop Heiss, March 7, 1886. Following ordination he was appointed pastor of the Catholic parish at Richfield, Wis., remaining there in charge until July, 1887. He then became a professor in St. Francis Seminary, continuing as such until the time of his present appointment.

The Right Rev. Msgr. Augustine Zeininger, Vicar-General of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee, is a native of Austria, in which country he was also educated. He was, in fact, a student at Linz in Upper Austria at the time when the late Father Salzmann visited that country in 1866. Father Zeininger, with a number of other students, returned with Dr. Salzmann to St. Francis, Wis., and was ordained to the priesthood from the seminary at that place in December, 1868. For eighteen years following ordination he remained at the seminary as Professor of physics, procurator and rector. In these varying capacities he showed himself a man of decided activity and progressive ideas, which made him remarkably popular with both colleagues and students. It was his zealous and energetic efforts to place the seminary on a safe financial basis that undoubtedly more than any other thing caused him to be selected as chancellor of the Archdiocese, to which position he was appointed by Archbishop Heiss in 1886. Two years later he visited Europe, in company with Bishop Katzer of Green Bay, visiting the city of Rome on that occasion for the first time. Subsequently he was made a monsignore. Owing to the untimely death of Archbishop Heiss, Msgr. Zeininger found himself in charge of the Archdiocese as administrator during the memorable Bennett Law campaign of 1890, and here, too, he displayed an unusual amount of prudent generalship and unceasing zeal, which unquestionably aided to a great extent in defeating that tribute to bigotry and intolerance.

CHAPTER II.

St. John's Cathedral, Milwaukee.

A LASTING monument alike to Milwaukee's progress, growth and devotional zeal, stands the grand old Cathedral of St. John. True, it may be that both art and science have developed many charming and desirable innovations since its first foundation stone was laid, yet throughout the fleeting years it has proved sturdy and true to the Master's cause, an ark of refuge to the sin-tossed spirit.

To the world it stands to-day a memento of the tireless energy and persistent effort of those whose lives, during the earlier periods of the country's development, were devoted to the cause of Christianity, while to those who have spent a life's devotion at its altars it bears a relation too hallowed for the uninspired pen to express. But time cannot dim the luster of its achievements, and though seared and stained by many a passing storm, its walls still echo to those undying truths which tell of comfort, peace and of eternal rest.

Here, then, beneath its sacred arches youth reads aright the story of a work well done, and strives in emulation to do its share in battling for the cause, while, tottering amid a wealth of tender, clinging memories, age calmly awaits the final summons.

But aside from these ties, which, naturally enough, enshrine this sacred structure within the heart of every consistent devotee, the relation of St. John's Cathedral to history has a still greater significance, for, letting alone the mere question of sect or creed, it is a recognized landmark in the history of the city. As such the native-born citizen recognizes it, oft-times with pardonable pride, pointing it out as one of the most noticeable and interesting relics in our midst. This is but just, however, for in spite of time's material changes, rapid increase of population, and the necessary erection of numerous additional churches, it still maintains its prestige as a work of ecclesiastical architecture and a home of all that is recognized as the best in Catholic worship.

In designing and building St. John's Cathedral, Archbishop Henni gave indisputable evidence of that soundness of judgment and strength of conviction which are so necessary under all such circumstances to overcome the well-meaning yet over-cautious objections which are certain to arise. His was no ephemeral dream born of super-apostolic fervor, but an earnest, masterful conviction that the future of the Church in this erstwhile wilderness could be gauged by no metes and bounds. To him the cause of the Church was paramount, and in its struggling infancy he recognized the shackled torrent which e'er long must pour in volumes of conviction over the civilized world. That theory has long since become a fact, as witnessed in the many noble edifices which have since been erected in the cause to which his life was wholly dedicated.

Nearly seven years before John Martin Henni set foot in Milwaukee, as its first Catholic Bishop, Mass was celebrated by Father Fleurimont Bonduel, in Solomon Juneau's house. In the fall of the same year the Rev. Patrick O'Kelly came from Detroit, Mich., holding his first services in the Court House. Somewhat later, Solomon Juneau donating two lots, Father O'Kelly raised sufficient funds to erect a small frame building, familiar for years after to the Catholics of Milwaukee as St. Peter's Church. For nine years following, this humble building, which was situated on Martin street, between Jefferson and Jackson streets, served as the first Cathedral of Milwaukee and the great Northwest.

Father O'Kelly, who is recognized as the first permanent pastor in Milwaukee, was ably assisted in his missionary labors by Fathers Thomas Morrisey and Peter McLaughlin, who in and around the city worked hard and conscientiously to build up Catholicity.

For a long period following, the labors imposed as well as the many obstacles to be met with were almost beyond their strength, for with the addition of the lamented and saintly Father Kundig, they composed the entire working force in the diocese over which Bishop Henni presided. But they were men of apostolical mould and unwonted zeal, so that, in spite of adverse circumstances, under their fostering care the Catholic interests of Milwaukee strengthened and progressed.

From that time affairs prospered and both State and City grew apace. A tide of immigration—largely German—poured into Wisconsin, and soon it became evident that existing accommodations were entirely inadequate to the demands made upon them. From four parishes in 1844 there had come to be thirty in 1847, and in a like proportion the number of the Catholic laity had increased. So a new Church had to be built, one which would in every way be fitting for the service of a Bishop.

A site, therefore, for a Cathedral was selected—the present one—and none have yet disputed the wisdom of that selection. It is indeed an ideal location, being, though in the heart of the city, far from the hum of disturbing elements, the war of commerce, the strife and turmoil of hurrying throngs. Stretching away on either hand, the quiet and serenity of home life prevails, while before its very doors the well-groomed lawns and handsome foliage of the Court House Park increase many-fold the artistic beauty of the surroundings. To the east of the Cathedral, but a few blocks away, the wavelets of Lake Michigan patter an endless orison upon the yielding beach, while from the same direction, during the summer days, cooling breezes come to soothe and content.

The work on St. John's Cathedral was begun in the summer of 1847, the corner stone being laid by Bishop Henni on the fifth day of December following. Four years elapsed, however, before the building was under roof, during which time the city's first hospital was opened by the Bishop, and placed by him in charge of the Sisters of Charity. This building stood on the corner of Jackson and Oneida streets, the site where the residence of Dr. William Fox now stands.

In 1848 Bishop Henni visited Europe, and while there secured several paintings which can to-day be seen hanging in the Cathedral. They are beautiful examples of religious art, and elicit the warmest praise from those who have seen them.

In 1849 the Bishop returned to Milwaukee, and three years later undertook a trip to Cuba and Mexico, with a view to raising funds for the purpose of completing the end of 1852 the structure was under roof, and at the building of his dearest hopes—his Cathedral. By the same time the private residence of the Cathedral and St. Rose's Orphan Asylum were also in course of construction.

The happy day at last arrived when Bishop Henni saw one of his fondest hopes realized. On July 31, 1853, took place the dedication of his cathedral. It was consecrated by Mgr. Bedini, Bishop of Thebes and Papal Nuncio to Brazil, assisted by Dr. Salzmann as deacon and Father Donahoe as sub-deacon. Dr. Ives was master of ceremonies. The celebrated Bishop Hughes, of New York, preached the sermon on this occasion, and in the evening Bishop Purcell, of Cincinnati, held the evening discourse, preaching on the "Real Presence." There were also present on this occasion Bishop O'Connor, of Pittsburg, Bishop Lafevre, of Detroit, Bishop Vandevelde, of Chicago, and some seventy priests. It was, indeed, a memorable day and occasion, and one that lived long in the minds of those who were present. Referring to it, a writer in The Milwaukee Sentinel of the following day says: "I could not help thinking that when this beautiful city of Milwaukee will have grown to, perhaps, fifty times the size it is now, when our children's children shall be forgotten, its inhabitants, then, looking on this building, may say, 'this was the flood mark here of the religion of Jesus Christ in 1853.'"

From 1853 to 1860 the parish made steady and gradual gain, its sphere of influence for good becoming appreciably widened. But on September 8, 1860, a dark shadow hung over it, paralyzing its every energy for the time, and creating such intense and general gloom that one was almost led to believe it would surely succumb under its awful and oppressing influences. On that date the steamer "Lady Elgin" was lost on Lake Michigan, and, as a result, hundreds of homes in the parish were made desolate. The blow was both terrible and sweeping, for but few homes, indeed, were to be found in the old Third Ward which had escaped a visit from the Angel of Death on that memorable and never-to-be-forgotten night. So deeply has the horror of that occasion entered into the hearts of the congregation, that even now, after nearly forty years have passed away, its memory is as fresh and vivid as if the disaster had happened but yesterday. Each recurring year a Mass is said in the Cathedral for the repose of the souls of those who were lost on the "Lady Elgin." But there was more trouble in store for the people of this parish, for no sooner had they somewhat recovered from the effects of the first terrible shock of this frightful disaster, than the Civil War began, and fresh demands were made upon them for still further sacrifices. In Bishop Henni the cause of the North found an active ally. In his Cathedral he preached loyal and soul-stirring sermons, and encouraged those who could bear arms to offer their services in aid of their imperiled country. And as if to accentuate the earnest and loyal sentiments propounded by him, from the tower of the Cathedral there floated out the Nation's emblem, the Stars and Stripes, giving, as it were, to the world an eloquent, though silent, proof of the love of the good Bishop and his flock for the land whose honor and safety they were ready to defend.

So it would seem that the birth and progress of the Cathedral parish is not only an incident in the history of the Catholic progression, but may be regarded in a broader and more general sense, as being a factor and veritable part in the history of the country itself, bearing the marks of generous and judicious handling, wearing the scars of innumerable tribulations and disasters, yet through these successive periods of sorrow and joy, being continuously upheld by the courage, good will and generous disposition which as a whole marks the policy of the people of the country.

In July, 1875, an event occurred that brought a special joy of the parishioners of the Cathedral parish. Their beloved Bishop was made an Archbishop, and was invested with the pallium by the Rt. Rev. Michael Heiss, who was then Bishop of La Crosse. The pallium was brought from Rome by Mgr. Cesare Roncetti. Bishop Ryan, then Coadjutor, Bishop of St. Louis, preached the sermon. Only one month from the time of this joyful celebration, and sorrow took possession of many a heart in the parish. Its cause was the death of Father Kundig, who was the pastor of the Cathedral and Vicar-General of the diocese. This sad event occurred on March 6, 1879, a month after the celebration of his and the Bishop's fiftieth anniversary of their ordination to the priesthood. Father Kundig had endeared himself to everyone of his spiritual flock—young and old. They not only loved him, but revered him as a saint. Never, indeed, lived a truer, more devoted, and zealous priest of God than he. His life was spent in the service of his Maker. The poor, the sorrowful, the despondent—all knew that in turning to him they would find a friend. No wonder, then, that they shed bitter tears when he was called away to his reward. Father Kundig was succeeded by Father Donahoe as pastor of St. John's. Father Donahoe was born in County Dublin, Ireland, in 1810, and his education was principally attained in his native country, although completed and ordination conferred after his arrival in America. In 1834 he came to the United States, and after various pastoral labors settled in Milwaukee in 1853.

Rev. James J. Keogh.

From this time until the day of his death he resided in Milwaukee, although owing to continued ill health and increasing infirmities he was not engaged in the performance of active duties during the whole of that period, being compelled to resign his pastorate of St. John's Cathedral some time prior to his decease, in which position he was succeeded by the present rector, the Rev. James J. Keogh.

Prior to his death,[1] that is, in 1878, Archbishop Henni received as his Coadjutor the Rt. Rev. Michael Heiss, who thereafter virtually conducted the affairs of the diocese. The death of the venerable Archbishop, although it had been expected for some time, came with a shock to his old friends and parishioners, many of whom had known him for a great number of years. Not a few of these had virtually grown up with and into the Church under his administration, having been baptized and confirmed by him, and very few, indeed, were there among the whole number who had not recognized in him a substantial and lasting friend.

Always believing in his great goodness and kindliness of heart, still they never, perhaps, fully realized how firm had been his friendship and reliant their demeanor towards him, until he had been taken away, and they were brought face to face with the fact, that in his going they had lost a counsellor and friend whose place could never be filled. It is by no means belittling the memory of others, or character of those who are still with us, to say that but few indeed are the instances where men are so warmly and generally appreciated as was he, and but rare the occurrence indeed where such deeply-rooted and enduring ties had been severed, as those which linked the venerable Bishop Henni and his parishioners in a bond of indissoluble amity.

Bishop Henni's last resting place is in a vault in the chapel of the Cathedral he loved so well. Archbishop Heiss succeeded to his work, and upon good and noble shoulders it was placed. It was, indeed, a deep pleasure, as well as a source of fervent piety, to see him amidst the impressing ceremonies in his Cathedral. Archbishop Heiss died in La Crosse in 1890, his remains being brought to Milwaukee for interment. He was succeeded as Archbishop by the Rt. Rev. F. X. Katzer, upon whom the pallium was conferred in St. John's Cathedral on August 21, 1891. Since that time the Archbishop has made great inroads into the affections of the priests and laity of the Archdiocese, and has endeared himself to the Cathedral parish by his uniform kindness of heart and the many other qualities of a zealous bishop of souls which are his.

The present rector of St. John's Cathedral, the Very Rev. James J. Keogh, has been identified with that edifice and the Cathedral parish the greater part of his life, having in earliest youth attended regularly at Divine services in St. John's, where he officiated as altar boy. To him, it may in all sincerity be said, is due a large proportion of the prosperity which this parish at present enjoys, as well as the costly and notable improvements which have gone to give a name to the Cathedral, second to but very few, if any, similar structures on this continent. His name has become, in fact, synonymous with every good work wrought out of the congregation, as well as of every movement of importance in Catholic circles in this section of the country. Day by day, year by year, he has modestly wrought upon this great work to which he has devoted his life, until, while still a young man for the position of responsibility and importance which he holds in the church's administration, he has seen each effort brought to a successful culmination, strengthened and confirmed by the willingness and unequivocal commendation of his people.

A man of remarkably quiet and retiring disposition, he has, nevertheless, by his modest and unassuming manner, won to himself a large number of influential friends, who, though not Catholics, are ever ready to acknowledge, admire and support the undertakings of one with such a breadth of character and liberality as he.

Father Keogh is a native of County Wexford, Ireland, where he first saw the light on August 15, 1847. He was still quite a youth, being but nine years of age, when he came to the United States with his parents, who settled at once in Milwaukee, so that, to all intents and purposes, he may be recognized as a scion of the Badger State. Naturally of studious habits, and with a predisposition for the Church, it was not surprising that he should as soon as practicable enter St. Francis Seminary, which he did in 1864, at once taking up a course of studies with a view to finally acquiring Holy Orders. After completing the necessary course in a thorough and highly commendable manner, he was finally ordained to the priesthood on December 20, 1871, celebrating his first Mass on the day following, on which occasion he was assisted by all of his classmates, who were ordained at the same time with him. While speaking of this occasion, it is interesting to note that the Rt. Rev. Bishop Hennessey, who in 1896 preached the jubilee sermon on the occasion of Father Keogh's twenty-fifth anniversary as a priest, was also one of the number to assist him in the celebration of his first Mass.

Having received ordination, Father Keogh was first appointed to the assistant pastorship of St. Patrick's Church, Janesville. From Janesville he was transferred to the parish at Monches, Waukesha County, which pastorate he resigned at the end of fifteen months, to accept the chair of English Literature at St. Francis Seminary. In this position, he labored earnestly until receiving his appointment as assistant pastor at St. John's, the duties of which he assumed on August 23, 1875. Here a still greater field of usefulness spread out before him, for, being eminently fitted for the position, he was immediately placed at the head of the Cathedral schools. But this was not the only duty falling to his lot which called for an exhaustless amount of energy, patience, and executive ability. Not only were the pastoral cares devolving upon him a test for the grandest physical capacity, but there was also a large debt, amounting to $30,000.00, resting upon the property, which had proved a source of much disquiet to his predecessors, as well as to the people of the congregation. Fortunately for all concerned, Father Keogh proved himself more than equal to the occasion, and although on the surface there was no appearance of haste or extra efforts being made in that direction, within five years the entire amount was wiped out, not to mention the number of necessary improvements made and expenses incurred during the same period. This really remarkable undertaking was most properly celebrated by a special service, which was made still more memorable by the presence of Mgr. Capel, of London, England, who presided on that occasion.

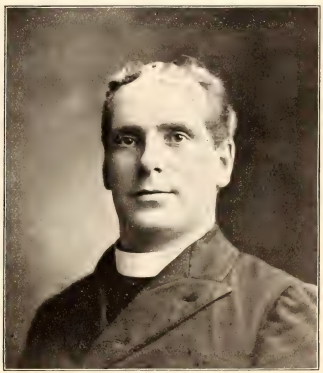
At the time that Father Keogh became assistant pastor of St. John's, Father Donahoe was still in charge, although rapidly failing health made it evident that his period of active service would be limited. He made a valiant fight, however, remaining steadfastly at his post until a short time prior to August 1, 1880, at which time Father Keogh was advanced to the pastorship of the Cathedral parish. We have deemed it advisable to particularize regarding the date, as from that time begins the active and independent administration of the present rector, proving beyond a doubt his remarkable executive capacity, and setting forth the wonderful results achieved by him. From a summary of receipts and disbursements in this parish covering the period from August 1, 1880, to August 1, 1885, we find the total receipts to have amounted to $82,550.68, while the total disbursements for the like period amounted to $82,262.04. Of these sums it may be interesting to learn that $28,015.69 represented the total amount of the old debt, as it stood on August 1, 1880, with interest to the time of payment. Other items for the like period (five years) were: Choir, $4,198.46; heating church and school, $7,382 62; repairs and improvements, $6,787.26; gas, $1,117.12; insurance, $907.75. In addition to these amounts, $3,160.70 was expended in conducting the Orphan Asylum, $1,596.00 for the Seminary, holy Fathers and Missionaries; $2,748.15 vestment, altar linens, etc.; stations, sanctuary lamp, etc., $2,248.50; school expenses, not including fuel, $14,599.80. These amounts, with pastor's and assistant pastor's salaries, as well as expenses for janitor, sexton, special taxes, printing, and sundries, include the entire expenses.

One source of worry and anxiety to Father Keogh during the earlier days of his rectorate, was the Cathedral tower, which, racked by time and the elements, had become an absolute menace to life. It was due to his efforts, then, that a move was set on foot to tear down this unreliable portion of the edifice, and replace it with a more imposing and appropriate structure. This proved to be a somewhat costly undertaking, so much so, in fact, that it is doubtful if the project could have been carried to a successful issue, had it not been for the spontaneous generosity and progressive instincts of the Hon. John Black, who, seeing the necessity for the work, came forward and made a voluntary donation of $10,000.00 for that purpose. This, at the time, was deemed fully sufficient to complete the entire work, but, as has been evidenced in the erection of many another structure, the cost of the work by far exceeded the original estimate, the total amount expended in completing the work being $16,500.00. This was accomplished in the year 1892.

Of the Cathedral itself it may be briefly stated that the general style of architecture adopted in its construction is what is known as Grecian, which, as far as its exterior appearance is concerned, until the erection of the present tower, gave to the structure a striking resemblance to the Jesuit mission churches, which are frequently met with in Southern California and Mexico.



Rev. M. J. Huston.

The interior effects are particularly pleasing, for, while of a noticeably rich character, there is an absolute and utter avoidance of anything approaching display, the entire effect being particularly chaste. The existing mural decorations were done in 1892, by a celebrated Polish fresco painter. The effect of this work is described as follows: "At the four corners of the ceiling, much simplified for decorative effect from the fact that the church is a basilica, and consequently has no transept, are fine figures of the four Evangelists, and at either side in the center two groups, one representing Christ with the poor, the blind, and the lame, and the other, the Nativity. Over the high altar is a remarkably fine crucifixion, together with the Communion of the Blessed Virgin, by St. John; over the south side altar, Christ with the discipline of Emmaus, and over the north side altar, St. Francis Xavier, baptizing the heathen.

All of these were procured by Archbishop Henni from Munich, and they are remarkably fine works of art. In the sacristy chapel is a St. Charles Borromeo by the same painter, rightly considered one of the finest pictures in this city, although at present it is badly hung, and loses from the fact that only at certain hours of the day is it well lighted. In the same chapel are two other noble canvases, one of St. Catherine, and the other 'The Agony in the Garden.'"

Among the art treasures belonging to the Cathedral, are two beautiful chalices, one of which was presented to Archbishop Henni a short time prior to his departure from Cincinnati, to take up his new charge in Milwaukee, and the other presented to the present rector, Father Keogh, on the occasion of his twenty-fifth anniversary in the priesthood. Both are of gold, the latter being studded with a large number of valuable gems.

In addition to the numerous and valuable art wonders to be found in the interior furnishings and decorations of the Cathedral, there have already been placed in position four windows, the first installment of a series of twenty-four designs, for which Father Keogh has already made arrangements. Regarding those already placed, as well as those to come, a better description cannot be given than by reproducing one by Mr. Edwin C. Eldridge, as it appeared in The Milwaukee Sentinel of Sunday, November 21, 1897:

"There are at present four of these beautiful translucent pictures, two in a window in compartments, they being part of a series of twenty-four designed for the church, but not yet executed. The scheme or order of thought followed in this series of windows designed by Messrs. John Hardman & Co., of London, was suggested by Father Keogh, and is in harmony with the beautiful mural paintings on the ceiling. It has been considered of the first importance toward attaining complete success—in relation to the canons of art—that the style and character of the architecture of the building they are to adorn, should be faithfully regarded, both in feeling and method in all their various parts, and that care should be taken to ensure that the massive, reposeful and withal eminently graceful interior of classic design should by no means be touched by any note of discord in the embellishment of its windows, however beautiful in themselves these might otherwise be. Hence we find in all their details, as well as broader lines, not the cruder conventionalities or archaic features which are the legitimate and expressive characteristics of earlier mediaevalism, but the more free and delicately developed method of drawing in which Raphael and the great exponents of his school lifted religious art in their day as completely beyond the art of their fathers as did Giotto more than two centuries previously in that which was known to the men of his time.

"Wonderfully beautiful as are the thirteenth century windows of Chartres, Canterbury, and Lincoln, those which form the subject of this article are of another school; not less deeply religious in feeling, composition and thought, but conceived and carried out with all the tenderness of graceful drawing and delicate expression which is the highest development of an art practiced and gradually perfected through the many centuries during which the Catholic Church has fostered and encouraged its best use in the adornment of her sanctuaries.

"Art in her turn has ever been the handmaid of religion, devoting herself to the clearer as well as more beautiful exposition of thoughts which fill the mind in meditating on the mysteries of the Faith, ever recollecting and recognizing anew types and similes interwoven again and again in varying forms throughout the stories of the patriarchs and holy women in the old law, and their true meaning unfolded in the Gospels. And the architectural form of the large windows in St. John's Cathedral well lends itself in every desirable way to the representation in the order of type and anti-type, to such an epitome of the history of the Fall and Redemption, as has been chosen for the subjects of the 'storied panes' to fill them.

"Each of the twelve tall windows, measuring 22 feet 4 inches by 6 feet 11 inches, is disposed in two main divisions or panels entirely surrounded by a bordering space of substantial width, twenty inches.

"The lower panel in each case will be filled with a great type of the Old Law or Testament, and the upper with its corresponding anti-type in the New. Thus in the beautiful windows put in last week and with which the series begins, we have the Fall of our first parents and the promise given of a Redeemer, that is to say, the story of the first and second Eve, while the last of the series on the window of the opposite side will represent the Resurrection.

"Strictly speaking, the designation of type and antitype may hardly apply to the composition of the first. It is rather a preface to the story in those which follow. But it is a theme which almost exceeds them all in the fascination of its beautiful unfolding and the greatness of its import, beginning in sadness inexpressible, and crowned with unspeakable joy.

"The large group below represents the expulsion of Adam and Eve from the gates of Paradise; and the coloring, as well as the depiction of the subject, is made to tell in symbolic language the lesson of the story told. All within the portals, symbolized by great classic columns on either side supporting an arch, is resplendent with golden light which streams out of the 'Paradise of Pleasure' upon the thorny path, and into the darkness which prevails outside. Clothed in their coats of skin, of penitential purpose, Adam leads Eve by the hand, extending an arm, as it were, in protection over her, as, stricken with grief, they are driven out by the angel who floats above, wielding the flaming sword 'turned every way to keep the way of the Tree of Life.' The serpent is present, exulting in their fall, and, in the shadow of the outer darkness, thorns, and the apple by which they fell, strew the way. All this part of the composition is rich in color, its deeper and lighter shades by contrast heightening the strength and value of each. But the border space surrounding it, happily provided by the architectural members, is filled with a more uniformly light treatment, subordinate alike in color as well as form to the main subject, giving strength and value to its color, and explanation, in its rich symbolism, to its meaning. The ornamental foliage work at either side of the large group of the expulsion is composed of the thorn and the apple in reference to the Fall, and the sorrow thereby created. On an escutcheon in the center of each of these spaces, are represented the Doors of Paradise closed and barred by Pride and Disobedience, solemn words which are inscribed across them.

"But in alleviation of the sorrow and presaging the joy to come in the subject above, we have beneath the main group the words of promise, held by two angels, 'She shall crush thy head,' and immediately over it, across the central transom, the words of Our Blessed Lady, the second Eve, 'Behold the handmaid of the Lord.' This text is the subject of the upper part of the window, which contains in substance the fulfillment of the promise to the first Eve, and the reversal of the penal decree. So we have now in the outer borders, not the thorn, or the apple, entwined as they are below with the word of banishment, 'Eva,' but the lily as emblem of innocence and joy entwined with 'Ave's' (the reversal of Eva), and signifying hope and promise. On the escutcheons in the center, are depicted the gates of Paradise now reopened by the virtues of humility and obedience (written across them) and the light of Heaven streaming through.

"The scroll held by the angels across the upper transom contains the words of the prophet Isaiah, 'Behold, a virgin shall conceive.' Our Blessed Lady, in a rich mantle of blue, is seated in meditation beneath a ruby canopy (the depiction of the whole subject in all its parts aiming in no way to be literal or naturalistic, but wholly symbolical); on the open book before her, are written the words, 'He that made me rested in my tabernacle.' The Holy Spirit in the form of a dove hovers over her. The Angel Gabriel, with the lily of purity now in place of the flaming sword, gracefully floats downward, holding a scroll with the words, 'Ave gratia plena'; and doves and lilies are freely introduced as subordinate details of enrichment emblematic of purity and innocence.

"In the second window we have the Nativity, in the announcement of the angels to the shepherds on Christmas night. The typical subject below is Jacob's vision of the Angels of God ascending and descending on the ladder which 'stood upon the earth, the top thereof touching Heaven.' This subject has reference to the Incarnation of our Lord, inasmuch as it is typical of His divine and humane nature, the ladder reaching Heaven to earth. The patriarch's words, 'Truly the Lord is in this place, and I knew it not,' are written on the scroll held by the angels in the lower transom. The foliage in the lower side panels is composed of the olive, from which is produced the oil (of salvation), with the word 'Holy' on the scrolls, and the escutcheons contain angels' faces as emblematic of holiness. In the upper and middle transoms, the texts are the words of the angel to the shepherds, 'Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, for this day is born to you a Saviour'; in the sides, the foliage is of the plant called the 'Star of Bethlehem,' with the word 'Peace' on the interwoven scrolls; and on the escutcheons is reproduced a glorious star; all in reference to the scene near Bethlehem depicted in the upper panel of the window, where the shepherds on the hills keeping watch over their flocks by night are surprised by the vision of the angels singing, 'Glory to God in the Highest.' The brightness of the angel announcing to them the birth of our Lord, is in contrast with the gloom of night which is marked in the rest of the group, and is pierced by the ray of light descending upon the stable in Bethlehem. In like manner, in the group below, the brightness of the vision of Jacob is enhanced by the deep tone of the trees and clouds on either side, making the golden ladder and the angels in white to have a value in effect greater than could otherwise be attained even in so luminous a material as glass.

"But the end sought to be attained in the coloring of these windows has not been such as would darken or dim the present lightsome interior in the Cathedral. Daylight has been most properly regarded as of priceless value; and while the pure tones and bright and rich coloring of the glass in the main panels will greatly add to and harmonize with the color-decoration of the walls, which are already embellished with many paintings, the glass has been so carefully selected and arranged with regard to its translucent qualities as to maintain, with the aid of its broad and silvery white borders, a degree of light which will always admit of prayer-books being easily legible, while to such, if any there be, among the worshipers in the church to whom the reading of a book in any light is a difficult or irksome task, they are calculated to afford abundant food for reverent and pious contemplation.

"The two beautiful windows above described, which have been erected in St. John's Cathedral on the occasion of the jubilee of this sacred and noble edifice, will take a high place among the art treasures of Milwaukee. Conceived with such artistic feeling and theological learning, we can imagine the brilliant effect the whole series will produce when the entire edifice is filled with them.

"In studying these windows, one should endeavor to discover the devout spirit of reverent and true religious expression, as well as the artistic ingenuity displayed in their design. Without such a spirit in the observer, the charm of Christian art, a sacred art, is lost, for it was in the spirit that the early Christians, who were the primitive Christian artists, conceived their subjects, which have ever since been objects of veneration in the

"These windows are really on probation for the approval of the congregation or their representatives. They are, as above intimated, not of that sort of stained glass with which the midiaeval cathedrals were filled, and which has now become a lost art, but of the sort known as fired glass, the design being thus fixed after the painting is made upon it. Many of our finest modern windows are made in this way, and while it can in no way compare with the old thirteenth century glass, it is very beautiful, and has its advantages over others in readily lending itself to the correct delineation of figures produced in harmonious colors.

"About three years ago, Mr. Roger Watts, of London, visited Milwaukee, to learn the artistic possibilities of the Cathedral, and to confer with Father Keogh as to the design of these windows. Thus did the priest and designer then practically decide upon the work of art which we see to-day realized in part. With his usual zeal, Father Keogh has conducted the work in a most enterprising manner, which, when finished, will be most satisfactory to all."

The Cathedral also contains an organ of remarkable quality and tone. This instrument, although always a grand one, was practically rebuilt about five years ago, its many original and exceedingly valuable qualities being still further enlarged and emphasized. There are now twelve stops on the great organ, with 870 pipes; thirteen stops on the swell organ, with 870 pipes; eight stops on the choir organ, with 464 pipes, and six stops on the pedal organ, with 180 pipes, which, with eleven mechanical movements, make a grand total of fifty stops and 2,384 pipes, in addition to ten pedal movements. One stop, an 8-foot "dopple floete" on the great organ, has probably no equal in America.

The choir, also an interesting feature of the Cathedral parish, was organized on a permanent basis a decade ago, Miss Elizabeth Black being elected its first president. At the present time, the interests of this organization are administered by Miss Mary L. Furlong, under whose tactful and energetic management it has been brought to a most promising condition. The choir, which consists of a really fine collection of voices, numbers among its members fifteen sopranos, ten altos, eight tenors and eight bassos.

The Cathedral schools, which at the present day are recognized as being equal to the best of their kind in the country, were established in the year 1842, by Father Kundig. At the outset, the classes were held in the basement of old St. Peter's Church, on Martin, between Jackson and Jefferson streets, where the limited number of scholars attending were under the immediate supervision and personal direction of the pastor himself. The work of education, however, increased with amazing rapidity, so that but four short years had passed since the organization of the schools, when the largely increased number in attendance made it absolutely necessary that additional provisions should be made for the care and instruction of the children. To this end, and with the permission of his Ordinary, Father Kundig went East, with a view to securing a sufficient number of School Sisters from the convent at Emmitsburg, Maryland, to satisfactorily conduct the business. In this he was successful, six members of the Order returning with him to Milwaukee, where they at once took up their temporary residence in a dwelling at 595 Jefferson street. As soon as settled, they began the work of education, continuing to conduct the classes in the basement of St. Peter's Church, where Catholics and Protestants alike were received for instruction. The fees for an education at that time were remarkably small, amounting to from two to four dollars a quarter. But the thoroughness of the teaching and the beneficial results obtained from the careful administration of the Sisters, soon gave to the institution a reputation which is maintained in the schools to the present day. For seven years this school, which was then known as St. Joseph's Select Academy for girls only, was conducted in the basement of St. Peter's Church, but at the end of that period removed to Van Buren street into a partially completed building, to which the Sisters added as their means permitted. A year later the Brown property was purchased, to which the Sisters removed.

It was in the year 1872 that Father Kundig took still another forward step in the interests of education, by erecting Bishop's Hall for the boys' school, which was founded in 1857, and was, at the time of its inception, as well as some considerable time following, in charge of the Sisters. About a year later, a band of Brothers of the Holy Cross came from Notre Dame, Indiana, and located in Milwaukee, taking charge of the boys' school. These were five in number, who were under the leadership and guidance of Brother Camillus, C. S. C., Superior, who was subsequently succeeded in that office by Brothers Gabriel, Philemon and Cyprian, each of whom is still gratefully remembered for the deeds of good and of beneficence performed by them during the periods of their administration. The Brothers of the Holy Cross remained in charge of the boys' school until 1895, when the Dominican Sisters came from Sinsinawa Mound, in Grant County, and under the direction of Sister Camilla, Superioress, relieved them of that duty.

A notable event in the annals of education transpired during the earlier administration of the Brothers, and which undoubtedly marks an epoch in the school history of the Archdiocese. During 1873 the entire school was held in one building on Van Buren street, the boys and girls being taught in separate apartments. Two years later, that is, in August, 1875, when Father Keogh took charge of the schools, Sister Bernardine assumed control of the senior department. In 1879 the Sisters removed to their present quarters on Van Buren street. Two years later Sister Bernardine became Superioress, and in the same year the schools were made free, the former tuition fee of fifty cents per month being abandoned.

Connected with this school, was an Orphan Asylum, which was first established on Jackson street, where it remained for many years in charge of the Sisters, and in fact until 1888, when it was transferred to its present location at North Point. Additional zest was given to school affairs in 1893, in September of which year a High School for girls was opened. This department has proved exceptionally successful, there being twenty-five young ladies under direction of the Sisters in charge. Taken together, there are in the neighborhood of seven hundred scholars in the entire school, all of whom are given the advantage of an education which follows out a line of instruction corresponding with that observed in the city schools, and, therefore, there being eight grades, graduates are entitled to enter the High Schools on diplomas issued by the faculty of the Cathedral school.

The Dominican Sisters at present in charge of the Boys' department are, Mary Leo, Superioress, and Sisters Seraphica, Mary Alacoque, Daniela, Victorine, Matthias, Mary Nicholas, Aurelia, Angelico, Bertranda, Baptista and Leocadia. The Sisters of Charity in charge of the Girls' school are, Sister Bernardine, Superioress, and Sisters Gertrude, Felicitas, Mary Vincent, Ambrose, Margaret, Emily, Zita, Mary Joseph, Aloysia and Josephine.

Of the more recent labors of Father Keogh and the good accomplished by him as rector of the parish, a slight idea may, perhaps, be obtained by briefly reviewing the parochial statement of expenses incurred, and the object to which they were applied. We learn, then, that from 1885 until 1895, a period of ten years, a total amount of $78,043.44 has been applied on improvements and additions to the Cathedral property. Of this amount, $27,500.00 was expended between the years 1885 and 1892; $5,500.00 being employed for house improvements; $12,000.00 used in the purchase of property, and $10,000.00 in rebuilding the girls' school. Of the remainder of the total amount, $50,543.44, which was expended in improvements during the years 1892-93-94, an itemized account is given, the principal features of which are as follows: Brothers' house, $6,960.96; Cathedral tower, $15,844.54; frescoing, $6,250.00; rebuilding and enlarging organ, $4,200.00; vestibule, $3,361.25; new pews, $2,166.00; electric light, installation and fixtures, $1,409.58; new roof on Cathedral, $1,296.96; new roof on Sisters' house, $372.92; new roof on pastor's house and painting Bishops' hall, $471.51; renovating and covering steam pipes, $389.37; general repairs and improvements in 1892, $839.72; new floor in Cathedral, etc., in 1893, $1,001.48; other and sundry improvements, $19,079.25.

The present assistant pastors at St. John's Cathedral are the Rev. David J. O'Hearn and the Rev. M. J. Huston. The former is a native of Milwaukee, where, with the exception of the years he spent at college, he has lived all his life. His elementary education was acquired at the Cathedral schools, after which he entered St. Francis' Seminary, near Milwaukee, in 1882. Having completed the necessary course of studies at that institution, he was ordained to the priesthood in 1889, after which, having decided to take a higher post-graduate course in theology, he spent three years at the Catholic University at Washington, D. C., at that time an institution but recently founded. Father O'Hearn assumed his present duties as assistant pastor of St. John's Cathedral in 1892.

Father M. J. Huston was born in Ireland, which country he left for the United States while still a very young man. His earlier education was acquired at the schools of his native country, but he completed his studies for the priesthood and was ordained a priest at St. Francis' Seminary, near Milwaukee, in 1893. In the year of his ordination, he was appointed assistant pastor at St. John's Cathedral, which position he still occupies.

Of others who have filled like positions, there are the Rev. William Mahoney, who acquired his philosophical and theological education at St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore, where he proved a proficient and brilliant scholar. He was of a decided literary turn of mind, and during his somewhat brief, though busy career, wrote a number of books. After laboring in his calling for a few years in the East, Father Mahoney was appointed to a pastorate at Cedarburg, from which place, where he spent a number of years, he was transferred to a parish in Minnesota. He came to Milwaukee in March, 1881, as assistant at St. John's Cathedral, remaining as such until October, 1884. He then went to Dakota, where he died a few years later, as a result of over-application. A work of Father Mahoney's which called for more than passing comment, was a book entitled "Rights of the Clergy Vindicated," a plea for the establishment of a canonical law. This work caused quite a sensation at the time, being regarded as somewhat premature, although later years have developed the fact that he had evidently arrived at a perfect understanding of what would naturally be the outcome of the then existing conditions. He was regarded as one of the most brilliant men of his calling in the West, and was an energetic and tireless worker.

Another of the assistant pastors at St. John's' was the Rev. William F. McGill, present rector of Holy Solomon Juneau.

Laurent Solomon Juneau, pioneer settler, who donated considerable property and means to the Catholic cause in Milwaukee. Born at L'Assumption Parish, near Montreal, Canada, August 9, 1798, came to Milwaukee in September, 1818, and died at Shawano, Wisconsin, November 14, 1856. On the 28th of the same month his remains were removed to Milwaukee and buried in the old cemetery on Spring Street. Later, they were transferred to Calvary Cemetery where they now rest.

Rosary Church, Milwaukee. He assumed his position at the Cathedral in February, 1879, remaining as such until 1885. Father John Naughtin, present rector of St. Raphael's Church, Madison, was another and very popular member of the Cathedral clergy. He was appointed as assistant pastor at St. John's in 1884, and remained as such until 1892. Still another is the Rev. John T. Morrissey, now rector of St. John's Church, South Oshkosh. He was appointed assistant pastor of St. John's Cathedral in 1886, and remained as such for seven years.

An imposing ceremony was witnessed in the presence of several thousands at St. John's on Sunday, December 5, 1897, it being the fiftieth anniversary of the Cathedral. It was naturally an occasion of great rejoicing to the rector, Father Keogh, who had been for many years identified with the spiritual and material welfare of the parish, as well as to the Most Rev. Archbishop Katzer, who, since his elevation to the Archiepiscopate, has brought himself into such close and friendly relations with the clergy and people who are under his care. Of his own sentiments as regards the matter, the Archbishop spoke most feelingly, when, after having celebrated Pontifical Mass, he remarked: "I have just celebrated this solemn Mass of thanksgiving, and I have, indeed, endeavored, both in your name and in mine, to give thanks to God Almighty from the depths of my soul for all the favors bestowed upon this Diocese and this Congregation in the past fifty years, and for all the good which has been accomplished through the erection of this See and this Cathedral, and in this Church, by its Bishop, the indefatigable labors of its pastors, and the exemplary and most faithful coöperation of its parishioners. I have asked the dear Father if it is to be His adorable Providence to allow this venerable building to stand for many years to come, as a monument of the courage and energy and hardships undergone of the pioneer Bishop of Wisconsin, and as a place in which His own greater glory and salvation of men will be worked out."

A large number of ecclesiastical dignitaries were present at the celebration, among whom, besides the Most Rev. Archbishop F. X. Katzer, were the Most Rev. John Ireland, of St. Paul, Minn.; Bishops John Vertin, D. D., of Marquette, Mich.; John Hennessey, D. D., of Wichita, Kan.; John Shanley, D. D., of Fargo, N. Dak.; Joseph Cotter, D. D., of Winona, Minn.; James McGoldrick, D. D., of Duluth, Minn.; S. G. Messmer, D. D., of Green Bay, Wis.; Thomas O'Gorman, Sioux Falls, Ia.; and the Revs. P. M. Abbelen, of this city; J. Rainer, of St. Francis; H. F. Fairbanks, L. Bushart, S. J., William McGill, P. H. Durnin, H. Willmes, F. C. Ryan, A. F. Schinner, A. Hayden, S. J., George Durnin, J. J. Ryan, M. J. Huston, David J. O'Hearn, of Milwaukee; John M. Naughtin, of Madison, Wis.; James Cleary, of Minneapolis, Minn.; John Morrissey, of Oshkosh, Wis.; J. Selinger, D. D., J. S. La Boule, Richard Smith, J. J. Ryan, N. Kersten, of St. Francis; Thomas Flynn, of Madison, S. Dak.; E. J. Blackwell, of Fox Lake, Wis.; Thomas Fagan and Stephen Trant, of Racine; Charles F. Becker, S. Lebl, D. D., Louis Peschong, of St. Francis; Francis Schmit, of Milwaukee.

Of Catholic organizations in St. John's parish, to some of which a majority of the members belong, there are the following: Cathedral Choir: Raphael Baez, organist and director; Miss M. L. Furlong, president; Miss Alice Furlong, secretary; George Howe, treasurer; E. L. Byron, librarian. Cathedral Choral Society: Raphael Baez, conductor; Miss Ellen T. Aylward, president; Benjamin J. Dela Hunt, vice-president; Miss Clara Phillips, secretary; Fred Calhoun, treasurer; Miss Mary Mittendorf, librarian. Cecilian Choir: Miss Ellen Aylward, organist and teacher; Elizabeth Roache, president; Miss Lucy Bilo, vice-president; Miss Agnes Chambers, secretary. St. Ann's Church, Milwaukee.

A FEW years ago, the Catholic residents in the northwestern part of the city of Milwaukee had increased so rapidly that it became necessary to prepare for the establishment of an additional parish in that locality. As a result of this remarkable growth, a number of Catholic families, formerly belonging to St. Michael's congregation, concluded to purchase a tract of land on the corner of Wright and Thirty-sixth streets, upon which to erect a church and school house, while a spacious dwelling house, being part of the property acquired, serves up to the present time as a parsonage. In the fall of 1894 work was begun on a structure to be used for the dual purpose of church and school. The corner-stone of this building was laid November 17th of that year by Mgr. A. Zeininger, and in the spring of 1895 the building was completed and dedicated on May 19th by the Rev. A. F. Schinner, present secretary to Archbishop Katzer, but at that time administrator of the Archdiocese of Milwaukee. The first floor of this building is used for a school, while the second has been finished off and furnished for a church.

The first resident pastor appointed to the charge of St. Ann's was the Rev. August B. Salick, who still maintains that position. At the present time, the congregation numbers about two hundred and seventy-five families, while the parochial school, which is in charge of Sisters of Notre Dame, has an average attendance of two hundred and seventy-five pupils. The present trustees of the congregation are Anthony Ewens and Jacob Hausmann.

The Rev. August B. Salick, rector of St. Ann's, was born July 29, 1859, at Watertown, Wisconsin. After acquiring an ordinary school education, he entered the Seminary of St. Francis, near Milwaukee, at which place, after having completed the necessary course of study, he was ordained to the priesthood on June 24, 1884. He was then appointed as assistant pastor to the Rev. J. Holzhauer, of St. Joseph's congregation, Milwaukee, and afterwards taught at Pio Nono College from 1885 to 1888, and was made rector of SS. Peter and Paul's congregation at Addison, Wisconsin, where he remained until April, 1895, when he was transferred to his present pastorate.

St. Anthony's Church, Milwaukee.

THE organization of this parish took place in 1872, it being the second German congregation established on the south side in Milwaukee. The organization was perfected by the Rev. A. Decker, assistant pastor to the Rev. L. Conrad of Holy Trinity Church, who was commissioned by Bishop Henni to organize a new congregation from those Catholic families living in the extreme southwest portion of the city. In this work he was ably assisted by Father Conrad. It was in April, 1872, after the work of organization had been well begun, that ten lots were purchased on the corner of Mitchell street and Fourth avenue, for which $3,000 was paid, and at a meeting held subsequently it was decided to erect upon this property a two-story building, 44x80 feet, to be used for a school as well as a church. On the completion of this structure, and thereafter until November, 1882, services were held regularly in the second story of the building, which had been fitted up especially for church purposes. In spite of every economy, however, the expenses incurred by the congregation for the first eighteen months amounted to $15,000. The first service was held on Nov. 3, 1872, some three months prior to which work was begun on a two-story frame parsonage, 22x44 feet. A parochial school was opened in connection with this congregation on Nov. 18th, the attendance at this time numbering one hundred and forty children. The foundation for the first church was laid in 1877, the building being completed in 1881 and 1882.

On and after Nov. 19th of the latter year, regular

Sunday services were held in the new church, although the arrangements of the interior were to a considerable extent incomplete. The building, however, was entirely finished in 1886, from which time services have been held there daily. In 1891 the old school building was thoroughly renovated and at the same time an additional wing was added to that building. At present it is still incomplete, but when finished will have a front on Mitchell street of 109 feet and on Fifth Avenue of 111 feet. The building will be divided into sixteen school rooms, in addition to which there will be a hall 50x80 feet. Of the interior furnishings of the church the stations cost $83.00, the pulpit $800.00, the main altar $3,600 and the organ $3,600; besides this, a hot water heating apparatus necessitated a further outlay of $2,500. The entire expense of St. Anthony's congregation, in the construction and furnishing of the church and other buildings, occupying the period from April 20, 1872, to January 1, 1896, amounted to $206,000. Of this sum the congregation received $2,500 from outside benefactors. Since 1892, however, the entire parish expenses have been provided for by the immediate members of the congregation. An additional value was given to the church property of this parish in 1896, when an elegant parsonage was erected on the south side of the church. At the present time the congregation of St. Anthony numbers in the neighborhood of seven hundred and fifty families, while the parochial school has a regular average attendance of eight hundred children, who are in charge of one lay teacher and ten Sisters of Notre Dame Convent. Since Father Decker assumed the pastorate of St. Anthony's he has been assisted successively by the following reverend gentlemen: Rev. J. M. Kasel, seven years; the Rev. Father Bach, ten months, and the Rev. J. P. Pierron, now professor at St. Francis Seminary, and the Rev. J. Schlitz, who is the present assistant. Catholic societies connected with this congregation are: St. Anthony's Society, organized in 1872; Sacred Heart of Jesus Society, St. Augustine's Society; St. Michael's Society, Married Ladies' Society, and Young Ladies' Society.

The Rev. Anton Isidore Decker was born December 27, 1844, at Folscheid, Luxemburg. On August 10, 1846, he came to America with his parents, who bought a farm near Dacada, Ozaukee County, Wisconsin, where Father Decker spent his early life. He prepared himself for the priesthood at St. Francis Seminary, where he was ordained priest December 20, 1871, by Bishop John Martin Henni. He said his first Mass on Christmas day, 1871, at St. Nicholas Church, Dacada, Sheboygan County, Wisconsin, and then was appointed assistant priest to the Rev. L. Conrad of Holy Trinity Church, Milwaukee, with whom he remained until 1872, when he was commissioned to organize St. Anthony's congregation, of which he was afterwards made pastor. Since that time he has worked zealously for the welfare of his flock. December 25, 1896, he celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary in priesthood. Father Decker is a hard and conscientious worker and has brought his congregation to a most promising condition.

St. Augustine's Church, Milwaukee.

THE site selected for the Church of St. Augustine was purchased on or about June 12, 1887, the congregation being incorporated on the 17th of the same month. The present pastor, the Rev. P. A. Schumacher, was first appointed to this charge in February, but did not assume his duties as such until August 16, 1888. The church was dedicated by the Most Rev. Archbishop M. Heiss and the congregation actually established on September 23, 1888. The structure not yet being finished, the first Mass was celebrated in one of the unfinished school rooms, August 25. A new bell for the church was also consecrated on the afternoon of the same day. Two days later a parochial school was opened, the attendance at that time numbering eighty scholars, who were in charge of two Sisters. In March, 1889, the interior of the church was frescoed throughout and two side altars added. The original trustees of St. Augustine's congregation were: Messrs. Adam Krill, August Hermes and Elias Stollenwerk. There are now two hundred and ten families in the congregation, and the school, in charge of four Sisters of Notre Dame, has an enrollment of two hundred and twenty-eight scholars. The following Catholic societies are represented in the congregation: St. Mary's Altar Sodality, organized January, 1888; reorganized September, 1888, ninety-seven members; St. Peter's Benevolent came with his parents to America in 1856, and entered the Seminary at St. Francis, near Milwaukee, in 1864, where, after completing his studies, he was ordained to the priesthood on December 18, 1869. He celebrated his first Mass in Holy Cross, Wis., on Christmas of the same year, and was appointed pastor of Newburg and missions on January 6, 1870. On March 18, 1871, he was transferred to St. Kilian, Wis., where he remained for six years, finally resigning to accept the pastorate of Waterford, where he built a new church. From there he was called to Milwaukee, to take charge of the new congregation of St. Augustine.

St. Boniface's Church, Milwaukee.

THE parish of St. Boniface, which is located in the northeastern part of the city of Milwaukee, was organized by the Rev. Leopold Drexel in 1888, the site selected being on Eleventh street near Center. Here a suitable brick building was erected, the first floor of which was used for school purposes and as a pastoral dwelling, while the upper story was finished off and arranged for a church. A few years later, the congregation having by this time assumed a reasonably prosperous and healthy condition, a large frame building was erected, which is being used for school purposes. The parish of St. Boniface at the present time consists of about five hundred families, while the parochial school, which is under the direction of Sisters of Notre Dame, has a regular attendance of more than five hundred scholars.

Father Drexel, who promoted and organized this congregation, remained as its pastor until 1892, when he was called to a professorship in the Salesianum at St. Francis, he being succeeded in the pastorate of St. Boniface by the Rev. J. H. Koetting, who is still in charge. Father J. Henry Koetting was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, attended parochial school in Milwaukee, and received a classical education at St. Louis University, St. Louis, Missouri. Early in the '80's, however, he entered St. Francis' Seminary, where, after completing the necessary courses, he was ordained to the priesthood in 1885. Following ordination, he was for several years secretary to Archbishop Heiss, remaining as such, in fact, until appointed to his present charge.

St. Casimir's Church and School, Milwaukee.

ON September 11, 1893, lots were purchased on the corner of Bremen and Clarke streets in the city of Milwaukee, and on July 11 of the following year the erection of a large building was begun. This building, intended eventually solely for school purposes, was so constructed that it might, for the time being, be used both as school and church. On November 11, 1894, the building was blessed by the Most Rev. Archbishop F. X. Katzer, and it may be said that since that day the parish of St. Casimir has been in existence. The first priest appointed to this congregation was the Rev. Aegidius Tarasiewicz, who in the first year of his pastorate began the erection of a church at an expense of $6,500. In January, 1895, he bought three bells for $1,644, and on July 11, 1896, purchased a house and lot for the school Sisters. There are now four hundred families in the congregation. The school, with an attendance of about five hundred and twenty, is in charge of six Sisters of Notre Dame. The first society in this congregation—that of St. Casimir's—was organized on December 14, 1894, with a membership of two hundred and fifty. The president of this society is John Kosindworski; secretary, Frank Herkorski, and treasurer, John Schramka. The Knights of St. Ladislaus are also represented, with L. Pozoeski as captain and F. Kosecki and F. Herkorski as first and second officers. Besides these, there are the St. Stanislaus Society for Young Men and Boys, the Society of the Holy Rosary and Young Ladies' Sodality.

The Rev. Aegidius Tarasiewicz was born on August 29, 1852, at Lipsk, Poland (Russia), his parents being Paul and Elizabeth (Bartoszewicz) Tarasiewicz. His earlier education was obtained in the school and gymnasium of his native place, from whence, after several years of diligent study, he went to the city of Augustowo, in the educational institutions of which he entered upon his classical and philosophical course. When about twenty-one years of age, that is in 1873, he entered the Russian army, serving with the same for three years. At the expiration of that period he retired from a military career and removed to Rome, Italy, where he remained in further pursuit of his studies for the priesthood for over five years. From Rome he came to America in 1881, arriving at Chicago on June 3 of that year. He then went to Canada, where he entered St. Francis' College, at Berlin, Ontario, where he completed his course in theology and afterwards served as professor. He was ordained to the priesthood at Chicago on September 12, 1886, and remained there until the latter part of 1889, when he removed to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and became assistant pastor of St. Hedwig's Church. After serving in that capacity for nearly five years, he was appointed pastor of St. Casimir's congregation upon its organization in 1893.

SS. Cyril and Method's Church, Milwaukee.

THE SS. Cyril and Method's Polish congregation, corner of American and Windlake avenues, Milwaukee, was organized by the present pastor, Father J. F. Szukalski, on May 11, 1893. At the time of the establishment it drew its strength principally from the congregation of St. Hyacinth and St. Josaphat. It is now in a very satisfactory and prosperous condition and consists of about four hundred families. The parochial school, which was started at about the same time, is in care of a lay teacher and five Sisters of Notre Dame. The present enrollment numbers four hundred and fifty, for the accommodation of whom eight class rooms are necessary. The St. Cecilia Choir, St. John's Society, Branch No. 159, Catholic Knights of Wisconsin, Polish Cadets, St. Barbara's Young Ladies' Sodality, and Married Ladies' Rosary Society, are the Catholic societies connected with this congregation.

The Rev. John F. Szukalski was born in the German part of Poland, in 1853. He came to this country with his parents in 1868, and settled in Manitowoc County, Church of St. Francis of Assisi, Milwaukee.

THE site on which the church and monastery stand was purchased August 24, 1865, by Rev. Bonaventura Frey, O. M. Cap., now Provincial of the Order, who had been sent to this city by the Rev. Francis Haas, O. M. Cap., Commissary of the Order, at Mt. Calvary, Wis., to collect means for acquiring the grounds and erecting a monastery in which the students of the Order might pursue their theological studies and receive Holy Orders. Father Bonaventura being soon after sent to New York on more urgent duties, the project of building a monastery at Milwaukee was abandoned until July, 1869, when the Rev. Ivo Prass, O. M. Cap., arrived from Mt. Calvary to revive and carry into effect the plan of his predecessor. On July 7th of that year, Father Ivo laid the corner-stone of the monastery, which building occupied an area 107x30 feet.

The chapel attached was 66x22 feet. These buildings were dedicated December 8, 1869.

Whilst the monastery was in course of erection, Father Ivo was repeatedly requested to organize a parish.

Rev. Ign. Ullrich,

At last, when a petition of one hundred and seventeen names was presented, he gave his consent, and with the permission of Bishop Henni, in June, 1870, erected a frame church which had seating capacity for six hundred persons. This building was dedicated July 21, 1870. In 1871 the southern wing was added to the monastery, and a frame structure built to serve as a parochial school.

On February 6, 1873, the Rev. Lawrence Vorwerk, O. M. Cap., became guardian of the monastery and ex-officio rector of the church. During the fall of 1876 he caused the erection of a new church of brick and cut stone, which was in the purely Roman style of architecture and after plans by Mr. Wm. Schickel of New York. The interior was tastefully decorated by A. Muer of the same city, and adorned with several historical paintings from the brush of the artist Wm. Lamprecht of Brooklyn, N. Y. The entire cost of the building was $42,000, although the harmony of the dimensions and the purity of the decorations are such that this church has been estimated at almost twice that value. It was dedicated Feb. 8, 1877, by the Most Rev. Archbishop Henni, who, after the consecration of the altar, celebrated Pontifical High Mass in the presence of the Rt. Rev. F. X. Krautbauer, Bishop of Green Bay, the Rt. Rev. S. Seidenbusch, Bishop of St. Cloud, and about forty priests. The old church was moved beside the school house, alterations being made in it so as to provide additional room for the scholars. On July 8, 1878, Rev. Anthony Rottensteiner superseded Father Lawrence as rector of the church. He was followed by Rev. Luke Rasch, O. M. Cap., on October 19, 1882, who was in turn succeeded by the Rev. Jerome Henkel, O. M. Cap., on October 15, 1885.

On the 15th of March, 1888, the Rev. Ignatius Ullrich, the present[1] pastor, took charge of the parish. He was born December 4, 1847, at Tuttweiler, Bavaria, and came to this country in his early boyhood. Here he attended the parochial schools of Brooklyn, N. Y., until he entered St. Vincent's College in Pennsylvania, December 25, 1870. He received the habit of the Capuchin Order at Mt. Calvary, Wis., and continued his studies there, and later at the monastery in Milwaukee, where he was ordained Sept. 21, 1877. Father Ullrich had already held several important charges in the Order, when he was called to his present position.

On August 18, 1889, a new and spacious school was dedicated, costing about $28,000. In 1892 a third wing was added to the monastery, 113x29 feet, thus completing the square formed by the church and convent. On April 19, 1893, an incendiary fire destroyed part of the church, a total loss only being avoided through the extraordinary efforts of the fire department. The damages, as it was, amounted to $10,000, the entire church having to be redecorated. At about this time a new altar was placed in St. Anthony's Chapel, much visited on Tuesdays by the clients of St. Anthony, and a series of historical paintings representing the most important events in the life of St. Francis, by the artist, Wm. Lambrecht. The church is considered one of the most beautiful in the State. The fathers of the monastery aid the pastor in his ministry, besides, whenever necessary, assisting those of the several parishes in the city. They are also engaged in missionary work, and the records of many parishes in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Illinois, Iowa, and Michigan, give evidence of their labors.

The congregation at present consists of six hundred families, and the parochial school has an attendance of eight hundred and forty pupils. Attached to the church is also the Clericate or House of Studies for the Province of St. Joseph of the Capuchins, where there are at

The Rev. Alphonsus Baeumle, guardian of the Franciscan Convent, Milwaukee, and who succeeded Father Ullrich in charge of the congregation of St. Francis of Assissi in September, 1897, was born in Milwaukee in 1856. After attending the parochial school of St. Joseph's congregation in that city until his fourteenth year, he entered the Capuchin Order, where he completed an entire course of the studies prescribed, and was ordained to the priesthood in 1879. Father Baeumle celebrated his first Mass in the Capuchin church at Milwaukee, the sermon on that occasion being delivered by the Rev. H. J. Holzhauer. He then became a professor at St. Lawrence College at Mt. Calvary, and was also for several years rector of that institution, in which position he showed unusual qualifications. He was appointed guardian of the Franciscan Convent in Milwaukee, in September, 1897.

The Gesu Church, Milwaukee.

IT was just fifty years ago that Bishop John Martin Henni established the original organization of this church community in Milwaukee, and the records show that at that time he purchased some lots on the corner of Third and Sycamore streets, upon which was erected a modest frame church. This building was completed and dedicated in honor of St. Gall, during the month of October, 1849. The congregation of St. Gall's at that time consisted of the English-speaking population residing on the south and west sides of Milwaukee, their spiritual wants being attended to by the Rev. Father Beauprey and his assistant, Father P. Callanan, the former having been appointed as first resident pastor of the new congregation. During the succeeding year Father Beauprey was succeeded by the Rev. Father Bradley, who had for his assistant the Rev. Edward Putnam. In October of the same year—that is, 1850—the Rev. M. E. Smith took charge of the parish, remaining until May, 1851. His successor was the Rev. Joseph Smith, whose administration lasted until September, 1852. In that year, Father Beauprey became a victim of the cholera epidemic, which at that time prevailed to an alarming extent throughout the West. Father Smith was followed successively by the Rev. W. O'Brien and John Norris, D. D., each of whom, however, stayed but for a few months. Then from January until August, 1853, the Rev. James M. Doyle had charge of the parish. For a short period following his departure, the Rev. Fathers Lynch and Kendeler fulfilled the necessary duties of the pastorate, after which the Rev. Charles Tierney became incumbent, remaining from October, 1853, to January, 1854. From the following April to June, 1855, Father Keenan administered the duties, the interval between his arrival and the departure of his predecessor being supplied by Fathers John Norris and Bonduel. In June, 1855, the Rev. Father Kundig became pastor of St. Gall's and remained until September 14, on which date the church and parish were transferred by Bishop Henni to the care of the Jesuits, Fathers F. J. De Smet and F. X. De Coen taking possession of the property in the name of that Order. The circumstances connected with this change of ownership and by means of which the property passed into the hands of the Jesuits, were as follows: While visiting Europe in 1848, in the interests of his Diocese, Bishop Henni met the Chevalier J. G. De Boeye, of Antwerp, Belgium, who proffered him as a gift some $16,000 with which to endow an institution to be governed and directed by the Jesuits. Five years later the Jesuit Fathers J. L. Gleigel and I. J. Boudreaux, while holding a Mission at St. John's Cathedral in Milwaukee, were informed of this project by the Bishop, and gladly acceded to his request to bring the matter to a successful termination. Having first decided that this institution should be devoted entirely to the teaching of the higher branches, a portion of the funds already at command were therefore applied to the purchase of a number of lots in block 199 of the Second Ward, and again, in 1863, a further purchase of property adjacent to that already secured was made, thus giving to the Order the entire block which is to-day bounded by State, Prairie, Tenth and Eleventh streets. Some little time prior to this Father De Smet was succeeded by the Rev. Dionysius Kenny. Before that time, however, or, to be more particular, in 1857, a brick residence was completed for the use of the Society, the old one being removed to another part of the property, where it was raised one story and used for school purposes, being known as St. Aloysius' Academy. Another change was made in the administration of the parish in 1861, when Father Lalumiere, S. J., and Father Beckwith, S. J., took charge. In August, 1863, Father Beckwith died, thus ending a zealous and benevolent career of many years' standing. His successor as assistant pastor was the Rev. Ignatius Maes, who remained until April 20, 1871, when he also died. From this time on and until 1880 the position of assistant pastor was at various times filled by the Rev. Fathers Nogues, Sweere, Masselies, James G. Walsh, Diels, Garesche, Charropin and Korpman.

In the year 1868, the Jesuits began the erection of a church, the corner-stone of which was laid during October of the same year. This structure was built in the Byzantine style, of Milwaukee brick, and was 170 feet in length, 70 feet in width and 90 feet in height. The extreme distance from the ground to the top of the cross which surmounts the spire is just 214 feet. The building was capitally arranged within, offering an unobstructed view of the altars and pulpit from all points and affording comfortable seating facilities for over one thousand people. The church was finally dedicated with most impressive ceremonies, on March 6, 1870, by the Rev. Martin Kundig, then Vicar-General, assisted by a number of priests, as well as the students of the Salesianum. The sermon on this notable occasion was delivered by the Rev. Father Garesche. At the time of its completion this church was one of the largest and most costly in the State, it having been built at an expense of $95,000.

The Gesu Church, Milwaukee.

While the church was in the course of completion, the educational interests of the community were also receiving a due amount of attention at the hands of the zealous priesthood. Thus, as a temple of learning, as has already been noted, the original residence of the Fathers, removed, enlarged and thoroughly renovated throughout, served its purpose well, until 1864, when a new and altogether more appropriate building was substituted. For a greater portion of the period here referred to instruction was given by the Jesuit Fathers and Candidates of the Order under the immediate supervision of Father Lalumiere. Nor was this merely a primary school, as the course there taken covered a period of several years, in which considerable knowledge of the classics as well as of rhetoric was obtained.

During the summer of 1870 the old frame church was remodeled into a two-story frame structure and used as a school for girls. This new departure, which proved an unquestionable success from its very beginning, was placed in charge of School Sisters of Notre Dame Convent, the first term commencing in September of the same year.

In 1875 a new frame church and schoolhouse were built by the Jesuits, in the Second Ward, on a portion of the property purchased by the Order in 1855. This church was dedicated in honor of the Holy Name, in October, 1875, and the school was placed in charge of Sisters of Notre Dame, and was opened during the same year. The first pastor appointed to attend the congregation of the Holy Name was the Rev. Father Van Goch, who remained until 1877, when he was succeeded by Father Logal. He was followed in 1878 by Father James Walsh.

The corner-stone of Marquette College was laid on August 15, 1880, by Archbishop Heiss of Milwaukee, who on that occasion was assisted by a large number of priests. The occasion was one of unusual interest to the Catholics of the Diocese, and the brilliant and impressive ceremonies were witnessed by a vast concourse of people. A year later the college building was completed, blessed and its doors thrown open for the reception of students. For the first year the faculty of Marquette College consisted of five professors, the Rev. Jos. F. Rigge being president. These professors also administered to the spiritual wants of the parishioners of the Holy Name. During this period, and, in fact, until 1887, Father Lalumiere continued pastor of St. Gall's, when he became president of Marquette College and rector of the Holy Name congregation, and as such he remained until November 11, 1889, when the Rev. Joseph Grimmelsman assumed the duties of this office, in which he was assisted by fourteen professors. Two years later he was succeeded by the Rev. R. J. Meyer and he in turn by the present incumbent, the Rev. Leopold Bushart. Upon Father Bushart's assumption of the office, Father Lalumiere was transferred to the pastorate of the Holy Name, the Rev. Father J. D. Foley becoming pastor of St. Gall's congregation.

During the year 1892 steps were taken towards the erection of a beautiful and stately church edifice on Grand Avenue, the site selected for that purpose being on the corner of the Avenue and Twelfth street. This was done with a view of combining the two congregations. This proposition meeting with the hearty approval of clergy and laity alike, the church property on Sycamore street was sold and the erection of Gesu Church at once begun. On May 21, 1893, the corner-stone of this magnificent edifice was laid by Archbishop Katzer, assisted by a large number of priests. The ceremonies were most imposing, some hundred Catholic societies being in the procession which marched to the place where they were performed. The festival sermon on this occasion was delivered by the Rt. Rev. Thomas A. Burke, Bishop of Albany, N. Y. On October 21, 1894, divine services were held for the last time at St. Gall's, when Archbishop Katzer celebrated Pontifical High Mass. From that date until the dedication of Gesu Church services were held in the chapel of St. Gall's. The new edifice was duly dedicated by the Archbishop December 16, 1894, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Father Fitzgerald, S. J.

Gesu is at once one of the largest and most imposing church structures in the West. In architectural design it is purely Gothic, the strength of that particularly beautiful style being considerably enhanced by a grandly sweeping frontage of 150 feet. The front is flanked by two towers, one of which rises to a height of 250 feet, the other 215 feet. Between the two is the main gable, which is ornamented with a magnificent rose window. In the center of the front is the main entrance, which is made through a projecting vestibule. The front of this vestibule is composed of three Gothic arches, the one in the middle being larger than those on either side. These are supported by clusters of granite columns, there being four in each cluster. The arches and walls are of richly ornamented cut Bedford limestone. Behind the arches is a flight of stairs, 48 feet wide, by which an entrance to the body of the church is made. On entering the church, the eye is greeted by a view of the long nave, which is flanked on either side by massive granite columns with richly decorated capitals and heavy moulded bases, covered by a ribbed and vaulted ceiling beautifully painted and ending in a deeply recessed sanctuary where a magnificent altar stands revealed by the softened lights falling upon it from the windows above. The nave is 50 by 138 feet and 70 feet high; the transept is 50 by 120 feet and 36 feet deep. The granite columns between the nave and aisles are monoliths 18½ feet high and 2½ feet in diameter. The four standing at the intersection of the nave and transept are 3½ feet in diameter. They stand on moulded bases and are crowned with heavy capitals from which spring the arches of the clere-story wall and the ribs of the ceiling. The ceiling of the nave is vaulted to the sills of the clere-story windows. Over these windows the ceilings are vaulted, intersecting the nave ceiling at right angles, and thus producing a series of groined arches. These are heavily ribbed and ornamented at the point of intersection. The aisles are each 18 feet in width and 65 feet long, their ceilings, which are 37 feet high, being decorated with scenes of Biblical portent. The choir gallery and organ loft are in the front of the church and immediately over the entrance. The former occupies a space 30 by 48 feet, and in front of it is a sloping gallery 85 feet wide and 16 feet deep.

There are five altars, the main one being in the sanctuary and two in each transept. There is a sacristy to the rear of the side altars connecting directly with the sanctuary. The floors of the church are of marble and the walls are wainscoted in the same material to the height of the window sills. The foundation of the entire structure is a solid square of stone and concrete, 50 by 50 feet and 8 feet thick. The total width of the interior of the building is 125 feet and the length 200 feet.

The Gesu congregation has for its pastor the Rev. James D. Foley,[1] S. J., he being assisted in the multitudinous duties devolving upon him by the Revs. F. A. Moeller, S. J., and A. Hayden, S. J. There are about seven hundred families in the congregation. The parochial school connected with this church is conducted by eleven School Sisters of Notre Dame Convent, who are under the immediate direction of the Rev. William F. Hoffend. S. J. The regular attendance at this school numbers seven hundred.

Of Catholic societies in the Gesu congregation, there are the following: Married Men's Sodality, seventy-eight members, the Rev. A. Hayden, S. J., spiritual director, James O'Connor, prefect, Edward Mellon, secretary; Married Ladies' Sodality, three hundred and forty members, the Rev. James D. Foley, S. J., spiritual director, Mrs. J. J. Oswald, prefect, Mrs. James A. Goetz, secretary, Mrs. J. W. Martin, treasurer; Young Men's Sodality, two hundred and eighty-seven members, the Rev. H. Calmer, S. J., spiritual director, A. J. Smith, prefect, Thos. E. Merrity and A. E. Muth, secretaries, James Conroy, treasurer; Young Ladies' Sodality, three hundred and thirty-four members, the Rev. Ferdinand A. Moeller, S. J., spiritual director, Miss Kate McCabe, prefect, Miss Frances Dolan, secretary, Miss Annie Goetz, treasurer; St. Thomas Society, one hundred and fifty-eight members, the Rev. William Hoffend, S. J., spiritual director, Valentine Zimmerman, president, Francis J. Maguire, corresponding secretary, Joseph Weber, financial secretary, James Conroy, treasurer; Gesu Altar Society, one hundred and ninety members, the Rev. James D. Foley, director; Gesu Sanctuary Society, forty-one members, the Rev. James D. Foley, S. J., director, Mrs. Robert A. Johnston, president, Mrs. W. Denning, secretary, Mrs. Charles Schuetz, treasurer; St. John's Society, sixty members, Mr. Albert F. X. Esterman, S. J., president, Henry F. McCann, secretary, Edward A. Baggeler, treasurer; League of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the Rev. James D. Foley, director, Miss B. V. O'Brien, secretary; Gesu Relief Corps, two hundred members; Boys' Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary, one hundred and thirty-six members; Girls' Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary, two hundred members.

Rev. M. P. Dowling, S. J.

The Rev. James D. Foley, S. J., first pastor of the Gesu, was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, on February 4, 1854. He was educated at St. Xavier College in Cincinnati, and, after completing his course there, in 1872 entered the Society of Jesus. Here he followed the course of studies prescribed by the Society, namely, rhetoric, philosophy, science and theology, at Florissant, Missouri, Woodstock College, Woodstock, Maryland, and St. Louis University. He was for some years professor in St. Xavier College, Cincinnati, and Marquette College, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. He was ordained to the priesthood by Archbishop Kenrick of St. Louis, on January 31, 1885, and said his first Mass in the St. Louis University Chapel on February 2 of the same year. He was vice-president of St. Mary's College, Kansas, Creighton College, Omaha, Nebraska, and Marquette College, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and also pastor at St. Mary's Kansas, and Cincinnati, Ohio. While Vice-President of Marquette College, he was, in 1889, appointed to succeed the Rev. S. P. Lalumiere as pastor of the Holy Name Church, and when the two churches of St. Gall and Holy Name were united, he became pastor of the new church, the Gesu, which position he held until he was transferred to the pastorship of SS. Peter and Paul's (Jesuit) Church, Detroit, Michigan, August 23, 1897.

The Rev. M. P. Dowling, S. J., who succeeded Father Foley as rector of the Gesu, is in his forty-seventh year, having been born in Cincinnati, Ohio, June 14, 1851. After completing a course at St. Xavier College in his native city, he continued his studies at St. Stanislaus Seminary, Florissant, near St. Louis, Missouri; Woodstock College, Woodstock, Maryland, and Frederick, Maryland. During this accumulative period, he also devoted a portion of his time to teaching, having been professor of poetry and rhetoric in St. Xavier College and St. Louis University before his ordination, and in Detroit College after having received his ordination, which was conferred upon him by Archbishop Elder of Cincinnati, in 1881. Father Dowling was rector of Creighton College, Omaha, from 1885 to 1889, during which time he built the St. John's Church attached to Creighton College, and a wing to the latter institution. He was also rector of Detroit College from 1889 to 1894, during which time he built the new college on Jefferson avenue and renovated, to the extent of $25,000, the old church of SS. Peter and Paul, formerly the Cathedral, but now attached to Detroit College as a Jesuit church. Following this, he was pastor of the Holy Family Church, Chicago, until his removal to the Gesu last summer. During his active association with church work, Father Dowling has developed executive and administrative abilities of a very high order. As a preacher and public speaker, he is also regarded with much consideration, his natural bent for literary work exhibiting itself in the practical, yet thoroughly artistic, character of his discourses. And he is a well-read man, besides having a thorough grasp of the multitudinous social and economic questions in which the public, as a general thing, are so much interested at the present time. Personally, he is an exceedingly genial character, and has succeeded in making himself remarkably popular wherever, in the performance of his priestly duties, his lot has been cast.

St. Hedwig's Church, Milwaukee.

IN order that they might consistently fulfill their religious obligations, the Polish Catholics residing in the northeast part of Milwaukee were for a considerable period compelled to attend the church of St. Stanislaus, which necessitated a journey of nearly four miles. This most unsatisfactory condition of affairs maintained until 1871, when, the number of families in the settlement having increased to forty-six, it was decided to organize a congregation of their own. They, therefore, purchased a number of lots on the corner of Brady and Racine streets, the business pertaining to the purchase of the same, as well as to the organization of the congregation, being done under the personal direction of the Rev. John Rodowicz, at that time rector of St. Stanislaus parish. So. the new parish was organized, although the fact still remained paramount that the people comprising it, individually and collectively, were so poor as to make the carrying out of the project an almost impossible undertaking. However, in this they were materially aided by the liberality of Mr. Aug. Rudinski, a member of St. Stanislaus congregation, who became actively interested in their undertaking. The first pastor of the new parish was the Rev. Father Knocz, who remained in charge for a period of six months. His successor was the Rev. John Rodowicz, and his, the Rev. Father Kralezynski, O. M. Cap., who remained until 1875. It was during the administration of this pastor that the parsonage was erected. Then, once again, the Rev. John Rodowicz assumed the pastoral duties, remaining in charge of same for a number of years. Finally, however, he was succeeded by the present rector, the Rev. C. Rogozinski, whose assistant is the Rev. L. Mscisk. The first church erected by this congregation was a brick edifice 83x44 feet, which was replaced in 1888 by a larger and altogether finer structure. The school was established in the parish in 1872, in a small building which was purchased by the congregation and moved on to the church property, where it was used until 1879, when it was replaced by a larger and more appropriate one of brick. At the present time, St. Hedwig's congregation consists of about six hundred families, while the parochial school, which is under the direction of seven Sisters of Notre Dame, has a regular attendance of six hundred and twenty-five scholars.

The Rev. Clemens Rogozinski is a native of Poland, in which country he was born in the year 1836. It was also in the public and parochial schools of his native place that he obtained his rudimentary education. Subsequently, at other institutions he completed his studies for that after-life which it was his intention to devote in entirety to the saving of souls and service of the Church.

He was finally ordained to the priesthood, afterwards for several years continuing in active pastoral service in the land of his nativity. In 1871 he came to the United States, locating in the State of Texas. In 1877 he came to Milwaukee, and having associated himself with that archdiocese was assigned to the pastorate of St. Hedwig's congregation in Milwaukee. His present efficient assistant in conducting the numerous pastoral duties of this extensive parish is the Rev. L. Mscisz.

Holy Rosary Church, Milwaukee.

THIS parish was organized by the Most Rev. Archbishop Heiss, in 1885, by whom Father McGill, the present pastor, was appointed. The church, which is situated on Oakland Avenue, was dedicated on March 14, 1886. The first school was organized in this parish by Sisters of Charity, B. V. M., of Dubuque, October 12, 1885, and proved so successful under their management that a second building was erected in 1893. Holy Rosary congregation now numbers some two hundred and seventy families, and at least three hundred children are in attendance at the schools. There are a number of Catholic societies in this congregation, among them being the following: Catholic Knights of Wisconsin: E. J. Mausur, president; Timothy Keleher, treasurer; Thomas Clifford, secretary. Catholic Order of Foresters: E. J. Mauser, chief ranger; P. H. Reilly, secretary; J. Langlois, treasurer; Holy Name Society, Sr.: C. F. H. Hintze, prefect; A. N. Ritz, secretary; Father W. F. McGill, director. Holy Name Society, Jr.: F. Weber, prefect; C. Trapschuh, secretary; Father W. F. McGill, director. Altar Society: Miss Carroll, prefect; Mrs. Berthelet, vice-prefect; Miss Dunn, treasurer; Father W. F. McGill, director. St. Ann's Society: Mrs. Frey, prefect; Mrs. Bohan, vice-prefect; Rev. W. F. McGill, treasurer and director. Children of Mary Society: Miss Fanny Berthelet, prefect; Miss Lucy Flood, first assistant; Miss Annie Foley, secretary, and Father W. F. McGill, director.

The Rev. W. F. McGill, pastor of Holy Rosary congregation, was born in Canada on October 12, 1851. Two years later he came with his parents to the United States, locating in Dodge County, Wisconsin. He was educated for the priesthood at St. Francis Seminary, near Milwaukee, being ordained on June 24, 1878. For seven months following his ordination he was assistant pastor at St. Joseph's Church, Fond du Lac, Wis., and for the next seven years assistant at St. John's Cathedral in Milwaukee. He then assumed the duties of his present position.

Holy Trinity Church, Milwaukee.

THE organization of Holy Trinity congregation, the second oldest German congregation in Milwaukee, took place in 1849. In the same year the Rev. Dr. Salzmann was appointed assistant priest to the Rev. Michael Heiss, rector of St. Mary's congregation. At the same time he was commissioned by Bishop John Martin Henni to erect a new church for the Catholic residents on the south side. He took immediate steps to execute the work with which he was entrusted, and for that purpose collected money from the Catholic families in Milwaukee, as well as contributing liberally from funds which he brought with him from Austria. The corner-stone of the church was laid July 8, 1849, the Catholics of the city marching in a body to the corner of Greenbush and Park streets, at which point the new church was to be erected. In his sermon on that occasion, Bishop Henni expressed his great satisfaction at the success of the undertaking. On September 22, 1850, the church was dedicated in honor of the Most Holy Trinity. "Tears stood in my eyes," wrote Dr. Salzmann, "when, at the altar, I thought of the many who had so freely and uncomplainingly given towards the completion of this great work." The Rev. Joseph Sadler was appointed first rector of the young parish. In the fall of 1850, Father Salzmann, still deeply interested in the welfare of the Holy Trinity, started on a tour of the Eastern Dioceses, his object being to secure contributions with which to clear off the balance of debt still resting on that property. On this journey he was accompanied by Mr. Charles Ott, who remained his faithful companion until his return to Milwaukee, February 2, 1852. In the meantime, the rector, Father Sadler, was engaged in a similar errand in the South. Father Sadler remained at Holy Trinity until 1859, when he was succeeded by the Rev. Lawrence Conrad, who took charge of the congregation May 8, 1859. This energetic and pious priest has now labored for nearly forty years in this congregation and has done a great deal to bring it to the present flourishing condition. In 1862 an imposing steeple was added to the structure, at a cost of $3,397, and in the following year, 1863, the church was renovated at an expense of $1,765. Father Conrad has always taken a great interest in promoting the welfare of Catholic schools and it was through his personal strenuous endeavors that the present school house was erected in 1867. This building cost the parish $19,208.53. In 1868 the priests' house was rebuilt and completed, and at the same time the church was repaired and improved to the amount of $800, and a dwelling costing $2,500 was built for the accommodation of the School Sisters. In 1869, a clock as well as three large bells were added to the church property, at an outlay of $1,670. In 1874 the interior of the church was renovated throughout at an expense of $6,618. In the same year six acres of land were bought as an addition to Trinity cemetery. In 1878 the church was provided with a new organ which cost $3,500. On June 18, 1879, Father Conrad celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his elevation to the priesthood, on which occasion the congregation of Holy Trinity church made every effort to show their love and appreciation for their good rector. He also received numerous magnificent and costly presents. Among those present on this occasion were the Bishop of Green Bay and thirty-five members of the clergy. In thankful remembrance of this day, Father Conrad caused the erection of the present chapel in Holy Trinity cemetery, the cost of which amounted to

$2,000. The statue, "Mater Dolorosa," on the altar, in this chapel, is a work of art and was made at Munich. In 1888 the church was frescoed and provided with three handsome altars, costing altogether some $10,000. The present priest's house was erected in 1892; it is elegantly furnished, the expense in all amounting to $15,000. The congregation at present comprises some five hundred families. The parochial school is attended by four hundred and fifty children, who are instructed by one lay teacher and seven Sisters of Notre Dame. The officers of the congregation are: John Girmscheid, treasurer; Wenzel Janka, secretary; Leopold Wallemann, vice-secretary.

The Catholic societies established in this congregation are: St. Anthony's Society: F. W. Miller, president; Anthony Schumacher, vice-president; Jacob Barbian, secretary; John Haas, treasurer. St. John's Society: William Goetz, president; P. J. Rinzel, vice-president; Leopold Wallemann, secretary; William Lammers, treasurer. Catholic Order of Foresters: Adam Plein, chief ranger; William Bosh, vice chief ranger; Mathias Pelt, recording secretary; John Michels, financial secretary; Joseph Obenberger, treasurer; Dr. J. H. Huennekens, medical examiner. Catholic Knights of Wisconsin: John Girmscheid, president; John Sanhuber, secretary; Emil Deuster, treasurer. Family Protective Association: Peter Joseph Rinzel, president; Leopold Wallemann, secretary; Math. Burbach, treasurer; St. Stanislaus Young Men's Society: Oswald Lochemes, president; Martin Kutchera, secretary; August Harmeyer, treasurer. Married Ladies' Society and Young Ladies' Society.

At various times during the existence of Holy Trinity congregation, the following priests have occupied the position of assistant pastor: Fathers Surbes, John Gmeiner, W. G. Miller, Joseph Kraemer, Goldsmith, A. Decker, N. M. Zimmer, George Woelfl, John Decker, Joseph Hartmann, Ignatius Klein, A. Rossbach, F. X. Schwinn, F. X. Hess, Joseph Koester, F. X. Schneider, and Philip Dreis.

The Very Rev. Lawrence Conrad was born August 9, 1829, at Neunkirchen, Diocese of Wuerzburg, Bavaria. He acquired his classical studies at Aschaffenburg, and those in philosophy at Wuerzburg. At the university of the same city, he also studied theology. While attending the latter, Cardinal Hergenroether was one of his professors. He was ordained priest in June, 1854, and said his first Mass June 18, 1854. Soon after this he embarked for America, as he had long before concluded to spend his life as missionary priest in the new world. Arriving at Milwaukee, Bishop Henni at once commissioned him to organize a congregation among the Catholics living toward the West. After having traveled for three days, he stopped at a log-house, where he was heartily welcomed by the family. In this primitive dwelling he offered up the holy sacrifice of Mass and preached to the settlers, who came from all directions. At this point the people soon after built a log-church and a priest's house. At his first missions, at Cross Plains and Columbus, he experienced many trials. On May 8, 1859, he became rector of Holy Trinity congregation at Milwaukee. In 1864 he left Milwaukee for Waterford, in order to regain his health, but returned in 1866 and again took charge of Holy Trinity congregation; since that time he has worked unceasingly and uninterruptedly for the welfare and prosperity of this congregation. During his administration much has been done for the improvement of the church property. In May, 1896, Father Conrad made a visit to Europe, stopping at Rome, where he had an audience with Pope Leo XIII. From there he went to Assisi, Bologna, Innsbruck, Munich, Wuerzburg, Aschaffenburg and Neunkirchen, his birthplace. He also visited different places in Baden and Switzerland, returning in August to America. On his arrival in Milwaukee, he found a great demonstration awaiting him which had been prepared by his assistant, the Rev. Philip Dreis. The Rev. L. Conrad has been one of the Diocesan Consultors for many years, having been appointed to that office by Archbishop J. M. Henni.

St. Hyacinth's Church, Milwaukee.

THE congregation of St. Hyacinth, corner of Tenth avenue and Becher street, Milwaukee, is a branch of St. Stanislaus Church. This separation was effected in 1882, at a time when the older organization after years of prosperous administration, had become too large for all practical purposes. So a new congregation was established, composed of all families in St. Stanislaus parish, living west of Sixth avenue. A large property situated on the corner of Tenth avenue and Becher street was purchased, upon which were erected a church, school-house and parsonage. Work on the church was begun during the summer of 1882, the building being completed the following spring. Dedicatory services were held by the Rt. Rev. Archbishop Heiss, on April 1, of that year, he being assisted by Monsgr. Batz and the Rev. Father Kruse and Prof. Elskamp as presbyter assistants, deacon and sub-deacon respectively. There were also present on that occasion, Monsgr. Zeininger and the Rev. Fathers Hess, Dr. Zardetti, S. P. Lalumiere, S. J., P. De Meester, S. J. P., Lucas Rasch, O. M. Cap., Father Ro-dowicz, Leo Suchy, Fathers Masielwicz, Fairbanks, Mahoney, Zielinski, Gulski and Gorski. The sermon was preached by Father Rodowicz. The church is of solid brick with sand-stone trimmings and is built in the renaissance style of architecture. The interior furnishings of the church are also handsome and substantial. This building completed, attention was at once turned towards the erection of a school-house. The structure is situated east of the church where it occupies a space of 40x80 feet. It cost, complete, about $13,000. The school-house was dedicated on Easter Sunday, by Archbishop Heiss, a number of priests witnessing the ceremonies. The new side altars of the church were also dedicated at the same time. The congregation of St. Hyacinth's at present consists of about eight hundred families, and the parochial school connected with it, which is conducted by eight sisters from Notre Dame Convent and one lay teacher, has an attendance of one thousand and fifty scholars. Of societies in St. Hyacinth's congregation, there are: Catholic Knights of Wisconsin; Young Men's Society; Young Ladies' Sodality; Altar Society and Holy Rosary Society.

The Rev. Hyacinth Gulski was born in Culm, West Prussia, on November 28, 1847. He completed his collegiate studies at the gymnasium of his native city, after which he took a full course at the Seminary of the Diocese of Culm, where he was ordained priest in the month of September, 1873. For some time following he was teacher in the Diocesan Educational institutions in Holland. In June, 1874, he came to America and was almost at once appointed rector of the Catholic congregation at Berlin. In the following year, he was appointed assistant to the Rev. Father Gorski, at St. Stanislaus, Milwaukee, and in January, 1886, became rector of the same congregation. When St. Stanislaus parish assumed proportions, which made it impossible for the church to accommodate them, he was commissioned by the Archbishop to organize that of St. Hyacinth's, of which he was also made the rector.

Church of the Immaculate Conception, Milwaukee.

THIS congregation originated in the fall of 1870, at which time the Rolling Mill Company donated three lots to the Very Rev. Martin Kundig for a church site. These lots were located on the corner of Kinnickinnic and Russell avenues, where during the spring of the following year the church, a moderate sized though comfortable frame structure, was erected. This structure was completed in November, 1871, during which month it was duly dedicated by the Very Rev. Martin Kundig in honor of the Immaculate Conception of Mary. The sermon on this occasion was delivered by the Rev. Father John Kinsella. The new congregation[1] was first placed in charge of the

Rev. Father Fagan, at that time professor at the seminary at St. Francis. He was succeeded by the first resident pastor, the Rev. P. F. Pettit, who remained from March, 1872, until August, 1875, during which period he built the parsonage. Father Pettit was succeeded by the Rev. J. W. Vahey, who left in 1876, his successor being the Rev. James Hegarty, who maintained the pastorate until July, 1880. (Father Hegarty died October 19, 1896.) A month after his transfer from this parish, the Rev. Thomas Fagan, the present incumbent, took charge of the congregation, and under his careful and zealous administration the parish has prospered to a marked degree. Among the numerous changes, improvements and additions brought about during Father Fagan's incumbency was the incorporation of the parish, in 1885, in which year also work was begun on a school building and parish hall. This building was completed in the summer following, school being opened in September, 1886. The building is of solid brick, and cost when completed $10,000. The congregation of the Immaculate Conception at the present time numbers about one hundred and seventy-five families, and the parochial school, which is conducted by five Sisters of Mercy, has a regular average attendance of two hundred and five pupils. Of Catholic societies in the parish there are the Catholic Knights of Wisconsin, J. D. Kidney, president; Catholic Order of Foresters, W. J. Donahoe, chief ranger; Ancient Order of Hibernians; the Leo Club; St. Ann's Society, Mrs. A. McGuigan, president; Sodality of the Immaculate Conception, Miss Mary Fallon, prefect; Sodality of the Children of Mary; Altar Society, Rev. Father Fagan, treasurer; Married Men's Sodality; Boys' Sodality, and Immaculate Conception School Society, Father Fagan, president, and Miss Walsh, secretary.

The Rev. Thomas Fagan, the present rector of the Immaculate Conception congregation, was born in Jackson, Washington County, Wisconsin, January 7, 1845. In 1861 he entered the ecclesiastical seminary of St. Francis; in 1867 he was appointed a professor at the seminary, where he was ordained to the priesthood on December 19, 1868. He said his first Mass at St. Francis Borgia's Church at Cedarburg on the following Christmas day, immediately after which he continued his duties at the Salesianum at St. Francis, where he remained until 1879. When the Immaculate Conception congregation was fully organized he attended it from 1871 to 1872. In 1879 he was placed in charge of the congregation at Franklin, where he stayed for fifteen months, and on August 1 following he assumed his present duties as pastor of the Immaculate Conception. During his administration this parish, besides erecting a handsome and substantial brick school house, has also acquired nearly an entire block of land within the city limits.

St. Josaphat's Church, Milwaukee.

THE congregation dedicated to St. Josaphat by Catholics of the South Side was established in 1888, and was a part of St. Stanislaus' congregation until its increase in numbers made it advisable to create a new parish. At first the parish numbered three hundred and seventeen families, although there was not the semblance of a church in which to take care of them. The first and only pastor that this congregation has ever had is Rev. W. Grutza, who was at that time assistant pastor at St. Stanislaus. It was not a sinecure that came to him, although he entered into the undertaking with a relish and zest which spoke well for the future interest and prosperity of the parish.

To begin with, a temporary building of brick, 128x80 feet, was erected and used by the parish as a church and for school purposes. This building was destroyed by fire on May 12, 1889, becoming a total loss. But, far from being discouraged, the people, though limited in means, at once set to work to erect another. This was built on the site of the former one, and when completed cost $4,400. From that time matters progressed favorably for the parish, and as a result St. Josaphat's congregation is to-day one of the largest in the city of Milwaukee, numbering nearly one thousand families, while fully eleven hundred children attend the parochial school.

There are several Catholic organizations connected with this congregation, seven being conducted for the benefit of the men of the congregation, besides which there is a Young Ladies' Sodality of about four hundred members, and a Holy Rosary Society for Married Women, to which seven hundred members belong. In addition to the parochial school connected with the parish, there is also a high school for boys who have passed through the lower grades, of whom there are at the present time no less than sixty, who are undergoing a course of boys' training in this school. Three languages, physics, bookkeeping, shorthand and typewriting comprise the full course.

used as a church, and will, as soon as the new edifice is completed, be converted into a school house, and partitioned off for the accommodation of twelve classes. The High School building contains eight class rooms, besides a large hall. The parsonage is also a commodious building, two stories in height, and occupying an area 82x42 feet. In addition to this, there is a house which is occupied as a residence by the professors who have charge of the school.

But the crowning glory of this parish will be the several commodious and substantial buildings, among which is a large structure which is at the present time new St. Josaphat's Church, which is fast approaching its completion. When the people of the congregation found that, owing to increasing numbers, it would soon be necessary for them to erect a larger church, their pastor, appreciating their lack of means to properly carry out such a purpose without debarring themselves from the very necessities of life, looked around for some means by which he could aid them in the undertaking. The upshot of this was that he went to Chicago and purchased from the Government authorities there all of the stone in the old postoffice building in that city. The result of this enterprise on his part was that the congregation secured sufficient material for the present magnificent structure which they are erecting at a minimum cost of $33,000, including its transportation from Chicago to Milwaukee. Even now, at the lowest estimate, the new church will cost fully $100,000, which, however, is but a small part of what the expense would have been had it become necessary to procure similar material through the ordinary channels of commerce.

The new church, which is situated at the corner of Lincoln and First avenues, will be, when completed, one of the handsomest fire-proof structures in the Northwest. The entire structure is of a splendid quality of Berea sand-stone, trimmed with brick and terra cotta. The nave of this splendid building is two hundred feet in length, and the transept one hundred and twenty-eight feet in height, the former being flanked on either side by a number of massive Corinthian columns. To the right and left of the north wing, near which form the largest sections of the church, are belfrys one hundred feet high, which flank on either side the main entrance of the building. The main body of the church consists of three divisions. The portion in the entrance, the central portion under the dome being occupied by the main altar. The center is occupied by pews arranged with five aisles leading to the entrance through the main portico, and in the transepts the rotunda arises for seventy feet, in the form of an octagon. Surmounted from a circular cornice, from which springs the dome, eight pillars of ornamental steel rest on heavy marble bases bearing the weight of the dome, the base of which is pierced by eight windows of stained glass. this second cornice, from which the dome arises to its apex, here there is a large window of stained glass, through which is shaded a mellow light upon the numerous handsome and artistic papers which decorate from base to top. Immediately above the entrance to the nave, and extending into the rotunda, is the organ loft, beside which are galleries for the choir and congregation. The south part of the main sanctuary, in which are located the main altars, is finished in granite and marble. The main altar occupies a space thirty-two feet square, while the niche above rises to a height of seventy feet. Here a handsome effect is obtaind by means of a window so placed as to throw the light downward upon the statue of the Immaculate Conception, which stands above the altar. To the east and west of the sanctuary, there is an annex for sacristies, which are connected with the whole, running back of the main altar.

Like the main one, the altars in each of the annexes are of marble and granite, the designs being of special character. The entrance to the north of the central rotunda is forty-four by eighty feet, five portals connecting from this to the portico, which is sixty-four feet in length and forty-four feet in height; three central portals connect with the vestibule, seventeen by thirty-four feet, and also connecting with the main portion of the church, while the two outside lead to entrance halls, in which there are stairways leading up into the two belfrys. Besides these, there are other entrances to the building in the east and west wings.

The arcades, pillars, caps, cornices, and other work of similar character are adorned with rich plastic and artistic stucco work, while the altar communion rail and wainscoting around the sanctuary are finished in polished marble and granite. The front gable of the edifice is adorned with the statue of St. Joseph, and the pillars are crowned with figures of the Evangelists, the Apostles, and other Saints.

The foundation of the structure is of cut stone, while the main body and wings, to a height of seventy feet, are of pressed brick, and the ornamental caps, cornices and friezes of terar cotta. All of the ornamentation above the cornices is of wrought iron, while iron, steel and copper form the sole components of the rough and dome walls.

The church has a seating capacity of two thousand three hundred people. It will undoubtedly be a number of years before the church can be viewed in a state of completeness, as no effort will be made to complete the interior decorations until the building has obtained sufficient age to guarantee the safety of such work. When finished, however, it bids fair to be one of the very handsomest houses of worship erected in the Northwest.
